with Antipater Tyrian, a Stoicke Philosopher, and gaue himselfe chiefly vnto the study of morall and civill Philosophie, embracing all exercise of vertue with such an earnest defire, that it feemed he was pluckt forward by fome god:but aboue all other vertues, he loued the feuerity of instice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor fauour. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speake openly before the people, because he would there should be certaine warlike forces entertained in civill Philosophy, as also in a great citie. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any bodie, neither would he cuer haue any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake fo litle in company: It skilleth no matter, quoth he, fo they cannot reproue my life, for I will begin to speake, when I can fay something worthy to be spoken. Hard by ŷ market place there was the common pallace or towne house of the citie, called Basilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Cenforship. There the Tribunes were wont to keepetheir audience, and because there was a pillar that troubled their seats, they would either hane taken it away, or else haue set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Caro against his wil to go into the market place, and to get up into the pulpit for Orations, to speak against them, where having given this first proofe of his cloquence and noble mind, he was maruellously eficemed of. For his Oration was not like a yong man, counterfeiting finenesse of speech and affectation, but flour, and full of wir and vehemency; and yet in his shortnesse of his sentences, he had fuch an excellent grace withall, that he maruelloufly delighted the heavers. & furthermore, shewing in nature a certaine gravity besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very full and audible voyce that might be hard of a maruellous number of people, and fuch a ffrong nature besides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his speech: for many times he would speake a whole day together, and was reuer wearie. So when he had obtained his cause against the Tribunes, he returned agains to keepe his former great filence, and to harden his body with painefull exercises, as to abide heate, frost and snow bare headed, and alwaies to go on foot in the field, where his friends that did accompany him rode on horsebacke; and sometime he would come and talke with one, sometime with another, as he went on foot by them. He had a wonderfull parience also in his ficknesse: for when he had any ague, he would be alone all day long, and fusfer no man to come to fee him, vntill he perceived his fit was off him, and that he found he was better. When he supped with his friends and familiars, they drew lots who should chuse their parts. If he chanced not to chuse, his triends not withstanding gaue him the preferment to chuse; but he refused it, saying, it was no reason, sith the goddesse Venus was against him. At the first he did not vie to sit log at y table, but after he had drunk one draught only he wold straight rife. But when he came to be elder, he fate long at the table fo that oftentimes he would fit it out all night with his friends, till the next morning. But they feeking to excuse it, said, that his great businesse and affaires in the commonwealth was the cause of it: for following that all the day long, hauing no leifure nortime to fludy, when night came he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers at the boord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, Gerea Cos faid, that Cate did nothing but drinke all night; Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, answered him: Thou doest not adde this vnto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dice. To be flort, Cate thinking that the manners and fashions of mens liues in his time were so corrupt, and required such great change and alteration, that to go vprightly, he was to take a contrary course in all things therefore when he saw that purple, red, and the lightest colours were best esteemed of, he in contrary maner defired to weare blacke. And many times also after dinner he would go abroad bare footed without shoes, and without any gowne: not because he would be wondered at for any fuch strangenesse, but to acquaint himselfe to be assumed only of shameleffe and dishonest things, and to despise those which were not reproued, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, land being left him to the value of an hundred talents by the death of a coufin of his that likewise was called Case, he put it into ready money, to lend to his friends that lacked; and without vsuric. And there were some of his friends also that would morgage his land, or his flaues, to the chamber of the citie, for their owne prinate businesse: the which he himfelfe would either gue them to morgage, or els afterwards confirme the morgage of them. Furthermore when he was come of age to marie, having neuer knowne woman before, he was anade fare to Lepida. This Lepida had bene precontracted vnto Metellus Scipio: but afterwards the precontract being broken, he forfook her, fo that she was free, when Cato was contracted to her.

Notwithstanding before Cato maried her, Scipio repenting him that he had refused her, made all the meanes he could to have her againe: and fo he had. Cate tooke it fo griewoully, that he thought to go to law for her, but his frieds diffwaded him fro it. Then feeing no other remedy. to fatisfie his angry mind, he wrote verses against Scipio, in the which he reuised him al he could: yfing the bitter taunts of Archilocus verfes, but not fuch impudent, lewde, and childish reproaches as be there. After that he maried Attilia, Soranus daughter, being the first woman he distinction cuer knew: yet not the onely woman whom he did know, as is reported of Lalius, Scipiaes too wife. friend, who therein was counted the happier, because all that long time wherein he lived, riage. he neuer knew other woman but his first wife. Furthermore, in the warre of the bondmen(otherwise called Spartacus warre) one Gellius was chosen Prætor of the army, vnder whom Cate ferued of his owne good will, for the loue he bare vnto his brother Capio, who in that army cate first had charge of a thousand footmen. Now Cato could not as he wished, shew his valiant nesses soldier lare and good feruice, because of the insufficiency of the Prætor that gaue ill direction. This notwithstanding, in the midst of all the riot and insolencie of them in the campe, he shewing himfelfe a stayed man in all his doings, valiant where need was, and very wife alfo, all men esteemed him to be nothing inferiour vnto Cato the elder. Whereupon Gellius the Prætor gaue him many honours in token of his valiantnesse, which are given in reward of mens good service: howbeit Cato refused them, and said, that he was nothing worthie of those honors. These things made him to be thought a maruellous strange man. Furthermore, when there was a law made, forbidding all menthat fued for any office in the commonwealth, that they should have no prompters in any of the affemblies, to blow into their cares the names of prinate citizens: he alone making fuite to be Colonell of a thousand footmen, was obedient to the law, and committed all the private citizens names to memory, to speake vnto every one of them, and to call them by their names: fo that he was enuied even of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deeds praifeworthy, by fo much more were they grieued, for that they could not follow them. So Cato being chosen Colonell of a thousand footemen, he was sent into Mace- Cato chosen DON, vnto Rubrius, Prætorthere. Some fay, that at his departure from thence, his wife lamenting, and weeping to fee him go, one Munatius a friend of his faid vnto her: take no thought Attilia, and leave weeping, for I promifethee I wilkeepethy husband for thee. It is well faid, anfwered Cato. Then when they were a daies iourney from Rome, Cato after supper said vnto this Munatius: Thou must looke well to thy promise thou hast made Attilia, that thou wouldest keepe me for her, and therefore for sake me not night nor day. Therupon he comanded his men that from thenceforth they should prepare two beds in his chaber, that Munatius also might lye there:who was rather pleasantly himself looked vnto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fifteene flaues with him, two freemen, and foure of his friends which rode, and he himself went on foot: fometime talking with one, otherwhile with another as he went. When he came to the campe, where there were many legions of the Romaines, the Prator immediatly gaue him charge of one of them: who thinking it small honor to him for himselfe only to be valiant, sith he was but How Cato one man, he practifed to make all his fouldiers under him, like unto himselfe. The which he did not by feare and tarren but by leaving and agreed a graph profile to the which he did not by feare and tarren but by leaving and agreed a graph profile to the which he did not by feare and tarren but by leaving and agreed a graph profile to the which he did not by feare and tarren but by leaving and agreed a graph profile to the which he did not by feare and tarrent but by leaving and agreed a graph profile to the which he did not be a graph profile to the which he did not by feare and tarrent but by leaving and the same and th not by feare and terror, but by lenity and gentle perswasions, training and instructing them in euery point what they should do:adding to his gentle instruction and perswaftons, reward to those raliant. that did well, and punishment to them that offended. Whereby it was hard to judge, whether he had made the more quiet then warlike, more valiant, then iust. So dreadfull they shewed themselves to their enemies, and courteous to their friends: searcful to do euil, & ready to win honor. Whereof followed that which cato least accounted of, that is, he wan fame and good wil: for his fouldiers did greatly honour and loue him, because he himselfe would euer first set his handto any thing he commanded them; and because also both in his diet, in his apparel, and in any iourney or pains, he was rather like vnto the meanest soldier, then any of the other captaines. In contrary maner also in good nature, noble courage, and eloquence, he far exceeded al the other Co-Ionels and Captaines, for the true loue of vertue, (to wit, the defire to follow it) taketh no roote The loue of in mens minds, vuleffe they have a fingular loue & reverence vnto the person, whom they defire vertue sto to follow. When Cato vnderstood that Athenodorus sirnamed Cordylion, a Stoicke Philosopher, whence is excellently well learned development in the circle of Proceedings to the control of excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the citie of PBRGAMVS, being a very old man, and abbenodeonethat stifly refused the friendship of kings, princes, & noble men, desirous to have him about my the them: to write to him, he thought it was lost labour. Wherefore having two months liberty by stoicks, Cateronical was lost labour.

the lawes of the Romaines, to follow his owneaffaires, he tooke fea, and went into Asia to him, hoping he should not lose his journey, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had spoken with him, and talked of divers matters together, at length he brought him from his first determination, and caried him to the campe with him; effecting this victorie more then all the conquests of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the most part of all the provinces and realmes of the East parts of the world. In the meane time, whilest he lay at his charge in the campe, being Colonell of a thousand footmen, his brother preparing to go into As 14, fel sicke in the city of Envis, in the country of THRACIA. Cate having speedy intelligence thereof tooke fea presently, when it was maruellous rough and boisterous, and imbarked in a little crayer of a merchants of THESSALY, with two of his friends, & three bondmen only, & did escape drowning very narrowly: & yet by good fortune arrived fafely, a litle after his brother Capioes death. He rook his death more forrowfully then became a Philosopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, embracing the dead corps of his brother; but also for the exceeding charge and funiptuous funerals which he bestowed vpon him, in perfumes, sweet sauours, and sumptuous filkes that were burnt with his body; and furthermore, in the stately tombe of THRAGIAN marble which he made for him, and fet vp in the market place of the Anians, that cost eight ralents Some did mislike this vaine charge that Cato bestowed, considering the modesty and temperance he yfed in all things elfe, not regarding with judgement his tender loue and affection towards his kinfinen, which was mingled in him with his feneritie, and hardneffe, againft all voluptuousnesses, and shamelesse requests. Divers cities, Princes and Noblemen sent him many fundrie prefents, to honour the funerals of his brother Capio howbeit he tooke no money of all them, faving only fpices, and fweet fauors, and fuch other ornaments as honoured the obfequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, vnto those that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the land that fel vitto him, & a little daughter of his, by the death of his brother, notwithstanding the charge he had bene at in his funerals, he did not reckon it in the partition of the land, betwixt him & his brother Cepioes daughter. All the which things when they were for lemnized, some write notwithstanding, that he did cleanse the imbers where his brothers body had bene burnt, through a fine or riddle, where through they cleanse corne, and all to get out the of Cefar, whitherote gold and filter that was molten there; but fuch thinke that their writings should be as farre from controlment as their doings. So when Catoes time of his charge was expired, they did accompany him at his departure, not onely with ordinary praifes, vowes and prayers to the gods for his health but with embracings, teares, & maruellous lametations of the foldiers, which fored their garments on the ground as he went, and kiffing of his hands, which honor the Romaines did but to very few of their Generals. Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to Romb to deale in the affaires there, to go and see Asia, partly to be an eye-witnesse of the maners, customs, & power of enery prouince as he went: & partly also to satisfie king Deiotarus requeff, who having benchis fathers friend, had earneflly intreated him to come and see him, he went the journy and vied it in this fort, First, by peepe of day, he sent his baker & cooke before, where he meant to lie that night. They coming foberly into the city or village, inquired if there were none of Catoes friends & acquaintancethere, & if they found none, then they prepared his fupper in an Inne, and troubled no man but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Gouernors of the town, & praied them to help the to lodging, and did content the selucs with the first that was offered them. Oftentimes the townsmen did not beleeue they were catoes men, & made no account of them, because they tooke all things so quietly, & made no ado with the officers. In fo much as Cato fornetime came himfelf, & found nothing ready for him, & when he was come, they made as smal account of him, seeing him set ypon his carriages, and speake neuer a word for they took him for fome meane man, & atimorous person. Notwithstanding, sometime he salled them vnto him, and told them: O poore men, learne to be more courteous to receive travelling ROMAINS that passe by you. & looke not alwaies to have Catoes to come vnto you and therfore fee that you vie them with fuch courtefie and entertainment; that they may bridle the authoritie they have ouer you for you shal find many that wildesire no better colour nor occasió by force to take from you that they would have: because you vnwillingly also do grant them the things Aluazhing they wold, and need. There is a report of a prety least hapned him in Syria. When he came to ANTIOCH, he found a great number of people deuided on either side of the street, standing a row one by another very decently, the yong men by theselues in faire clokes, boies by theselues in feemely feemely array, & priefts and other officers of the citic also, all in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought straight they had made this solemne procession to honor him, and fell out with his men he had fent before, because they did suffer them to make such preparation for his coming. So he made his friends light from their horses, and go on foote to accompany him. But when they came neare to the gate of the city, the master of these ceremonies that had assembled all that copany (an old man, having a rod in his hand, & a crown on his head) came to Cato with Demetrius out faluting of him, and asked him onely, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would affaut with come. This Demetrius had bene one of Pompeys flaues, and because Pompeys fame was great with tempey. all men, his feruant Demetrius also was much honoured and made of aboue his defert, for that he was in great credite with Pompey. Catoes friends hearing what question the old man asked him, burft out a laughing as they went through this procession. Cate being ashamed of it, said no more then, but: O vnfortunate city! Afterwards not with stading, when he told it to any body, he wold Jaugh at it himselfe. But Pompey rebuked them that through ignorance had failed to honour Cato. When Cate came to the citic of EPHESVS, and was coming towards Pompey to falute him, being Cate honors. the elderman, and of greater dignitie and estimation then he, who at that time also was General red from of a great and puissant army: Pompey feeing him coming towards him a farre off, would not tarv 10 in affa. tillhe came to him, fitting in his chaire of estate, but rising vp went to meete him, as one of the greatest & noblest persons of Rom B; and taking him by y hand, after he had embraced and welcomedhim, he prefently fel in praise of his vertue before his face, and afterwards also commended him in his absence, when he was gone from him. Whereupon, every man after that had him in great veneration for those things which before they despised in him, when they considered better of his noble and courteous mind. For men that faw Pompeys entertainment towards him, knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather reuerenced, & for a kind of duty obserucd, more then for any loue he bare him and they noted further, that he honoured him greatly while he was with him, but yet that he was glad when Cato went fro him. For he fought to keepe backeall the yonggentlemen of Rome that went to fee him, and defired them to remaine with him:but for Cato, he was nothing defirous of his company, for that in his presence he thought he eld cato, could not command as he would, and therefore was willing to let him go, recomending his wife and his children to him, § which he neuer did before vnto any other Romaine that returned to Rome: howbeit indeed Cato was partly allied vnto him. After that time, all the cities wherby he passed, deuised (in emulation one of the other) which of them should honor him most, and made him great feasts and banquets: in the which he praied his friends to have an eye to him, left vnwares he shold proue Curioes words true. For Curio sometime being his fried, & a familiar of his. mifliking notwithstading his severity, asked Cato if he would go fee As 1 A, when his charge were expired. Cato answered again, that it was his full determination. O well faid, quoth Curio, I hope then thou wilt returne more pleasant and civil. And these were Curioes words. Furthermore, Detotarus king of GALATIA, being a very old man, fent for Cato to come into his countrey, to recommend his fons and house vinto him: who when he arrived there, had great rich presents of all mer price forts offered him by the king intreating him all he could to take them. This fo much misliked & king Deisangred Cato, that he coming thither in the euening, (after he had taried there one whole day only) the next morning he went his way from thence at the third houre. Howbeit he had not gone near from one dayes journy, but he found greater gifts that taried him, with Deiotarus letters, at the citie of gifts. PESSINVNTA; in the which he instantly requested him to take them, or at the least if he would refuse them himselfe, that then he would let the be deuided amongst his friends, sith every way they did descrue it, but specially for his sake, for that his goods also were not so great, as could cotent all his friends. But Cate wold not fuffer the to take any iot of it more then before although he faw wel enough that there were fome of them fo tender hearted, that they coplained of him, for that he would not fuffer them to take any of it. For he told them, that otherwise, corruption and bribery could lacke no honest colour to take and for his friends, they should alwayes have part with him of that which was his own iustly. So he returned king Deiotarus presents backe again. Now whenhe was ready to imbarke, to passe ouer the sea again vnto BRVNDVSIVM, some of his friends perswaded him, that it was better to put the asses of his brother Cepioes bones into another ship. But he answered them, that he would rather lose his owne life, then to leave his brothers relicks. Thereupon he presently hoissed saile, and it is reported that he passed ouer in greatdanger, where other ships arrived very safely. When he was returned vnto Rome, he was alwaics either talking Philosophy with Athenodorus the Philosopher, or else in the marker place, to pleasure his friends. When his turne came that he was to make suite to be Questor he would never fue for it, before he had first diligently perused all the ordinances touching the of. fice of Quæstor, and that he had particularly made enquirie of men of greatest experience, to know what the authoritie of the office was. So he no fooner came to his office, but he prefently made great alteration among the Clearkes and officers of the treasurie; who having the lawes and records in their hands, and exercifing the office commonly vider young men which were chosen Treasurers (who for their ignorance & lacke of experience, stood rather in neede of maifters to teach them, then that they were able to correct others) they them selves were the officers and controlled them. But Cate not contenting himselfe with the name and honor of the thing. did throughly understand what the Clearkes and Registers should be, and therfore would have them to be as they ought to be, ministers vnder the Quastors onely; telling them of their briberie and corruption which they committed, and reformed them also that faulted through ignorance. And when he faw fome infolent and impudent perfons, that curried fanour with other treasurers to be against him, he caused the chiefest of them to be condemned for fallhood, in making division betwixt two coheires: and consequently turned him cleare our of his office, for euer doing any thing there any more. He accused another also for forging of a Will, whom Catulus Luctatius defending, being then Cenfor, and a man of great honour for the dignitie of his office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the inftest man one of them in his time at Rome, and of those also that highly commended Cate, was conversant with him for his honeft life; when he perceived that he could not defend his man by no reason. he prayed them at his request that they would pardon him. But Cate would in no wife grane it. But Catulus carneftly intreating still for him, then Cato plainly said vnto him: It is shame for thee (Catulus) thou that art Cenfor, and shouldest reforme all our lives, thus to forget the dus tic of thine office, to pleafe our ministers. Catulue looking at Cato when he had spoken; as though he would answer him: whether it were for shame or anger, he went his way, and said neuer a word more. Yet was not the partie condemned, though there was one voice more, that did condemne then cleare him, because of the absence of one of the Judges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Catoes colleagues in the Quæstorship, being ficke at that time, and absent, Catulus sent vnto him. to pray him to come and helpe the poore man. Thereupon Lellius being brought thither in a litter, after judgement given, gave his last voice, which absolutely cleared him. Cato, this not with flanding would neuer vie him as a Clearke, nor pay him his wages, nor would count of Lolling voice among others. Thus having pulled downe the pride and fromacke of the Clearkes, and brought them vnto reason, in short time he had all the tables & records at his commandement, and made the Treasure chamber as honorable as the Senate it selfe: so that every man thought, and faid, that Cato had added vnto the Quæftorship the dignitic of the Consulship. For finding diverse men indebted before vnto the commonwealth, and the commonwealth also vnto divers men, he fet downe such an order, that neither the commonwealth should be deceived by any man, nor that any man also should have wrong of it. For being rough with them that were indebted to the chamber, he compelled them to pay their debt, & willingly and quickly also paid them to whom the chamber ought any thing: fo that the people were ashamed to see some pay which neuer thought to have paid any thing; and on the contrary fide also others paid, which neuer looked to haue had any part of their debts paid them. Furthermore, diuers men did before make false bils of their debts, and brought them so to be put into the coffer of the Quæstors; and many times also his predecessors were wont of fauor & friendship to receive false messages. But whileft he was Quaftor, he neuer did paffe away matter fo lightly. For one day, he being doubtfull of a message that was sent vnto him, to know whether it was true or no albeit diuers men did witnesse it was true, yet wold he not beleeue it, vntill such time as the Consuls themselves came in their owne persons to instificit was true, and to sweare, that it was so ordained. Now there were many vnto whom Lucius Sylla (being Dictator) had appointed in his fecond profeription twelue thousand filuer Drachmaes for every citizen and outlaw which they had flain with their owne hands. These men, though every mandid hatethem, and knew them to be wicked people and cruell murtherers, yet no man durst offer to be reuenged of them. Cato called these men reserved of Still actions in fuite, as those that did wrong fully detaine the mony of the common treasure, and compelled d) marther. them to repay it backe againe: sharply reprouing (and inftly) the wicked diucilish fact they had committed.

committed. So when they had repayed the money, they were straight accused by others for murder; and as if they had bene wrongfully condemned by one judgement, they were brought into another, to the great joy of all the Romains, who then thought they faw all the tyranny of that time rooted out, and sylla himfelfe punished. Besides all this, Catoes continual paines and care of the treasure, was so well thought of and liked of the people as could be. For he was alwaves the first that came to the coffer of the treasurers, and also the last that went from thence. and was neuer weary of any paines. Furthermore, he neuer missed to be at any assembly of the people, or Senate, fearing, and being alwayes carefull, left lightly by fauour, any money due to the commonwealth should be forgiven, or else that they should above the rent of the farmers, orthatthey should give no money but to them that had justly deserved it. Thus having rid all accusers, and also filled the coffers with treasure, he made men see that the commonwealth might be rich without oppressing of any man. Indeed at his first coming into the office, his colleagues and companions found him maruellous trouble fome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and feuere: howbeit they all loued him in the end; because he onely withftood the complaints and cries of all menagainst them (which complained that they would not for any mans respect or fauour letgo the mony of the common treasure,) and was contented his companions should excuse themselves vnto their friends that were importunate, and lay the fault voon him, faying, that it was unpossible for them to bring Cate unto it. The last day that he went out of his office, being very honourably brought home to his house by the people, it was told him that Marcellus being in the treasure chamber, was attempted and environed with many of his friends, and men of great authoritie, that were earneftly in hand with him to record a certaine fumme of mony, as a thing that had bin due by the commonwealth. This Marcellus had bene Catoes friend even from their childhood, and whilest Cato was in office, he did orderly execute his office with him; but when he was left alone, he was of fo gentle a nature. that he would eafily be entreated, and was as much assamed to denie any man, as he was also ouer-readie to grant enery manthathe required. Case ftraight returned backe vponit, and finding that Marcellus had yeelded vnto their importunacie, and recorded the gift, he caused the bookes to be brought vnto him, and did raze it out before his face, Marcellus speaking neuer a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and neuer once repined sgainst that he had done, neither then, nor at any time after, but continued fill in friendship with him. as he had done before. But now though Cato was out of his office of Questor, he was not without spials of his men in the treasure chamber, who marked alwayes, and wrote what was done and meand passed in the treasury. And Cato himselfe having bought the bookes of account for the fumme of fine talents, containing the revenew of the whole state of the commonwealth, from wealth, Syllaes time vntill the very yeare of his Quæstorship:he euer had them about him, and was the first man that came to the Senate, and the last that went out of it. There many times the Senators tarying long before they came, he went and fate downe in a corner by himfelf, and read closely the booke he had under his gowne, clapping his gowne before it, and would never be out of the citie on that day when he knew the Senate should assemble. After that, Pompey and his consorts perceiuing that it was vnpoffible to compell Cato, and much leffe to win or corrupt him, to fauor their vniust doings, they fought what meanes they could to keepe him from comming to the Senate, and defending certaine of his friends causes, and to occupie him some other wayes about matters of arbiterment. But Cate finding their wils and craft, to encounter them, he told his friends once for all, whom he would pleafure, that when the Senate did fit, no mans cause could make him be absent from thence. For he came not to serve the commonwealth to en- Catatrining rich himselfe as many did, neither for any glorie or reputation, nor yet at all aduenture; but and deerthat he had aduisedly chosen to serve the commonwealth, like a just and honest man, and thereforethought himselfe bound to be as carefull of his dutie, as the Bee working her waxe in the interest hony combe. For this respect therefore, to performe his dutie the better, by the meanes of monwealth, his friends which he had in every province belonging to the Empire of Rome, he got into his hands the copies of all the chiefest acts, edicts, decrees, sentences, and the notablest judgements of the governours that remained in record. Once Cato perceiving that Publius Clodius a seditions Orator amongst the people, did make great stirre, and accused diverse vnto the asfembly, as the Priests and Vestall Nunnes, among the which Fabia Terentia, Ciceroes wives si- Cato drawe ster was accused; hetaking their cause in hand, did so disgrace Clodius their accuser, that he of Rome.

was driven to flie the citie. Giver therefore giving Cato thankes, Cato told him, that he mine thankethe commonwealth, not him, for whose sake onely he both said and did that he had done. Hereby Cato wanne him great fame. For when a certaine Orator or common counfellor preferred one witnesse vnto the Judges, the counsellor on the other side told the, that one wirnesse was not to be credited, though it were Cato himself. Insomuch as the people tooke it up for a proughe among them, that when any man spake any strange and vnlikely matter, they would fay: Nay, though Cato himselfe saidit, yet were it not to be beleeved. When on a time a certaine prodigal man had made a long oration in the Senate, in praise & commendation of sobriety temperance, and thriftinesse, one Amnaus a Senator rising vp, said vnto him: Alas friend, what thinkest thou, who can abide to heare thee any longer with patience, that farest at thy tablelike Crassus, buildest like Lucullus, & speakest to vs like Cato: So men comonly (in sport) called them Catoes, which were graue and fenere in their words, and dissolute in their deeds. When divers of his friends were in hand with him to fue to be Tribune of the people, he told the hethought it not meete at that time: for such an office (quoth he) of so great authoritie as that, is not to be imploied, but like a firong medicine in time of need. So, the terme and matters of law ceaffing for that time, Cato went into the country of Lv c A to take his pleasure there, where he had pleasure there, where he had pleasure there is the country of Lv c A to take his pleasure there. fant houses, and tooke with him both his bookes and Philosophers to keepe him company. But meeting as he went, with divers fumpters and great cariage, and a great traine of men befides. he asked them whose cariage it was: they told him, it was Metellus Nepos that returned to Rome. to make suite to be Tribune. Therupon Cato stayed suddenly, and bethinking himself, commanded his men to returne backe againe. His friends maruelling at it, he answered them, Do not you know that Metellus is to be feared of himfelf, for his rashnesse and folly and now that he commeth inftructed by Pompey, like a lightning he would fet all the common-wealth on fire. for this cause therefore we must not now go take our pleasure in the country, but our come his folly, or otherwise die honourably in defence of our libertie. Yet at his friends perswass. ons he went first vnto his house in the countrey, and taried not long there, but returned straight againe to Rome. When he came thither ouer hight, the next morning betimes he went into the market place, and fued to be Tribune of the people, purposely to crosse Metellus enterprise, because the power and authoritie of the Tribune consisteth more in hindering then doing any thing: for if all men else were agreed of a matter, and that he onely were against it, the Tribune would carie from them all. Cato at the first had not many of his friends about him, but when they heard of his intent, why he made fuite for the Tribuneship, all his friends and Noblemen ftraight tooke part with him, confirmed his determination, and incouraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to ferue the common-wealth then his owne turne; confidering that where many times before he might (without refistance or denial) have obtained the same, the state being toward no trouble, he then would neuer sue for it, but now that he saw it in danger, where he was to fight for the commonwealth, and the protection of her liberty. It is reported that there were fuch a nuber of people about him to fauour his fuite, that he was like to haue bene stifled among them, and thought he should never have come to the market place, for the preasse of people that swarmed about him. Thus when he was chosen Tribune with Metellus and others, he perceived how they bought and fold the voices of the people when the Confuls were chosen: whereupon he made an oration, and sharply tooke them up for this detestable merchandife, & after his oration ended, folemnly protested by oath, that he wold accuse him, & bewray his name which had given mony to be chosen Consull. Howbeit he spake nothing of Syllanus, whose fifter Servilia he had maried but he flatly accused Lucius Murana, that had obtained to be Conful with Syllanus, by meanes of his mony. Now a law being prouided, that the party accused might haue a keeper or spiall to follow the accuser, to see what he would accuse the partie with that he might the better be able to defend himselfe, knowing what should be objected against him: Mur.ena hauing one for him to wait vpon Cato, to confider throughly what course he tooke, when he saw that he went not maliciously to work, but took a plaine common way of a just accuser, he had so great confidence in Catoes vpright mind and integrity, that not regarding the narrow fifting of him otherwise, he did one day aske him himself in the market place (or at home in his own house) if that day he were determined to prosecute any matter against him touching his accufation. If Cate answered him that he did not, then he went his way, & simply believed him. When the day came indeed that his cause was to be heard & pleaded vnto, Cicero being Consult that yeare, defending Murana, played fo pleasantly with the Stoicke Philosophers, and their strange opinions, that he made all the Iudges laugh: insomuch as Cato himselfe similing at him, rina a. told them that were by him: See we have a pleasant Consult that makes men laughthus. So gainst his Murana being discharged by this indgement, did neuer after malice Cato for that, but so long as to he remained Confull, he was alwayes ruled by his counfell in all his affaires, and continued euer to honour him, following his counfell in all things touching his office. Hereof Cats himfelfe was cause, who was neuer rough nor terrible, but in matters of counsell, & in his orations before the people, for the maintenance only of equity and inflice; for otherwise he was very civil and courteous to all men. But before he entred into his Tribuneship, Cicero being yet Conful he did help him in many things touching his office, but specially in bringing Catilines cospiracy to good end The confirm which was a noble act done of him. For Cariline did practife a generall commotion and firre in reconfict the commonwealth, to ouerthrow the whole state of Rome, by civil discord within Rome, and tiline aopen warres abroad who being discovered and overcome by Cicero, he was driven in the end to flie Rom E. But Lentulus, Cethegus, & many other of the accomplices of this conspiracie, blamed Catiline for his faint & cowardly proceeding in it. For their parts, they had determined to butne the whole citie of Rome, and to put all the Empire thereof in vprore, by strange warres, and rebellious forreine nations and provinces. Howbeit this treason being discovered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the matter was referred vnto the judgement of the Senate, to determine what was to be done therein. Syllanus being the first who was asked his opinion therein faid, that he thought it good they should suffer cruell paines; and after him also, all the rest said the like vntill it came to Casar. Casar being an excellent spoken man, and that rather defired to nourish then to quench any such stirres or feditions in the commonwealth, being fit for hispurpose long determined of, made an Oration full of sweete pleasant words, declaring vnto them, that to put such men as they to death without lawfull condemnation, he thought it altogether vnreasonable and rather that they should do better to keepe them in prison. This oration of C. far fo altered all the rest of the Senators minds for that they were afraid of the people, that Syllanus felfe mended his opinion againe, and faid, that he meant not they should put them to death, but keepe them fast in prison, because that to be a prisoner, was the greatest paine a Ro-MAINE citizen could abide. Thus the Senators minds being fo fuddenly changed, and bentto a more fauorable fentence, Cato rifing vp to fay his opinion, began very angrily with maruellous Catostorie cloquence, grienously to reproue Syllanus for changing his mind, and sharply to take up Cafar, tion again, that under a popular femblance, and maske of fweet fugred words, he fought under hand to dethroy the commonwealth, and also to terrifie and make the Senare afraid: where he himselfe lines conshould have bene afraid, and thinke himselfe happie, if he could scape from being suspected, gi- sprase. uing such apparent cause of suspition as he did, going about so openly to take the enemies and traitors of the commonwealth out of the hands of inftice, feeming to have no piric nor compassion of his naturall citie, of such nobilitie and same, being euen brought in maner to vtter deftruction, but rather to lament the fortune of these wicked men, that it was pitie they were ener borne, and whose death preserved Rome from a thousand murthers, & mischiefes. Of all the O. rations that ever Cato made, that only was kept; for Cicero the Conful, that day had dispersed diuers pen men in fundry places of the Senate house, which had maruellous swift hands, and had further taught them how to make briefe notes and abridgements, which in few lines shewed many words. For vntill that time, writers were not known that could by figures and ciphers expressea whole sentence and word, as afterwards they could, being then the first time that euer taught the they were found out. So Cato at that time prevailed against Cafar, and made them al change their how to minds againe, that these men were put to death. But that we may not leaue out a iot of his manners, as the very paterne and impression of his mind: it is reported, that when Cato that day was To hote and vehement against C.esar, that all the Senate could but looke at them, to heare them both, a letter was deliuered Cafar, fent him into the house. Cato began presently to suspect it, and fo earnestly misliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commanded his letter should be seene and read openly. Casar therupon reached his letter vnto Cato, that sate not farre from him. When Cato had read it, and found that it was a loue letter, which his lifter Seruilia, had written vnto Cafar, whom she loued, and had knowne, he cast it agains to Cafar, and said, There drunkard. After that he went on againe with his matter, which he had begun before. In cate ruforfine, it seemeth that Cato was very vnfortunate in his wives: for this Sernilia, as we have said, tunatein his wives.

had an il name by Cafar. And the other Seruilia alfo, which was his fifter, was worse defanied for she being maried vnto Lucullus, one of the greatest men of Rome, by whom she had a sonne, was in the end put away from him, for her naughtie life. But worst of all, his owne wife Attilia also was not altogether cleare without suspition for though he had two sons by her, yet he was dring to be divorced from her, she was so naught and comon. After that, he maried Martia, the daughter of Philip, which by report feemed to be a very honest gentlewoman It is she that is so famous among the ROMAINS. For in the life of Cato, this place (as a fable or comedie) is disputable, and hard to be judged. For thus it was, as Thraseas writeth, who referreth all to the report & credite of one Munatius, Catoes very familiar friend. Among many that loued Catoes vertues and had them in admiration, some of them did shew more what he was, then other some did: amongst the which was Q. Hortensius a man of great honestie and authoritie. He desiring not onely to be Catoes friend & familiar, but also to joyne with him in alliance, and by affinitie to make both their houses one, was not abashed to move him to let him have his daughter Porcia in mariage (which was Bibulus wife, and had brought him two children) that he might also caltabroad the feed of goodly children, in that pleafant fertile ground. And though to men this might feeme a strange minde and defire, yet that in respect of nature, it was both honest and profitable to the common wealth, not to suffer a young woman in the prime of her youth to lose the fruite of her wombe, being apt to beare children: nor also that he should impour ish his some in law with moe children then one house needed. And further, that communicating women in this loreship and fort from one to another, specially being bestowed upon worthy and vertuousmen, that vertue should thereby be increased the more, being so dispersed in divers families; and the citic likewife should be the stronger, by making alliances in this fort together. And if it be so quoth he. that Bibulus do loue his wife fo dearly, that he will not depart from her altogether, then that he would restore her to him againe when he had a child by her, that thereby he might be the more bound in friendship to him, by meanes of this communication of children with Bibulus felfe, and with him. Cato answered him, that he loued Hortensius well, and liked of his alliance, howbeit that he maruelled he would speake to him to let him haue his daughter to get children of, fith he knew that she was maried to another. Then Hortensias altering his tale, stuck not total him his mind plainly, and to defire his wife of him, the which was yet a young woman, and Cato had children enough. But a man cannot tell whether Hortenfius made this fuite, because he say Cate make no reckoning of Martia, for that the was then with child by him. In fine, Cate feeing the earnest desire of Hortensius, he did not deny him her, but told him, that he must also get Philips goodwill, the father of Maria. He knowing that Cato had granted his goodwill, would not therefore let him haue his daughter before that Cato himfelfe by his presence did confirme the contract and mariage with him. Though these things were done long after, yet having occasion to talke of Catoes wines. I thought it not amisse to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus and his conforts of Catilines conspiracie being put to death, Cafar to cloake the accusations wherewith Cate charged him in open Senate, did put himfelfe into the peoples hands; and gathering the rakehels & seditious persons together, which sought to set all at fixe and seuen, he did further encourage them in their mischieuous intent and practises. Whereupon, Cato searing lest such a rabble of people should put all the commonwealth in vprore and danger, he perswaded the Senate to winne the poore needie people that had nothing, by distributing of corne amongst them, the which was done; and the charge thereof amounted yearely vnto twelve hundred and fiftie talents. This liberalitie did manifestly drinke vp and quench all those troubles which they stood in feare of .But on the other fide, Metellus entring into his Tribuneship, made certaine seditious Orations & affemblies, and preferred a law to the people, that Pompey the great should presently be called into ITALY with his armie, that he should keepe the citie by his comming from the present danger of Catilines conspiracie. These were but words spoken for fashions sake, but indeed the law had a secret meaning, to put the whole commonwealth and Empire of Rome into Pompeys hands. Hereupon the Senate affembled, wherein Cato at his first comming spake somewhat gently, and not too vehemently against Metellus, as his maner was to be sharpe vnto them that were against him:but modestly perswaded him, & felto intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his house, for that they had alwayes taken part with the Senate and Nobilitie. But Merellus therewith tooke fuch pride and conceit of himselfe, that he began to despise Caro, thinking he had vsed that mildnesse, as though he had bene afraid of him: in so much as he gaue out

broudspeeches against him, and cruell threats, that in despite of the Senate he would do that cato rest which he had vndertaken. Then Cato changing his countenance, his voice and speech, after he stilles trihad spoken very sharply against him, in the end he roughly protested, that while he lived, he bone of the would never fuffer Pompey to come into Rome with his armic. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both wel in their wits, but that Metellus doings was a fury, which proceeding of a cancred stomacke and extreme malice, would put all in hazard: and that which Cato did. was a rauishment and extasse of his vertue, that made him beside himselfe, contending for iuflice and equitie. When the day came that this law should passe by voices of the people, Metellus failed not to be in the market place with a world of strangers, slaues, and fencers, armed, and fet in battell ray, besides a number of the common people that were desirous to see Pompeys returne, hoping after change. Besides all those, Casar then being Prætor, gaue aide likewise with his Inline Cas men, in the behalfe of Metellus. On the contrary part also, the Noblemen and Senators of the far Prator. citie were as angry as Cato, and faid, it was a horrible shame: howbeit they were his friends, rather in missiking the matter, then in defending the common wealth. Whereupon, all his friends athome, and his whole family, were maruelloufly perplexed and forowfull, that they both refused their meate, and also could take no rest in the night for seare of Cato. But he, as one without feare, having a good heart with him, did comfort his people, and bade them not forow for him: and after he had supped (as he commonly vsed to do) he went to bed, and slept soundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his colleague and fellow Tribune, came and called him. So they both went together into the market place, accompanied with a very few after them. Whereupon divers of their friends came and metthem by the way, and bad them take heedevoto themselues. When they were come into the market place, and that Cato saw the temple of Caftor and Pollux full of armed men, and the degrees or steps kept by sword players and fencers, and Mesellus on the top of them fet by Cafar : turning to his friends, he faid, See I pray you the coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, against one man naked and vnarmed. Therewithall he straight went forward with his companion Thermus vntothatplace, and they that kept the degrees, opened of themselves tolet him passe, but they would let no other go vp but himselse: but Cato with muchado, taking Minutius by the Carestrable hand, got him vp with him; and when he was come vp, he fet him downe betwixt Metellus centrage & and Cafar, to keepethem afunder, that they should not whisper one in anothers earc. Neither of them both could tell what to fay to him: whereupon the Noblemen that confidered Catees countenance and boldnesse, wondring to see it, drew neare, and by their cries willed him not to be afraid, but incouraged one another to slicke by him that stood for defence of their libertie. So, there was a fernant that tooke the written law in his hand, and would have read it to the people, but Cato would not lethim. Then Metellus tooke it himselfe in his hands to reade it, but Cate also snatched it out of his hands. Metellus not with standing, having it perfect without booke, would needs declare the effect of it by heart. But Thermus clapped his hand before his mouth to keepe him that he should not speake. Metellus seeing these two menbent by all meanes to keepe this law from passing, and that the people did leane on their side, he beckned to his mento go for the armed men which were at home in his house, that they should come with terrour and cries to make them afraid, and so they did. The people thereupon were difperfed here and there for feare, that Cato was left alone in the market place, and they threw stones at him from beneath. But then Murana, who had before accused Cato for buying of the Consulship, forfookehim not in that danger, but holding his long gowne before him, cried out vnto them beneath that threw at Cato, to leaue. So shewing him the danger he had brought himselfe vnto, holding him still by the armes, he brought him into the temple of Castor and Follux. Then Metellus seeing the pulpit for Orations voided, and his enemies flying out of the market place, he thought he had wonne the goale: whereupon commanding his fouldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to passe his law. But his enemics that fled for feare, being gathered against ogether in the market place, began afreshto crie out against Metellau, with greater boldnesse and courage then before. Then Metellus and his adherents being afraid and amazed, doubting that their enemies had gotten weapons, and were prouided, and therefore were the bolder, they fled, and all of them left the pulpit for Orations. So when Metellus and his company were gone, Cato came againe to the pulpit for Orations, and greatly commended the people for the good wil they had shewed, and perswaded them to continue in their well

CATO VTICAN. doing. Whereupon the common people were then against Metellus; and the Senatealso being affembled gaue order, that Cato should have better aide then he had before, and that by all meanes possible they should resist Metellus law, which onely tended to moue sedition and civill war in Rome. For Metellus selfe, he was yet vehemently bent to follow his attempt and enterprise; but perceiuing that his friends were maruellously affraid of Cato, as a man whom they thought inuincible, he suddenly came into the market place, and affembling the people, told them many reasons in his oration, supposing to bring cate in difgrace with the people; and amongst other things hesaid, that he would withdraw himselfe out of this tyrannicall power of Catoes, and his confpiracie against Pompey, the which peraduenture the citie before it were long should repent, for that they had shamed and defaced so noble a man. After that he presently de. parted Rome, and went into Asia to informe Pompey of all this matter. Cato on the other fide, was greatly effected for his doings, for that he had freed the common wealth from the great trouble of fuch a foolish Tribune, and by ouerthrowing Metellus, he had also suppresfed the power of Pompey. But yet he was much more commended, when he was against the Senate, who would have noted Metellus of infamie, and deprined him of his office, the which he would not fuffer them to do. The common people thought him of a courteous and gentle nature, because he would not tread his enemie vinder his foote, when he had the vpper band of him, nor be reuenged of him when he had ouercome him: but wife men judged it otherwise, that it was wisely done of him not to prouoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucullus from the warve, of the which it feemed that Pompey had taken the honor and glory from him for the ending of it, and was likely also to have bene put from his honour of triumph, for that Cains Memmius was his aduerfary, who laid many accufations egainst him before the people, ratherto please Pompey, then for any malice else he had towards him. But Cato, both for that Lucullus was his brother in law, and had maried his owne fifter Servilia, as also for that he saw they did him wrong, refifted this Memmins, and defended many accufations against him. So that in the end, though Memmius had laboured that Cato should be deprived of his office, as from a tyrannical power, yet Cato copelled Memmius at the last to leaus off his accusations, & to prosecute law no more against him. Thus Lucullus having obtained honor of triumph, did embrace Catoes friend. ship more then before, taking him for a sure bulwarke and defence against the power of Pompey the great. But Pompey shortly after returning home again, with great honor from his conquests, trusting that for respect of his welcome he should be denied nothing at the peoples hands when he came home, sent before unto the Senate, to pray them for his sake to deferre the election of the Confuls, vntill hecame to Rome, that being present he might fauour Pises suite, suing to be Consul. Therunto the most part of the Senate gaue their consent, but cate on the other side was against it; not that the deferring of time was a matter of such importance, but to cut all hope fro Pompey to go about to attempt any new deuices: infomuch that he made the Senate change opinion againe, and Pompeys request was denied. Pompey being maruellously troubled withall, and perceining that Cato would be against him in all things, if he found not some deuice to win him, he fent for his friend Munatius, by his meanes to demand Catoes two necces of him which were mariable; y cldest for himself, & the yongest for his son. Others say also, that they were not his necces, but his own daughters. Munatius did Pompeys meffage, and brake the matter vnto him, his wife, and his fifters, who maruelloufly defired Pompeys alliance, for the greatnes & dignity of his person. But Cato making no further delay, without other deliberation, as not greatly pleased with the motion, answered him presently: Munatius, go thy way vnto Pompey againe, and tell him that Jethalliance Cato is not to be won by women, though otherwise I mislike not of his friendship : and withall, that folong as he shall deale vprightly in all causes, and none otherwise, he shall find him more affuredly his friend, then by any alliance of mariage; and yet, that to fatisfie Pompeyes pleafure and will against his country, he will neuer give him such pledges. The women and his friends at that time were angry with his answer and refusall, saying, it was too stately and vncourteous. But afterwards it chanced, that Pompey fuing to have one of his friends made Confull, he fent a great fumme of money to bribe the voyces of the people, which liberalitie was noted, and spoken of, because the mony was told in Pompeys owne garden. Then did Catotell the women of his house, that if he had now bene bound by alliance of mariage vnto Pompey, he should then haue bene driuen to haue bene partaker of Pompeys shamefull acts. When they heard what he had told them, they all confessed then that he was wifer to refuse such alliance, then they were

that wished and defired it. And yet, if men should judge of wisedome, by the successe and enent of things. I must needs fay, that Cato was in great fault for refusing of his alliance. For therby he was the cause of Pompeys matching with Casar, which iouncd both their powers together, was the whole destruction of the Empire of Rome: whereas peraduenture it had not fallen out so. if Cato fearing Pompeys light faults, had not caused him by increasing his power with another, to commit farre greater faults. Howbeit those things were yet to come. Furthermore, Pompey being at iarre with Lucullus, touched certaine ordinances which he had made in the Realme of Pontys, because both the one and the other would have their ordinances to take place, Cato favoured Lucullus, who had open wrong. Pompey therefore seeing that he was the weaker in the Senate, took part with the people, and put forth the law for deniding of the lands Les Arreamongst the fouldiers. But Cato floutly resisting that law againe, he put it by, and made Pompey via thereby in a ragero acquaint himselfe with Publius Clodius, the most seditious and boldest person of all the Tribunes; and befides that, made alliance even at that time with Cofar, whereof Cato himselfe was the onely author. Casar returning out of Spain B from his Prætorship, required the honour of triumph, and withall made fuite to be Confull. But being a law to the contrarie, that they that fued to be Confuls should be present themselves in the city, and such also as desired the honour of triumph, should be without the citie, he carneftly required the Senate, that he might fue for the Confulship by his friends. The most part of the Senat were willing vnto it, but Cato was flatly against it. He perceiuing that the other Senators were willing to gratifie Cefar, when it came to him to deliuer his opinion, he spent all the whole day in his Oration, and by this policy preuented the Senate, that they could not conclude any thing. Then Cafar letting fall his triumph, made fuite to be Confull, and entring the city, loyned friendship with Pom- The alliance pey. Hereupon he was chosen Consult, and immediatly after maried his daughter Iulia vnto hip betwas Pompey: and so having made in maner a conspiracie against the commonwealth betweene Casar and themselves, Casar preferred the law Agraria, for distributing the lands vnto the citizens, and Pemper. Pompey was present to maintaine the publication thereof. Lucullus and Cicero on the other side taking part with Bibulus the other Conful, did what they could againft it, but specially Catowho fearing much this alliance of C.e far and Pompey, that it was a pactand conspiracie to ouer throw the commonwealth, said, that he cared not so much for this law Agraria, as he feared the reward they looked for, who by fuch meanes did intice and please the common people. Therewithall, the Senate were wholly of his opinion, and so were many other honest men of the people befides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his part, maruelling much, and also being offended with Cafars great vnrcafonablenesse and importunitie, who by the authoritie of his Confulfhip did preferre such things, as the most feditionsest Tribunes of the people were wont commonly to do, to currie fauour with the people, and by fuch vile meanes fought to make them at his commandement. Wherefore, Cafar and his friends fearing fo great enemies, fell to open force. Forto begin withall, as the Confull Bibulus was going to the market place, there was a basket of dung powred vpon his head: and furthermore, the Officers rods were broken in their hands, which they caried before him. In fine, darts were throwne at them out of cuery corner, and many of them being hurt, they all at length were driven to flie, and leave the market place. But Cato, he came last of all, keeping his wonted place, and often cast backe his head, and curfed fuch citizens. So, they did not onely paffe this law Agraria by voyces of the people, but furthermore they added to it: that the Senate should be sworne to stablish that m law , and be bound to defend the same (if any attempted the alteration thereof) upon great penalties and fines to be fet on his head, that should refuse the oath. All the other Senatours fware against their wils, remembring the example of the mischiefe that chanced vnto the old Metellus, who was banished out of ITALY, because he would not sweare to such a like law. Whereupon, the women that were in Catoes house, belought him with the teares in their eyes, that he would yeeld and take the oath: and so did also dinerse of his friends besides. Howbeit, he that most inforced and brought Cato to sweare, was Cicero the Orator: who perswa- cicero by his ded him, that peraduenture he would be thought vnreasonable, that being but one man, Oration he should seeme to mislike that, which all other had thought meete and reasonable: and praye tathat it were a fond part of him wilfully to put himselfe in so great a danger, thinking to hinder a matter already past remedy. But yet that besides all this, a greater inconuenience would happen, if he forfooke his countrey (for whose sake he did all these things) and left it a prey, vnto them which fought the vtter subuersion of the same, as if he were glad to be rid from the trouble of defending the common-wealth. For (faid he) though Cate have no neede of Rome, yet Rome had neede of Cato, and so have all his friends: of the which, Cicero faid, he was the chiefe, and was most maliced of Publius Clodius the Tribune, who fought to drine him out of the countrey. It is faid that Cato being wonne by these like words and perswasions at home. and openly in the market place, they fo foftned him, that he came to take his oath last of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friend of his. Cafars heart being then life vp, for that he had brought his first purpose to passe he began now to preferre another law, to devide all CAMPA. NIA, and the countrey called TERRA DI LAVORO (the land of labour) vnto the poore needy people of Rome, and no man stood against him but Cato. Whereupon Casar made his officers to take him from the pulpit for Orations, to carie him to prison. All this made not Cato Stoupe. nor leaue his francke speech, but as he went he still spake against this edict, and perswaded the people to beware of them that preferred such lawes. All the Senate, and the best fort of citizens, followed Cato with heavie hearts, shewing by their filence that they were offended and angrie for the iniurie they did vnto him, being fo worthy aman. In fo much as Cafars felfe perceiued that the people were offended with it, and yet of ambition and stomacke, he looked alwayes when Cato would have appealed vnto the people. So when he faw that Cato meant no fuch matter, at length ouercome with shame and dishonour, he himselfe precured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeants. In fine, all Cafars practife tended to this end, that when he had wonne the peoples fanour by fuch lawes, they should then grant him the gouernment of all the GAVLES (as well on this fide, as beyond the mountaines) and all ILLYRIA, with an armie of four legions, for the space of fine yeares; not with standing that Cato told the people before, that they themselves with their own voyces did set up a tyrant, that one day would cut their throats. They did also chuse Publius Clodius Tribune of the people, which was of a noble house: a thing directly contrarie to the law. But this Clodius had promifed them, fo that they would helpe him to banish Cicero out of Rome, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calpharnius Pifo (Cafars wines father) and Gabinius Pauliss (a man wholly at Pompeys commandement, as they write which knew his life and manners) Confuls the next yeare following. Now notwith francing they had the rule of the commonwelth in their owne hands, and that they had wonne part of the citie with bribes, and the other part also with feare, yet they were both afraid of cate, when they considered what trouble they had to ouercome him; which they did very hardly not with standing, and to their great shame, being driuen to vse force, and yet thought they should neuer haue done. Furthermore, Clodius vtterly despaired that he could possibly banish Cicero, so long as Cato was there. So denisting waies how to do it, when he had taken possession of his office, he fent for Cato, and began to tell him, that he thought him the honestest and instest man of Rome, and that he was ready to performe itto him by deed. For, where many made fuite vnto him to be fent into Cyprvs, to make warre with king Ptolomy, he thought none so worthie as himselfe, and therefore for the good will he bare him, he was very willing to offer him that pleasure. Cato straight cried out with open mouth, that this was a denice to entrap him, not to pleasure him. Then Clodius proudly and fiercely answered him, Well, seeing thou wilt not go with good will, thou shalt go then against thy will; and so he did. For at the first assembly of the citie, he caused the people to grant his commission for his journey thither: but they neither appointed him ships, nor souldiers, nor any ministers to go with him, saving two Secretaries onely, of the which the one of them was a very villaine and arrent theefe, and the other one of Clodins followers. Befides all this, as if they had appointed him but little to do in Cyprvs against Ptolomy, he made them command him after that, to go and restore the outlawes and banished men of the citie of BIZANTIVM, vnto their countrey and goods againe, of purpose only to keepe Cato sarre inough from Rome, whilest he continued Tribune, Cato being driven by necessitie to obey, he counselled Cicero (whom Clodius pursued) to beware that he made no stirre against him, for seare of bringing Rome into civil warre and murther for his fake: but rather, to absent himselfe, that he might another time preserue his countrey. After that, he sent his friend Canidius before into Cy-PRVs, vnto Ptolomy, to perswade him to be quiet without warre: declaring vnto him, that he should neither lacke honour nor riches, for the Romaines would grant him the Priesthood of Venus in the citie of Paphos. Cato in the meane time remained in the Ile of Rhodes, preparing preparing himselfethere, and abiding his answer. In the time of these stirres, Prolonie king of Prolonie ÆGYPT, for a certaine offence and differd with his fibiects, departing out of ALEXANDRIA, ling of AE-EGYPT, for a certaine onence and dieord with his molecus, departing out of Alexandria, agent failed towards Rome, hoping that Cafar and Pompey with a great armie would reftore him to Tomo Cato. his Crowne and kingdome againe. He being defirous to see Cato, sent vnto him, supposing he would come at his fending for. Cato by chance was occupied at that time about some busineffe, and bad the meffenger will Ptolomie to come to him, if he would fee him. So when Ptolomie came, he neither went to meete him, nor rose vp vnto him, but onely welcomed him, and bad him fit downe. It amazed the king at the first, to see under so simple and meane atraine, such a statelinesse and maiestie in Catoes behauiour. But he heard him boldly talke with him of his affaires, and fuch grave talke come from him, reproving his folly he had committed, to forfake fuch princely pleasure and wealth, to go and subject himselfe vnto such dishonour, such extreame paines, and such passing great gifts and presents, as he should throwaway, to latisfie the concronfuesse of the rulers at Rome, the which was so vnsatiable, that if all the Realme of AGYPT were converted into filver to give among them, it would fearce suffice them: in respect whereof, he counselled him to returne backe with his nauie, and to reconcile himselfe againe with his subjects, offering himselfe also go with him, to helpe to make this peace. Then Ptolomie comming to himselfe, and repenting him of his folly. knowing that Cato told him truly, and wifely, he determined to follow his counfell, had not his friends turned his mind to the contrary. So when Ptolomie came to Rome, and was driuen to waite at the gates of the Magistrates that were in authoritie, he fighed then, and repented his folly, for that he had not onely despised the counsell of a wise man, but rather the Oracle of agod. Furthermore, the other Piolomie that was in Cyprys (a happy turne for Cato) poisoned himselse. Cato being also informed that he left a wonderfull summe of mony behind him, he determined to go himselfe vnto Byzantivm, and sent his nephew Brutus into Cyprvs, because hedurst not trust Canidius so farre. Then having restored the banished men vnto the peoples fauour againe, fetting agreement betwixt them, he returned into Cyprvs. There he found Caterdillia maruellous great treasure, and plate both of gold and silver, tables, precious stones, hangings, gence about and purple filkes, all the which he was to make ready money of. There he tooke great care and Coprus. paines to raife all things to the vtmost and dearest prices that could be, and he himselfe was presentatall, to keepe the reckening of the last penny. Wherefore, to bring this to passe, he would not fland to the common vse of the fale of the crier, but suspected them all, both criers, praifers, and his owne friends, and therefore talked himfelfe with the praifers, and made them fet high prifes vpon euery thing that was to be fold. And thus were the most part of their goods foldand cariet away, at the dearest prises. This did maruellously offend the most part of his friends, when they faw that he did mistrust them: but Munatius specially, his dearest friend, The ensie tooke it so inwardly, that he thought neuer to be friends with him againe. Infomuch as in between Cathe booke Cafar wrote against Cato, in this place he forceth most the accusation against him. Munatius notwithstanding writeth, that he was not angry so much with Cato for that he mistrusted him, but for a certaine disdaine he had himselfe of Cato, and for the emulation betwixt him, and Canidius. For Munatius wrote a booke of Catoes deeds and fayings, whom Thraseas in his history chiefly followed. In this booke he sheweth that he came late into Cyprvs, and was very ill lodged. And furthermore also, that when he would have come into Catoes house, they kept him out of the gates, for that Cato was busie, doing something with Canidius. He modefly complaining of it vnto Cato, had this churlish answer: Ouermuch loue (faith Theophrastus) oftentimes causeth hate. So fareth it with thee, who over louing me, doest thinke that love often-I efteeme thee not as thou deferueft, and therefore art angry with me. And for Canidius, I must imescantell thee truly, Ido rather employ him for his skil and faithfulnesse in things, then any man else, stib hate. for that he hartbeene with me from the beginning, and as farre as I learne, was neuer bribed, but cleane handed still. These words Cato told Munatius secretly betweene them two, but afterwards he knew that he had also reported them vinto Canidius. When he saw that, he would no more go and fup with Cato as he was wont; and when he was also called to counfell, he would not come there neither. Wherefore Cato threatned him, that he would feize vpon all his goods and cariage, as they vse to handle them that are disobedient vnto instice. This notwithstanding, Munatius cared not for it, buttooke sea, and returned againe to Rome, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Catoes wife, spake with him, and were both bidden to supper together vnto a friend of theirs called Barca. Thereupon Cata also arrived, and came thither when they were all set at supper, and asked where he should sit Barca told him againe, where it pleased him. Then casting his eyes about, he said, he would sit by Munatius: and so fetching a compasse about the boord, he went and sate by him, but offered him no friendship and familiarity al supper time. Afterwards notwithstanding, at the request of Martia, that was earnestly in hand with Cato for him, he wrote vnto him, and willed him to come and speake with him. Munatius went to Catoes house in the morning, where Martia stayed him. and kept him company, vntill all the rest that came to salute Cato were departed. Then Cato comming to him, embraced him in his armes, and made very much of him. We have the willinglier dilated this matter at length, because mens natures and maners might be discerned euen in these small matters of friendship prinatly, as otherwise in the greatest publike causes. Now touching Catoes commission, he got together little lesse then seuen thousand silver talents. Furthermore. Money got fearing the farnesse of the journey he had togo by sea, he made divers little coffers, and pur into every one of them two talents, and five hundred Drachmaes, and tied vnto each of them along rope, and a great peece of corke; because that if the shippe should fortune to miscaric, those corkes might shew where the chests with money lay in the bottome of the sea. Thus was all the money faued, fauing a litle, and brought fafely to Rome. Cato having made two bookes, wherein he had noted all things done in his journy, he could neither fauethe one nor the other of them. For one of his bondmen made free, called Philargyrus, tooke the one away; who taking ship at the hauen of CENCHRBES, was himselfe drowned, and the booke he had also, lost with him. The other book which he himself had kept vntil he came to Cor Fov, he lying in the market place of the citie in his tents which he caused to be set vp; the mariners being very cold in the night, made so great a fire, that it burnt the tents, stuffe, booke and all. Notwithstanding, he brought certaine of the late king Ptolomies flaues with him, who while he lived, had the charge and custodic of all his treasure and riches, the which he brought as witnesses to stop the mouthes of his malicious enemies, that would have accused him in any thing. But yet the losse of the did grieue him, not so much for the great care and paines he had taken in setting downe the account of his charge, for the inftification and proofe of his fidelity and good feruice; but also for that they might have ferued for a good memoriall and example vnto all others, to have bene a like careful in their charge, as himself. But the gods denied him this good hap. Newes being brought that he was come to Rome by water; when they understood that he was at hand, by and by althe Magistrates, the Priests, the Senate, and the most part of the people also went out to meete him by the rivers fide: so that both fides of the river of Tyber were full of people, and the receiving of him in, seemed not inferour to the entry of a triumph. Notwithstanding, some thought him very prefumptuous, that the Confuls and Prætors comming out to meet him, he did not stay his gally, but rowed still vpthe streame(being in a kings gally of fixe oares to euery banke) and neucr frayed, untill all his fleete arrived in the hauen. This notwith standing, when the coffers with money were caried through the market place into the treasure chamber, the people wondered to see so great a quantitie of it. And thereupon the Senate being assembled, with great and honourable words they gaue Cato an extraordinary Prætorship, and priviledge also, at any common sports to weare a purple gowne. Cato refused all these honours, and only befought the Senate to make Nicias a freeman, Steward of the late deceassed king Ptolomy, being a witnesse of his faith & great paines he had taken in this service. Philip the father of Martia, was that yeare Confull, so that after a fort, the authoritie of the Conful was in Cato: because Lentulus, colleague and fellow Confull with Philip, did no leffe reuerence Cato for his vertues, then Philip did for his alliance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was restored againe from his banishment, the which Publius Clodius (being then Tribune of the people) had put vpon him, and being againe growne to great credite, he went one day into the Capitoll, in the absence of Clodius, by force to take away the tables which Clodius had confecrated there, in the which were comprised all his doings during the time he was Tribune. Thereupon the Senate being affembled, Clodius did accuse Cicero of this violent fact. Cicero answered him againe, that because Clodius was chosen Tribune, directly against the law, therefore all his doings were voide, and of no validitie. Then stood vp Cato, and said, he knew that all that which Clodius did when he was Tribune, was feantly good and allowable; but yet if generally any man should vndo all that he had passed by that authoritie, then all that he himselfe had done likewise in Cyprys, must of necessitie de renoked. For the commission that was granted vnto him (by vertue whereof he had done many things) should be valuawfull: becaute the Tribune also that did grant it him, was not lawfully chosen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune against the law, who by confent of the law was taken out from a noble house, and made a popular perfonthowbeit, if he had behaued himfelte vidurifully in his office, as other men that hapiy had offended, then he was to be accused to make him mend his fault, and not to destroy the authoritie of the officer, which in it felf was lawfull. After that, there fell misliking betwixt Cicero and Gue, for this counterbuffe he had given him: and Cicero continued a long time after, before he did shew him any countenance of friendship as he had at other times done. But afterwards they were reconciled together againe, by this occasion. Pempey and Crassus having bene with Casar to talke with him (who for that purpose came out of GAVIE beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demand the second Confulship together, and when they had it, then to proroge Gafars gouernment for five yeares more; and also they would have the best provinces and greatest for themselves, with great armies, and money inough to pay them with. This was indeed a plaine conspiracie to denide the Empire of Rome between them, and viterly to ouerthrow the state of the commonwealth. At that time there were many Noble men. which came to make fuite for the Confulship. But when they saw Pompey and Crassus offer to make fuite for it, all the rest gaue over, but Lucius Domitius that had maried Porcia, Catoes fister: through whose perswasion he would not replenish his suite, considering that it was not the office onely of the Confulfhip that was the chiefest matter of importance, but the libertic of the Senate & people. Straight there ran a rumor through the most part of the people, that they were not to fuffer Pompeys power to be joyned with Craffus, by meanes of his office: for then his authoritie would be too great and strong, and therefore, that of necessitie one of these two were to be denied. For this cause therefore, the good men tooke Domitius part, and did encourage him rogo on with his fuire, affuring him of aide underhand of diuerfe, which durft not be seene openly for feare of those two great men, who at the day of the election wold procure him voices in his fauour. Pompey and Crassus wistrusting this, made Domitius be set vpon, going with torchlight before day into the field of Mars, where the election was alwayes made: and first striking the torch bearer that went before him, they hurt him fo fore, that he fell down dead at his feete. Then they laid at the rest in like case, who finding themselves cruelly hurt, ran away every man of them, and left Domitius and Cate post alone. But Cate notwithstanding he was hurr in one of his armes, stil held Damitius fast, and prayed him to tary, and not to leave to defend the liberty of their countrey, against tyrants, which plainly shewed after what manner they would gouerne, fith by fuch wicked meanes they aspired to tyrannicall gouernment. All this not with standing, Domitius would tary no longer, but betooke him to his legs, and ranne home. Thus were Craffusand Pompey without deniall proclaimed Confuls. Cato neuer yeelded therfore, but came and fued to be Prætor, because that thereby he might yet make it some strength and countenance to him against their Consulship, that being no private person, he should have some better authoritie to refift them that were the chiefest persons. But they fearing, that the Pratorship by Frator. the estimation of Cate, would come to equal their authoritie of the Consulship, first assembled the Senate (the most part of the Senators not hearing of it,) and in that assembly caused the Senate to decree: that all fuch as were chosen Prætors, should presently go to their charge, not attending the time and liberty appointed by the law, during which time men might accure those which had bought the voices of the people with money. Then having by this colour and decree set ill doers at libertie, without seare of punishment, they pretended to vie corruption, did preferre some of their owne ministers to make suite for the Prætorship, themselves giving money to corrupt the people, and being presentalso at the election. But not with standing all these practises, the vertue and reputation of Gato ouercame them. For the people had him in so great reverence, that they thought it too shamefull a part to sell Cata by voyces, who deserued rather to be hired to take the Prætorship vpon him. Then the first Tribe being called to give their voyces, declared him Prætor. Pompey feeing that, straight brake off the assembly, making a shamefull lie, telling that he had heard it thunder: the which the ROMAINES do maruellously detest, and will conclude nothing when it thundreth. Howbeit afterwards catoful hy they gaue more money then they had done before, and thereby draue away the chiefest men the Prator out of the sield of Mars; and by practife obtained, that Vatinius was chosen Prætor for Cato.

And the report went, that they that had fo wickedly given their voyces, feeling thefelues pricked in conscience, fled immediatly out of the field: and the honest men that remained, were both very fory and angry, for the injurie they had offered Cato. At that time one of the Tribunes keeping an affembly of the citie, Cato flood vp, and told (as if he had prophecied) before them all what would happen to the commonwealth by these practisers, and stirred up the people against Pompey and C. elar, faying that they were guiltie of those things, and therefore procured them to be done, because they were afraid that if Cato had bene Prætor, he would too narrowly have fifted out their deuices. In fine, Cate going home to his house, had more company to waite voon him alone, then all the other Prætors that had beene chosen. When Caius Trebonius, Tribune of the people, had preferred a law for the deuiding of the provinces vnto the new Confuls, SPAINR and Africk E vnto the one, and Algypt and Syria vnto the other, with full power to make warre as they thought good both by fea and land; all other men having no hope to keep it back. did let it alone, and ipake nothing to contrarieit. Then Cato getting vp into the pulpit for Orations, before the people began to give their voices, could hardly have two houres space to speak. propines of but at length, they perceiving, that he delayed time by foretelling things to come, would fuffer Pomper & him to speake no longer, but sent a Sergeant to him, and plucked him by force out of the pulpir. But when he was beneath, and cried out notwithstanding, and diverse gave goodcare vnto him: the Sergeant went to him againe, and tooke him, and caried him out of the market place. Howbeit the officer had no fooner left him, but he went straight towards the pulpit for Orations. and there cried out more vehemently then before, and willed the people to have an eye to aide the libertic of their common-wealth, which went to ruine. When he often times together did this, Trebonius the Tribune being mad withall, commanded his Sergeant to carie him to prifora The people followed him hard notwithstanding, to heare what he said vnto them. Whereupon Trebonius fearing some stirre, was forced to command his Sergeant to let Catogo, So Cato draue offall that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithstanding, the contraricfaction having partly put the ROMAINES in feare, and womethe other part allo by faire words and money, and by force of armes likewife kept Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from coming out of the Senate, and after they had also violently driven Cato out of the market place, for faying that it thundred : and having hurt many men, and also slaine some out of hand in the market place, in the end they forcibly passed the decree by voices of the people. Many being offended therewith, a company of them went together to plucke downe Pompeyes images: but Cate would not fuffer them. And afterwards also, when they preferred another law for the prorogation of the provinces & armies which Cafar demanded, Cato would speake no more to the people to hinder it, but protested vnto Pompey himselfe, that he saw not how he plucked Cafar vpon him, and that he should feele the weight of his force before he looked for it; and then when he could neither fuffer nor remedie it, he would even cast his burthen and himselfe vpon the common-wealth, and too late would remember Catoes warnings, which were prinarly as profitable for Pompey, as openly iust and reasonable for the common-wealth. Cato vsed many of these perfwasions fundrie times vnto him, but Pompey neuer made account of them: for he would not be perswaded that Casar would ever change in that fort, and besides he trusted too much to his owne power and prosperitie. Furthermore, Cato was chosen Prator for the next yeare following, in the which it appeared (though he ministred instice vprightly) that he rather defaced and impaired the maiestie and dignitie of his office, then that he gaue it grace and countenance by his doings: for he would oftentimes go on foot bare-legged, and without any coate, vnto his Prætors chaire, and there giue sentence of life and death, otherwhiles on men of great account. And fome report, that he would give audience when he had dined, and drunke wine: but this is vntrue. Now Cato perceiuing that the citizens of Rome were marred by bribes and gifts of those which aspired vnto offices, and that the people made an art and faculty to gaine by: to roote this vice altogether out of the common-wealth, he perswaded the Senate to make a law, that fuch as hereafter should be chosen Consuls or Prætors, should (if there were no man to accuse them) come and offer themselues before the Judges, and taking their oath, should truly declare what meanes they had vsed to attaine to their office. This offended the suiters for the for many. offices, but much more the mercenarie multitude. Whereupon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his audience, & all cried out vpon him, reuiled him, & threw stones at him infomuch as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, and himselfe also was driven out of the place by the prease of the people, and had much ado to get to the pulpit for Orations, where standing on his fecte, he presently pacified the tumult of the people, by the boldneffe and constance of his countenance onely. Then when all was pacified by the present perfwafions he vied, aprly spoken to purpose for the instant, they giving attentive care, without flir or vprore; the Senate giving him great commendation therefore, he told them roundly and plainly: but I have no cause to praise you, to leave a Prætor in such danger of his life, offering no aide to helpe him. But the fuiters for the offices, they werein a maruellous case: for one way, they were afraid to give mony to buy the peoples voices; and on the other fide, they were afraid also if any other did it, that they should go without their suite. So they were all agreed together; cuery man to put downe twelve Myriades and a halfe a peece, and then they should make their fuite inftly and vprightly: and who focuer were taken faultie, and that had otherwise made his way by corruption, that he should lose the money he had layed downe. This agreement being concluded betweene them, they chofe Cato (as it is reported) for their arbitrator, and keeper of all the same money. This match was made in Catoes house, where they all did put in caution or fureties to answer the money: the which he tooke, but would not meddle with the money. The day being come, Cate affilting the Tribunes that gouerned the election, and carefully marking how they did give their voices, he spied one of the suiters for the office breake the accord agreed vpon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture vnto the rest: But they greatly commending his instice and integritie, forgane the forseiture, thinking it punishment enough vnto him that had forfeited, to be condemned by Cato. But thereby Cato procured himself the displeasure of the other Senators, for that he feemed therein to take vpon him the power and authoritie ouer the whole court and election. For there is no vertue, whereof the honour and credite doth procure more enuic then inflice doth, because the people do commonly respect and retierence The power that more then any other. For they do not honour them as they do valiant men, nor haue them of suffice. in admiration as they do wife men, but they love and trust them better. As for the two first, the one they are afraid of, and the other they diffruit : befide, they suppose that valiancie and wifedome commeth rather by the benefite of nature then of our intent & choise, esteeming wisedome as a readinesse of conceir; and fortitude, a presence and courage of the mind. For energy man may be just that will, and therefore injustice is of all other vices most shamefull; for it is a wilfulland malicious default, and therefore cannot be excused. Lo, this was the cause why all the Noblemen in manner were against Cato, as though he onely had ouercome them. Pompey thought that the estimation of Cato was altogether the discountenance of his power and greatnesse, and therefore did dayly rife vp many railers against him. Of them Publins Elodius that seditious Tribune, who was againe fallen in friendship with Pompey, he accused Cato, and cried out vpon him, how he had robbed the common-wealth of a wonderfull treasure by his commission in Cypros : and that he was enemie vnto Pompey, because he did refuse to marie his daughter. Caso thereto made answer, that he had brought more gold and filter out of Cyprys into the treasure of Rome, without the allowance of either horse or souldier, then Pompey had done with all his triumphs and warres, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreouer, that he did neuer feeke alliance with Pompey, nor that he thought him vnworthy of it. but because he saw he dealt not as vprightly in the commonwealth as he himselfe did. I (said he) haue refused a province offered me when I came out of my Prætorship: but Pompey hath taken force by force, and given away vnto others. And to conclude, he lent Cafar not long fince, an armie of fixe thousand men to serue him in the warres of GAV LE: the which he neuer required of vs, nor Pompey granted them him by our consent. But we see, that so many armies, armours and weapons, so many men and horses by common pleasures of our private citizens, given and Icnt at our charge and Pompey himselfe reserving onely the name of Emperour, and Lieutenant generall, affigneth ouer his armies and provinces to the government of others, whilest he himselfe besiegeth here the walls of the citie, with seditions and tumultuous election of officers, craftily undermining thereby the state of the commonwealth, to bring all to confusion, that he himselfe might be absolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he reuenged of Pompey. Among Catoes friends, he had one called Marcus Faonius, fuch a one as Apollodorus PHALERIAN Was faid M Faonius to be in old time vnto Socrates, who did counterfeit to be another himselfe, in doing all things Catoes as he did. This man wold be farre out of reason, and passionate in his talke, storming like a drun- friend. kard. He one yeare made suite to be Ædilis, but he was reiected. Howbeit Caro that furthered his fuite, marked, that the tables wherein the voyces were written, were all one hand. So he finding out the falshood, appealed thereupon vnto the Tribunes, and made the election voide for that time. After that Faorius was created Ædilis, Cato did helpe him forth in all the other charges of his office, & specially in setting forth plaies in the Theater, which are accustomably done at the comming in of enery fuch new officer, to give the people pastime; and gave vnto the common players and dancers in those playes, no golden crownes, as other Ædiles did, but crownes of wilde olive twigges, as they comonly vie in GRECE at the Olympian games. And whereothers gaue vnto the poore rich gifts, he gaue the GRECIANS leckes, lettiles, radiffies, and peares. and vnto the Romains, they had earthen pots full of wine, porke, figges, cucumbers, and fagots of wood of small value. Insomuch as some thought scorne of them they were so meane.o. thers were very glad of them, feeing that Cato which was feuere and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by little and little they turned this aufteritie of his into pleasure. In fine, Faonius himfelfe fitting down amongst the people, which looked vpon the playes, clapped his hands for iov at Cato, and cried out to him, that he should give them good rewards that played well; alluring them also about him to do the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole ruler of those sports. At the selfe same time, Curio, Facious colleague and companion in the office of Adilis, had likewife goodly playes in another Theater; but all the people for fooke his, and went to fee Faorius playes, who fate among them like a private man, and Calo as the mafter of the playes. Cato did this in fcorne and mockery of vaine charge and expences, which men are wont to beflow in fuch trifles, shewing thereby, that who focuer will make any playes, he should make the charge but a sport also, furnishing it only with a conucnient grace, but with no vaine expendeor charge about lucha trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypfeus and Milo, fued all three together to be Confuls, not onely by briberic of money (a common fault then in fuing for any of the offices in the commonwealth) but by plaine force of armes, flaying and killing as in a cinill ware. they were fo desperate and infolent : some preferred a law, that they should make Pompey Prefident in these elections, because men should move their suite after a lawful fort, But Cato straight was against it, saying that the law could have no safetic by Pompey, but Pompey might have safetic by the law. Notwithstanding, when he saw this trouble continue of a long time without any Confuls in Rome, and that daily there were three camps in the market place, that it was almost impossible to preuent the mischiefe at hand, and to stay that it should go no further: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their owne goodwils, rather then by compulfion, should put the government of the state into Pompeys hands alone, chusing the lesser cuill, to with stand the greater, and so to yeeld to the absolute government withour constraint, which the sedition would bring it vnto. Therefore Bibulus, Catoes friend and kinfman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would chuse Pompey sole Consult: For, said he, either the commonwealth shall be well gouerned by him, or elfe Rom & shall serve an ill Lord. Cate then rising vo, beyond all mens expectation confirmed Bibulus opinion, and faid, that the citie were better to have one foueraigne Magistrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could give present order for the pacifying of this confusion, and that he would be carefull to preserve the citie, when he saw that they trusted him with the gouernment thereof. Thus was Pompey by Catoes meanes chosen fole Confull. Then he fent for Cato to come to his gardens to him, which were in the suburbes of the citic.Caated fole to went thither, and was received with as great honour and courtefic of Pompey as could be devifed:& in the end, after he had given him great thanks for the honors he had done him, he prayed him to affoord him his aduice and counfell in his government. Cato answered him thus: That he had not spoken any thing before that time in respect of any ill wil he bare him, neither that he deliuered this last opinion of his in respect of his friendship, but wholly for the commonwealths fake: howbeit otherwise, that for his owne private affaires, if he thought good to vse his advice, whenfoeuer it pleafed him to aske his opinion, he would tell him the best he could. But for common causes, that he would alwaies tell what he thought, though he neuer asked him; and in fine, he performed allhe faid. For, first of all, when Pompey did set gricuous penalties and new fines, vpon their heads which had bought the peoples voyces for money, Cato counfelled him to prouide for things to come, and to let that alone which was already pail. For, faid he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man should seeke to reforme the faults that are passand furthermore, if the punishments appointed were neuer then the offences committed, then they should do wrong vinto them that were already accused, to punish them by a new law which they had not offended. Afterwards also, certaine men of good calling (Pompers friends) being accused, Cato perceiuing that Pompey grew remisse, and yeelded in many things, he fharply reproued and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by law taken away the praifes which were wont to be spoken of the offenders that were accused, he himselfe notwithstanding having written an Oration in the praise of Munatius Planeus, sentit vnto the Iudges, whilest his cause was a hearing. Cato being one of the Iudges at that time, stopped his eares with both his hands, and would not have it read. Wherefore Planeus refused him for one of his Judges, after his cause was pleaded vnto: howbeit he was condemned notwithstanding. To conclude, Cato was fuch a griefe and trouble vnto them that were accused, that they could not rell well how to deale with him. For once they durft not let him be any of their Judges, neither could they well also refuse him. For there were many that were condemned, which refusing Ca. to, feemed vnto others that they were guilty: and many also were shamefully reproued, becaule they would not accept Cato for their Iudge, when he was offered them. Things proceeding in this fort at ROME, Cefar remained in GAVLE with his armie, where he made warres: neuerthelesse he wanne him friends still in Rome, by gifts and money, and made himselfe very strong. Now appeared Catoes predictions and forewarnings true vnto Pompey, and beganne to quicken his spirits which had slept so long, and made him then to consider of the danger, the which before he could not be perfuaded to beleeve. But perceiving his flacknesse and feare withall, doubting how to proceede: to preuent Cafars practiles, Cato determined to fue to be Confull, with intent either to make him leave his army, or elfe to find out the practife he intended. Catoescompetitors, they were both of them very honest men also, of the which Sulpitius full tore. had received great honour and preferment by Catoes credit and authority: in respect whereof file cases. many thought that it was feant honeftly done of Sulpitius, to shew himselfe so vnthankfull, as to fland against Cato in this suite. Howbeit, Cato neuer coplained ofti. matter, but said, that it was no maruell he would give place to no man in that, fith it was the greatest good happe that ever came vnto him. This not with flanding he perswaded the Senat to make a law, that from thenceforth, fuch as fued for any office, they should themselues be suiters to the people, and not preferre their fuite by others. This caused the people to be more offended with him then before because thereby he did not only take away their fingering of mony, which they got by their voices in elections; but tooke from them the meanes they had also to pleafure many, bringing them now into ponerty and contempt. He therefore having no face to flatter the people and to currie fauor with them, but rather sticking to his graue maner and modest life, then to seeke the dignity of a Confull by fuch meanes, made fuite himselfe in person, and would not suffer his friends to take the ordinary course which might win the peoples harts, wherupon he was put by his Confulship. This deniall was wont not only to have made y parties refused, very sorowfull, but their confulship. friends and kinfmen also greatly assumed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckening of that, but went the next morning, and played at tennis with his friends in the field of Mars, and after he had dined, walked againe in y market place, as his maner was, without shoots on his feet. & coat. Cicero blamed him much for that, because the comonwealth requiring then such a Con- cicero blafull as he, he had not carefully endeuoured himselfe by curtesie and gentle meanes to win the fanor of the people, neither would ever after make fuite for it, although at another time he fued to be Prætor. Thereunto Cato answered, that for the Prætorship he was not denyed it by the goodwill of the people, but rather for that they were bribed with money. And for the election of the Confuls, where there was no deceipt vied, he knew plainly he went without it, for his maners which the people misliked: the which he thought were no wise mans part to change for any mans pleasure, nor yet by making the like suite againe to hazard the resusall. Furthermore, Casar making warre with very flour nations, and having with no small danger and travell subdued them: and having also set upon the Germaines with whom the Romaines were at peace, and also flaine three hundred thousand persons: his friends made suite that the people should do folemne facrifice to giue thanks vnto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they should deliuer Cafar into their hands whom he had injured, to receive such punishment as they thought good: to the end the whole offence, for the breach of peace, might be cast vpon him, that the city might be no partaker of it, fith they could not do with all. Neuertheleffe, said he, we are to do facrifices vnto the gods, to give them thankes, for that they turned not the revenge of the furie and rashnesse of the Captaine, vpon our poore souldiers which were inno fault, but have pardoned the common wealth. Cafar being advertised thereof, wrote a letter vnto the Sea nate, containing many accusations against Cato. The letter being read, Cato rose, not as a man pur in a chafe with choler, nor pricked with enuie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would fay) declared that y accusations which Casar heaped against him in his letters, were but prety mockes and fleights which he had gathered together, to make the people merrie withall. But on the other fide, when he began to vnrip his whole intents and practifes from the beginning, not as if he had bene his enemy, but rather a confederate with him in his cospiracie, declaring that they were not the Germains, nor the Gavles, which they were to be afraid of, but of himselfe, if they were wise: he therupon so offended the Senate, and made fuch stirreamong them, that Cafars friends repented them they had caused his letters to be read in the Senate, giving Cato thereby occasion justly to complaine of Cafar, and to alledge much good matter against him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate against Cafar, but this was faid onely, that it was good reason to let him have a successour. Then Cafars friends made fuite that Pompey should put away his army, and refigne up the provinces he kept. or else that they should compell Casar no more then him to do it. Then Cate opened his mouth. and faid, the thing was now come to passe, which he had ever told them of, and that C. sfar came to oppresse the common wealth, openly turning the armie against it, which deceitfully he had obtained of the fame. All this preuailed not, neither could be thereby win any thing of the Scnate, because the people favoured Casar, and would alwayes have him great; for the Senate did believe all that he faid but for all that they feared the people. When newes was brought that Casar had wonne the city of ARIMINYM, and was coming on with his army towards Rome. then every man looked your Cato, and the people and Pompey confessed, that he onely from the beginning had found out the marke Cafar shot at and had hit the white of his slie device. Then faid Cato vnto them, If you would have beleeved me, my Lords, and followed my counfell, you should not now have bene afraid of one man alone neither should you also have put your onely hope in one man. Pompey answered thereunto, that Caro indeed had guessed more truly, howbeit that he also had dealt more friendly. Thereupon Cato gaue counfell that the Senate should referre all ynto Pompeys order; for, faid he, they that can do great mischiest, know also how to helpe it. Pempey perceiuing that he had no armie conuenient about him to tarie Casars coming, and that the men also which he had, were but faint hearted he for sooke the citie. Cate being deestofolione termined to go with him, fent his younger fonne before vnto Munatius, which lay in the countrie of the Brytians, and tooke his eldest some with him. Now because he was to prouide a stay and gouernor of his house and daughters, he tooke Martia againe, which was left a widow and very rich, for that Hortensius dying made her his heire of all that he had. Therein Casar vpbraideth Cato much, reprouing his couetousnesse to marie for goods. For, said he, if he had need of a wife, why then did he before grant her vnto another? If he had no need of a woman, why then did he take her afterwards againe? Vnlesse she were before a baite vnto Hortenstw., to keepe her whilest she was young, that he might have her againe when she was rich. But against that me thinkes it is sufficient to recite these verses of Eurypides:

> Vnlikelihoods first I disprove. For why? what man can (ay. That ever feare made Hercules to turne his face away?

For I take it to be all one, to reproue Hercules cowardlinesse, and Catoes couetousnesse. But if his mariage be to be reproued, peraducture it is in another fort. For fo foone as he had maried Martia againe, he left his house and his daughters to her gouernment, and followed Pompey. But after that time, men report that he neuer polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any garland, but to his dying day, lamented and bewailed in his heart, the miserie and calamitie of his countrey, whether they had victory, or were our come. So having the province of Sicile allotted to him, he went vnto Syracvsa. There vnderstanding that Asinius Pollio was arrived at Messi-NA, with men of warre from his enemies, Cato fent vnto him, to know wherefore he came this ther, Pollio againe asked of him, who was the causer of all this warre. Againe, when Cato was aduertifed that Pompey had forfaken ITALIE, and that he lay in campe beyond the fea by the city of DYRRACHIVM, then he faid, he faw a maruellous great change & incertainty in the providence of the gods:that when Pompey did al things beyond reason, and out of course, he was inuincible, and now that he fought to preserve his countrey, he saw he lacked his former good happe. Now he knew he was strong enough at that time to drive Asinius Pollio out of Sicile if he woulds but because there came a greater aide vnto him, he would not plague that Iland with the misery of warre. Then after he had adulted the Syracys ans to take the fironger part, and to looke to their fafetic, he tooke the fea, and went towards Pompey. When he was come vnto him, he did al. cue har wayes counfell him to prolong the warre, hoping still of some treatic of peace; and would in no case they should come to fight any battell, where the weaker part should of necessitie be put to the fword by the stronger. Therefore he perswaded Pompey and the counsellers about him, to establish certaine lawes to this effect. That they should sacke no city in this warre, the which be- cateer. longed vnro the Empire of Rome: and also, that they should kill no citizen of Rome, but in Property furie of battell, when their fwords were in their hands. Thereby he wanne himselfe great ho- army. nour, and brought many mento take Pompeys part, by the lenitie and elemencie he vied vnto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being fent into As 1 A, to aide them that had commission to presse shippes and men of warre, he tooke his fister Servilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her for all the time of her widdowhood she had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name she had before, sith they saw she had so willingly given her self to follow him in his flying, and contented herfelfe with his straight manner of life. This notwithstan- why romding, Cafar did not let to shame her to Cato. Pompeys Captaines had no need of Cato any where per chambut at Rhopes. For he wannethe peoplethere with his courteous viage and perswasion, leamind for mind for uing with them Servilia and her little fonne, and went from thence to Pompeys campe, who had the governleauied a great armie both by sea and land. There did Pompey most of all discouer his mind and intent. For first he meant to have given Catathe charge of the army by sea which were about intent. For first he meant to have given Cato the charge of the army by sea, which were aboue 500 ships of war, besides an infinite number of foists and pinnaces, and such small bottomes vnconcredibut fodainly confidering better of it (or possibly being informed by some of his friends, that all Catoes regard and counfel in matters of government was, to deliver Rome fro tyranny; and that if he had so great a charge vnder him, Cafar being once ouercome, he would also force Pompey to leave his army, and fo make him subject to the law) he changed his mind, notwithfranding he had already moued it to Cate, and leaving him, gave Bibulus the charge of al his army by sea. But Cato therefore shewed no lesse good will vnto Pompey then before. For it is reported, that in a certain skirmish & cossict before the city of Dyrrac entry M. Pompey encoraging his soldiers, & commanding euery Captain also to do the like in his quarter, the soldiers gaue but faint eare vnto them, and made no maner of shew of men whose hearts had bin any whit the more encouraged thereby. But when Cato after the all came & told them (as the time ferued) the reason of Philosophic, touching libertie, manhood, death and honor, and that with a vehement affection; and last of all, ending his oration, with calling vpon the gods, turning his speech vnto them, as if they had bene present to have seene how valiantly the souldiers fought for the liberty of their country they gaue fuch a lufty cry, and had fuch a braue conceit & vehement defire to fight like men, that all the Captaines were filled with good hope, & so led the to battell, where they gaue fuch a cruell charge and fierce onset vpontheir enemics, that they ouerthrew them, & put them that day to flight. Howbeit Casars good fortune tooke the final cond of this victory from Pompey, by his ouer great feare and mistrust: who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victorie, as we have written more amply in his life. But when all the rest rejoyced that they had done fo noble an exploir, and made their vaunts of the great aduantage they had of their enemies, Cato to the contrary bewailed the calamity of his country, and lamented that curfed ambition which caused so many good and valiant citizens of one selfe citie, so to kill and murther one another. After this overthrow, Cafar taking his way into THESSALY, Pompey raised his campe to follow him, and leaving a great power at Dyrrachivm, of men, armour, munition, and friends, he gaue Cato the charge of them all, and fifteene enfignes of footmen besides. The which he did why Pomfor the feare and mistrust he had of him, being affared, that if by ill fortune he should lose the prospect. battell, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a truftier man then he: but on realisms. the other fide if he wan the victory, he doubted fore that he could not command as he would, where Cato was. There were also many other noblemen, as a man wold fay, cast away, & left as Dyrrachivm with Cato. In fine, the ouerthrow of the battellat Pharsalia being blowne abroad, Cato refolued with himselfe if Pompey were dead, that he would passe ouer all his men into ITALY, and then like a banished man would himselfealone wander as farre as he could from the tyranny: and contrarily, if he were aliue, that then he would keepe his armie together for him, as long as he could. With this determination he passed oner the sea into the Ile of Correy, where Pompeys armie by fealay. There Cato finding Cicero, he would have furrendred up his chargevntohim, as to a man of a greater dignitie, for that he had bene Confull, and Cato onely but Prætor. Howbeit Cicero would in no wife receiue it, but returned immediatly into ITALY. Cato then perceiving that Pompey the yonger (sonne vnto Pompey the Great) of a rash and haughtie minde, would have punished all them that went into ITALIE, and left the armie by sea, and that specially he was bent first of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproued him privatly for it. so that he certainly faued Ciceroes life, and many other mo befides. Now Cato supposing that Pom. per the Great had faued himself in ÆGYPT or in AFRICK, he determined to take y seas, to meer him with all his men: but before he tooke ship he gaue all men leaue to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arrived in Africke, failing vp and down the coast there he met with Sextus, the yongest some of Pompey, who first told him, that his father was slaine in ÆGYPT: when the foldiers heard it, they took it very heavily, and not one of the after the death of Pompey the Great, would serue vnder any other Captaine then Cato. He thereupon being ashamed, and thinking it pitie also to leave so many noble and good men that had served so faithfully vnder him, without a Captaine, not knowing what way to take, nor whither to go, at their request he was contented to take charge of them, & went first into the city of CYRENES, where not many daies before, the citizens had shut the gates against Labienus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten vnto king Iuba, who had received him, and that Actius Varus, vnto whom Pompey had given the charge of the province of Africke, was in their company with an armic, and determined to go joyne with them. So he went by land in the winter time, and had gotten amaruellous number of affes together, to cary water and victuals, which followed him with a great number of carts befides, and of those men, which the Africans call Psilles, to wit, they that do heale the stinging of serpents, & do sucke out the poifon with their mouthes, and do furthermore charme and enchant the snakes, that they have no power to do hurt. He was feuen dayes together marching continually, and went on foote as a guide vnto his men, without helpe of horse or beast. From that day forth, on the which he vnderstood of the battell lost at Pharsalia, he neuer supped but sitting; * and added that vnto the rest of his forrow, that he neuer laid him downe, but when he went to bed for all night. Cato having paffed the winter in Libia, he brought his fouldiers into the field, which were about ten thousand persons. The affaires on their side had but hard successe, for the contention and variance betwixt Scipio and Varus, for the which they both flattered king Iuba, to win fauour: being a maruellous proud man for his greatnesse and riches; as he shewed the first time he spake with Cato. For when Cato came, he caused his owne chaire to be set betwint Scipio and Cato, to haue the honour to be in the midft. But Cato perceiuing it, tooke vp his ownechaire, and fet it on the other fide by Scipioto put him in the middest, notwithstanding that he was his enemy, and had written a shamefull booke against him. Many make no account of this fact of Cato, but reproue him, because that walking one day with Philastratus in Sicile, he gaue him the vpper hand, honoring him for his Philosophic. Thus Cato did pull downe the pride of the king at that time, who before had vsed Scipio and Varus as his noble men and subjects; howbeit Cate did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the company prayed him to take charge of the whole armie, and that Scipio himfelfe, and Varus both, did first give him place, and willingly refigned vnto him the honour to command the whole campe he answered them, he would not offend the law, fith he made warre onely to preserve the authoritie and priviledge thereof, neither would take you him to command all, himselfe being but Vicepretor, where there was Viceconfull prefent. For Scipio was created Proconfull, and furthermore, the people had a certaine confidence that their affaires would prosper the better, if they had but the time of a Scipio to leade them in Africk E. Now when Scipio was Generall over them, he would ftraight, for Iubaes fake, have put all the inhabitants of the citie of VTICA (without respect of age) vnto the fword, and have razed their houses to the ground, as those that had taken Casars part. Howbeit Cato would not suffer him, but protesting vnto them that were present, and calling the gods to witnesse in open councell, with great difficultie he saued the poore people, of Vrica from that cruell tragedie and flaughter. Afterwards, partly at the request of the people, and partly also at Scipioes instance, Cato tooke vpon him to keepe the citie, fearing lest by treason, or against their wils it should come into Cofars hands; because it was aftrong place of situatio, & wel replenished with all things necessary for him that should keepe it. Cate did both furnish it, and also fortific it.

For he brought ingreat store of corne, he repaired the rampers of the wals, made great high towers, and cast deepe trenches round about the citie, paling them in and betwixt the trenches and the towne, he lodged all the young men of Vrica, and compelled them to deliuer vp their armour and weapon, and kept all the rest within the citie it selfe, carefully prouiding that neuer a man of them should be hurr by the Romain es, and besides, did also send corne, armour, munition and money vnto the campe: so that the citie of Vrica was the staple and store-house of the warres. Moreouer, as he had before counfelled Pompey not to come to battel, the like counfel he now gaue also vnto Scipio, not to hazard battell against a man of great skill & experience in wars, but to take time, whereby, by litle and litle, he should consume the power and strength of Casars tvranny. But Scipie was so stout, that he regarded not Catees counsell, but wrote otherwhile vnto him, twitting him with his cowardlinesse in this maner. That it was enough for him to be safe in Bille hear a good citic copassed about with wals, though otherwise he sought not to hinder men to be valiant, to execute any enterprise, as occasion was offered. Cato wrote againe vnto him, that he was ready to go into ITALY with his footmen and horsemen which he had brought into AFRICK to draw Cefar fro them, & to turne him against him. Scipio made but a sport at it. Then Cato shewed plainly, that he did repent him he had given him the preferment to be Generall of the army, because he saw he would but fondly prosecute this war; & also, that if he chanced to our come, he could not moderatly vie y victory against his countrimen. Then he began to mistrust the good fuccesse of this war (and so he told his friends) for the Generals hastinesse & vnskilfulnesse; and yetifbeyond expectation it fel out well, and that Casar were overthrown, he would never dwel at Rome any more, but would fliethe crueltie and bitternetic of Scipio, who even at that prefent time did proudly threaten many. But in the end, that fell out sooner then looked for. For a post came to him late that night, who but three dayes before departed from the campe, and brought newes that all was lost, in a great battel, by the citie of THAPSES, which Cofar had wonthat he had taken both campes; that Scipio and king Iuba were fled with a few men, and that all the rest of their army was flaine. These newes did put the citizens in such a feare and maze, (and specially being in the warre, and in the night time) that for very feare they could feant keepe themselues within the wals of their citie. But Cato meeting with them, flayed them that ran vp and downe crying in the streetes, and did comfort them the best he could. Yet he tooke not all their feare extremition from them, though he brought them againe vnto themselves from the extasse they were in declaring vnto them that the loffe was nothing fo great as it was made, and that it was a comon matter to enlarge fuch newes with words enough. By these persuasions, he somewhat pacified the tumultand vprore, and the next morning by breake of day he made a proclamation, that the three hundred men which he had chosen for his counsellers, should come and assemble in the temple of Iupiter, they all being citizens of Rome, which for trafficke of merchandize lay in A. FRICK, and all the ROMAINE Senators and their children also. Now whilst they gathred them. felues together, Cato himfelfe went very grauely with a fet modest countenance, as if no such matter had happened, having a litle booke in his hand, which he read as he went. This booke contained the store and preparation of munition he had made for this warre, as corne, armour, weapons, bowes, flings, and footmen. When they were all affembled, he began greatly to commend the good loue and faithfulnesse of these three hundred ROMAINES, which had profitably Komaines ferued their country with their persons, mony, and counsell; and did counsell them not to depart as Prica. one from another, as men having no hope, or otherwife feeking to faue themselves scatteringly. For remaining together, Cafar would leffe despise them, if they would make war against him; and would also sooner pardon them, if they craued mercie of him. Therfore he counselled them to determine what they would do, and for his owne part, he faid he would not mislike what socuer they determined of: for if their minds followed their fortune, he would thinke this change to proceed of the necessitie of time; but if they were resolued to withstand their missortune, and to hazard themselves to defend their libertie, he then would not onely commend them, but hauing their noble courage in admiration, would himselfe be their chieferaine and companion, e- » uento proue the fortune of their country to the vttermost. The which was not VTICA nor A- >> DRVMETVM, but the city felfe of Rome: the which oftentimes through her great neffe had raifed herselfe from greater dangers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many wayes to saue >> themselues, and the greatest meane of all was this, that they should make war with a man, who by reason of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For Spaine of the one side was vp against him, and took part with the yonger Pompey and the city of Rome also not being vied to be bridled with the fnaffle of such insolencie, could not abide it, but would rather rise with any other change. Furthermore, that they were not to refuse any danger, but to take example of their enemy:who to work his mischieuous intent, spareth not his perso in any danger. And contrarily alfo, that vnto them the incertaintic of the war, if victory followed, would make them happy; as also in being ouerthrowne, their death would turne to immortall glory. Notwithstanding, they were to think of the matter among themselves, and to make their prayers to the gods, that in recompence of their vertue and good feruice which they had flewed therunto, they would grant them grace to determine for the best. After Cato had ended his oration, there were divers of the that were stirred vp by his liuely perswasions, but the most part of them were incouraged by his constancy and noble mind, and also by his kindness so that they presently forgot the danger they were in, and praying him to command their persons, goods, & weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only inuincible captain, of whom fortune had no power, thinking it better to die obeying his counsel, then to saue theselues, forsaking so valiant & worthy a man. Then, when one of the affembly made a motion that they should make their bondmen free, and that divers also did confirme it, Cato said, he would by no meanes suffer it, because it was neither meete nor lawfull:howbeit if their mafters would manumiffe them, that he was contented to receive them for fouldiers that could weare any weapon. Divers promifed him to do it and Cato commanded their names should be enrolled that would, and so went his way. Immediatly after, letters were brought him from king Inba and Scipio: of the which king, Inba was hidden in a mountaine with few men with him, who fent vnto him to know whathe would determine to do. For if he means to forfake Vrica, he would tary him there: & if other wische determined to keepe Vrica, then that he would come & helpe him with an army. Scipio on the other fide riding at anker, at a point of the land not far fro Vrica, staid for the like answer. Then Cato thought it best to stay i mes. fengers which had brought him their letters, til he saw what was the determination of the 300. For all they that were Senators of Rome, were very glad men, & did prefetly make their bondmen free, & gaue them weapons. But the other three hundred which were merchant venturers, and that lived by vsury and exchange, who had the most part of their goods in slaves and bondmen, did not long follow Catoes counsell, but like men, whose bodies soone receiue heate, & are foone cold again when they are once gone fro the fire:euen fothofe merchants, while Cato was present among them, had some good prety will & desire, but when by themselves they had cast their account, the feare they had of Cafar made them forget the reverence they bare vnto Cato. and vnto their duty. For, said they, what are we, and what is he whom we disdaine to obey. Is it not Cafar himselfe, who at this day is Lord and Emperor of Rome! Neuera one of vs is Scipio, Pompey, or Cato: and yet now, when all men for feare (and in maner compelled) do yeeld and fubmit themselucs, we wil needs take vpon vs within the wals of VTICA to fight for the libertic of Rome against him, for whom Cato flying with Pompey for fooke ITALY: and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cafar, having no better liberty our selues then it pleaseth himto giue vs. Let vs therfore now know our selues whilest we have time, and crave mercy at his hands that is the stronger, and send vnto him to pray him to pardon vs. The greatest and wisest men of those three hundred merchants had this speech. But the most part of them sought means how to intrap the Senators, hoping the better of mercy at Cafars hand, if they did deliuer them vnto him. Cato did looke for this change in them, but yet vttered not that he thought, and returned the messengers backe againe vnto king Iuba and Scipio, and wrote vnto them, that they should bewarethey came not neare VTICA, because he did mistrust these three hundred merchants. Now there were a great number of horsemen which had scaped from the battell, who coming towards VTICA, fent three of their company vnto Cato, the which brought him not one selfe determination from all the company. For some of them meant to go vnto king Inba, others also to ioyne with Cato, and part of them were afraid to come into VTICA. These things being thus reported vnto Cato, he commanded Marcus Rubrius to take care of these three hundred men, and to receive the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumiffed, without compelling of any man. In the meane time Cato with all the Senators went out of VTICA to meet with these horsemen, and there he spake to the Captaines, and prayed them that they would not forfake fo many Noblemen & Senators of Rome as were there and that they would not have king Inha for their Captaine before Cato, but to come into VTICA, where they might faue themselves the citie was of fuch strength, and besides, so wel armed and victualed for many yeares. The like request did the Senators also make vnto them, with the teares running down their cheeks. Therupon the Captaines went and spake with their souldiers. Cato in the meane time sate him downe on a litle hil, with the Senators, tarying for answer. But then on the sodain came Rubrius vnto him in great hast, complaying of the tumult of these three hudred merchants, which went about to make the city to rebell: wherupon the rest (their hearts failing them) fell to be waile their miserable fortune. But care fought to comfort them, and then fent vnto the three hundred merchants. to pray the to have a litle patience. So the Captains returned again with unreasonable demands of the horsmen. For they said, that they cared not for king Iubaes pay, neither were they asraid of Cafars malice, so that they had Cato for their Generall: yet to be pend vp within the wals of a city with Africans, that were Phobnicians, & a traiterous nation as could be, that grieued the most of all. For, said they, though now they stirre not, and be quiet, yet when Cafar comes, they will be the first that will be tray vs, and cut our throates. And therefore, if Cato would have them to joyne with him in this war, that he should either kill or drive away all the VTICANS OUR of the citie, and then that they would come into it, when it was cleare of al those barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruell and barbarous condition, neuertheleffe he told them that he would talke with the threehundred; and so returning againe into Vrica, he spake vnto them. But they then not regarding the reuerence vnto Cato, diffembling no longer, faid openly, that they would not like of him what socuer he were, that should compel them to make war with Gelar, both because they would not, nor cold not do it. Further, there were some of them that mumbled to them clues, that the Senators, should be kept theretill Cafar came. Cate over-heard them, for indeed his hearing was not very quicke. At that very instant one came to him, and told him, that the horsemen were going their way. Cato therfore fearing lest these three hundred merchants would lay hands upon the Senators, he went unto them himfelf with his friends, and perceining they were gone a great way off, he tooke his horse and rode after them. They rejoycing to fee him come, received him among them, and prayed him to faue himself with them. But Cate prayed them againe to faue the Senators, and that with fuch affection, as it forced teares in him: be fides he held up his hands vnto them, took their horfes by the bridles, & themselves by their sorfer the weapons, that at the length he obtained of them, that they would remaine there one day at the least to helpe the Senators to saue themselves. So Cato returning with them into the citie, he appointed some of them to ward at the gates, and put others also in garrison into the castelliso that the three hundred merchants quaked for feare, left he would have bin revenged of them, because of their return with him. Therupon they fent vnto Cato, humbly to pray him to come vnto them in any case. But the Senators flocking about him, would not suffer him to go, and said, that they would not cast away their sauior and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doubtlesse, all that were within VTICA plainly faw the vertue and simplicitie of Cato, and found that there was no fraud nor deceit in him: who having long time resoluted to kill himselfe, he onely tooke tief Cato. that extreme paines and care for others, that their lives being faued, he might then rid himself of his own. For men might easily see, though he diffembled it, that he was resolued to die. Whereupon having comforted the Senators, he yeelded vnto the requests of the 200. merchants, and went himselfe alone vnto them. Then they thanked him much for his comming, and prayed him to command them, and boldly to trust them: so that he would pard on them if they could not be all Catoes, and would take pitie of their faint hearts, though they were not so constant and noble mindedas he. For they were determined to fend vnto Cafar, specially to intreate him for him: and if that they could not obtaine pardon for him, then they were affured they could have none for themselves, and therefore would fight for the safetic of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wils, answered, that they should send quickly to craue pardon for themselves, but to aske none for him. For (said he) men that be our come, and extreminal haue offended, it standeth them upon to make humble suite, and to craue pardon: but for himfelfe, he was never ouercome in his life, and yet had ouercome as much as he defired; and had alwayes bene better then Cafar in inftice, who only (not himfelfe) was now taken and our come: the thing being apparetly proued in fight against him, which he had alwaies denied to have practifed against his country. When he had made this answer vnto the three hundred merchats, he departed from them. Newes being brought that Cafar was in his way with all his army, coming towards Vrica: O gods, faid he, then he commeth against vs as against men. Then turning vnto the Senators, he gaue them counfell quickly to faue themselues, whilest the horsmen were yet in the citie. So shutting all the gates of the citie, saving that towards the hauen, he appointed Thips for them all, and fet eue, y thing at a ftay, without tumult or diforder, no man having injury offered him, and gaue every one money to make way for their fafetie. When Marcus Octavius (who came with two legions, and camped hard by VTICA) fent vnto Cato, to determine which of them two should be Generall, he made no answer, but turning to his friends, said: How can we wonder any more, that all goeth to wracke with vs. fith there is fuch ambition amongst vs for the government, even now, when we are at the last cast? In the meane time word was brought ambition of him, how the horfemen going their way were spoiling of the citizens goods, as a law full previn warre. He straight ran thither himselfe, and the first he met withall, he took from them that they had gotten: the rest, before he came vnto them, threw downe that they were carying away, and hanging downe their heads for shame, they went their way, and said nothing. Then Cato calling all the citizens of VTICA together, prayed them not to incense nor moue C.esar against the three hundred, but rather to craue of him pardon for them all. Then he went againe to the peere, and there embracing his friends, and taking his leaue of them all, he brought the to their fnips. Now for his fon, he did not counsel him to go, neither did he thinke it meet to vige him to for sake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius a yong man in his company, of a noble courage, that was determined to follow the inuincible constancie of Cato: who counselled him to take the sea. and to faile away with the reft, because he knew he was Cefars mortall enemy. Statilius faid, he would not go. Then Cato turning him vnto Apollonides a Stoick Philosopher, & vnto Demetrius a Peripatetick Philosopher, faid: You must take this stour you man, to perswade him to obey vnto necessitie. Case himself in the meane time sent away the rest, and did minister justice vnto them that required it, spending all that night and the next day about those matters. Then Lucius Casar. the kinfinan of Iulius Cafar the conqueror, being chosen by § three hundred, to go & make suite vero him for them all came and prayed Cato to help him to make his oration, which he shold say vnto Cafar for them all: and as for thee Cato, faid he, I will kiffe his hands, and fall downe on my knees before him to intreat him for thee. Nay, faid Cato, thou shalt not do so. For if I would fauc my life by Cafars grace. I could do it, if I wold but go vnto him howbeit I wil not be bound to a tyrant for iniuftice. For it is an iniuftice in him, to take vpon him as a Lord & four raigne to faue far for him, a mans life, when himfelfe hath no authoritie to command. But yet let vs confider if thou wilr what thou shalt fay, to craue pardon for the three hundred. So they were awhile together confidering the matter; and in fine, Lucius Cafar being ready to depart, Cato recommended his son and friends vnto him, and embracing him, took his Icaue of him. Then he returned vnto his lodging, and calling his fon and friends before him, and talking of many matters, among others he chargod his fonne in no case to meddle in the affaires of the commonwealth. For, said he, to deale yprightly like Catoes fon, the corruption of the time and state will not abide it; and contrarily, ob. feruing the time, thou canft not do like an honest man. Towards enening he went into his bath ser, of Habe to wash himselfe, and as he was bathing, thinking vpon Statilius, he cried out aloud: Well Apollonides, thou haft at length yet perswaded Statilins to go his way, and pulled down his stout courage he had : and is he gone without bidding vs farewell? How, gone, faid Apollonides? Nay, his heart is now more front & couragious then euer it was, not with franding all the perfwasions we could vie vnto him: for he is determined to tary, & to take fuch part as thou doeft. After he had bathed himfelf, he went to supper, and sate at his meate, as he had alwaies ysed after the battel of PHARSALIA, and neuer lay, but when he went to bed: and he had all his friends & the chiefe Magistrates of VTICA to supper with him. After supper they fell into graue talke, & matters of Philosophy, til at length they came vnto the strange opinio of the Stoicke Philosophers, which was this, that only § good man is free, & althe cuil be flaues. The Peripatetick Philosopher that was preset there, was straight against it. But Cato was very earnest against the Peripatetick & argued the matter a long time, with a vehement speech & contention in somuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to end his life, and to rid himselfe out of all thosetroubles. Butthen when he had ended his argument, and faw that every man held their peace, and looked dly on itito comfort them againe, and to put the suspicion of his death out of their heads, he began againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and seemed to be carefull of them, as though he had bene affraid lest some misfortune were come vnto them vpon the sea, or vnto them that were gone by land, because they passed through deserts, where there was no water to be had:

Now when supper was done, & the strangers gone, he walked as his maner was with his friends, and having taken order with the captaines of the watch for matters of service, as the time required, going into his chamber he embraced his fonne and his friends more louingly then he was wont to do, whereby he made them againe suspect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his chamber and laied in his bed, he tooke Platoes dialogue in hand, treating of the foule, and read the most part of it. Then looking by his beds side, and missing his sword, bene of the (which his fon had taken from him when he was at supper) he called one of the groomes of his faile. chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his fword away. His man made him no answer, and he fell againe to reade his booke. Then a prettie while after, not feeming to be importunate, or ouerhafty of the matter, but as though he would only know what became of it, he willed the to bring him his fword againe. They taried long, and he had read ouer all the booke, but yet his fivord was not brought him againe. Wherupon he called for all his men, one after another, and very angerly asked them his fword, and gaue one of them fuch a blow on the face, that his nose fella bleeding, and his hand was all bloudy withall; and cried out, that his fonne and his feruants would deliver him naked into the hands of his enemy; vntill his fon and his friends at length ran vnto him, and falling downe on their knees, lamented, and befought him to be contented. Cate then rifing out of his bed, looked grimly vpon them, and faid vnto them: O gods, who euer faw me in this taking? why doth no man by reason perswade me, if they see me out of the way, and not to keepe me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me : why doeft not thou (my fonne) bind thy fathers hands behind him, that when Cafar commeth, he may find me in case not to defend my selfe I do not defire my sword to hurt my selfe, for if I had any such mind, I need but hold my breath a litle, or give but a knocke of my head against the wall onely, and dispatch my selfe quickly. When he had faid thus, his sonne went out of his chamber weeping, and all his friends also, no man remaining with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides, vnto whom he spake more gently, and reasoned in this fort: What do you thinke to keepe an old man as I amaliue by force? and haue you taried behind but to fit staring vpon me, and fay nothing vnto merif otherwise esse, by reason you come to perswade me, that it shall be no shame for Ca-thereshilds to (despairing of the safetie of his life) to seeke it by the grace and mercie of his enemie, why phers his then do you not now tell me your reasons to perswade me; that for saking all other fancies friends, and determinations which hitherunto we have holden for good, being on a fudden become wifer by Cafars meanes, we should be bound the more therefore to give him thankes? I do not tell you this, that I have determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I lift) to put the thing inexecution I have determined : but yet I will confult with you, when I am fo determined, to heare the reasons and opinions of your bookes, which your sclues do vse indiscourse and argument together. Go your way therefore hardily vnto my fon, and tell him that he must not thinke to compell his father vnto that which he cannot proue good vnto him by reason. After this talke, Demetrius and Appollonides being nothing comforted, weeping, departed out of his chamber. Then his fword was brought him by a little boy. When he had it, he drew it out, and cato confe looked whether the point and edge of his fword was sharpe and would cut: when he saw it was dered his well: O, faid he, now am I where I would be, and fo laying downe the fword naked by him, he where with tooke his booke againe in his hand, and read it ouer (as they fay) twife together. Then he flept he littled fo foundly after it, that his men which were without his chamber heard him snortagaine. About himselfe. midnighthe called for two of his freemen, Cleanthes his Phisitian, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in his weightiest affaires of the commonwealth. So he sent him vnto the hauen, to see if all his men that were imbarked were vnder faile, & gaue his hand to the Phisitian to be bound vp, because it was swollen with the blow he gaue one of his slaues when he hit him on the face. All his feruants were glad to heare of that, hoping then that he defired to live. Soone after came Butas backe againe from the haven, and brought him word that all were gone but Craffus, who stayed about some businesse he had, and yet that he was going to take ship howbeit that the sea was very rough, and wind exceeding great, Cato hearing this, fighed, being forie for them that were vpon the sea: and sent Butas backe againe to the heauen, to see if any man came backe for any matter they had to fay vnto him. The litle birds began to chirpe, and Cato fell againe in a litle flumber. But thereupon But as returned, and brought him word that all was quiet in the hauen, and there was no stirre. Then Cato bade him go his way, and shut too the doore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had meant to have flept out all the rest of the night. Butas backe was no fooner turned, but Cato taking his naked fword in his hand, thrust in into his breaft: howbeit the swelling of his hand made the blow so weake, that it killed him nor presently, but drawing onto his latter end, he fell downe vpon his bed, and made such a noise with his fall(ouerthrowing a litle table of Geometrie hard by his bed) that his feruants hearing the noise, gauca great shreeke for feare. Thereupon his sonne and his friends ran into the chamber, and found him all of a goare bloud, and the most part of his bowels coming out of his body, him selfe being yet aliue and seeing them. They were all stricken with such forrow to behold it, that at the first they were so amazed, as they could not tell what to say to it. His Phisitio comming to him, he went about to put in his bowels againe which were not perifhed, and to fow up his wound. But Cato coming to himselfe, thrust backe the Phistion, and tore his bowels with his owne hands, and made his wound very great, and immediatly gaue up the ghost. Whereupon the three hundred Romaines (in leffe time then a man would have thought Catoe's owne hour. hold servants could have knowne of his death) were at his doores; and immediatly after all the people of Vrica also came thither, and with one voice called Cato their benefactor & fautour and faid, he only was a freeman, and had an innincible mind: and this was done, when they heard fay, that Cafar was not farre from VTICA. Furthermore, neither feare of the present danger, nor the defire to flatter the conqueror, neither any prinat quarrell amongst themselves, could keepe them from honoring Catoes funerals. For sumptuously setting out his body, and honorably accompanying his funerals as might be, they buried him by the sea side, whereat this present time is to be seene his image, holding a sword in his hand. After that, they made their best way to same themselves and their city. Now C. of ar being advertised by them that came vnto him, how Cato stirred not from Vrica, nor fled not, but fent all others away, fauing himselfe and his son, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing, he could not deuise what he means by it. Therefore effecting Cato much, he made hast with all the speed he could with his army to comethither. But when he vnderstood that Cato had fleine himselfe, writers do report he faid Cefars far- thus: O Cato, I enuie thy death, fith thou hast enuied mine honor to faue thy life. For indeed, had Cate bene contented Cafar should have faued his life, he had not so much impaired his owne honour, as he had augmented Cafars glory. And yet what Cafar would have done, men make it doubtfull, fauing that they coniecture well of Cafars clemencie. Cate died when he was but eight and forty yeares old. For his fonne, Cefar neuer did him hurt; howbeit it is reported of him that he was very idlely given, and lascinious besides. For when he lay in CAPPADOCIA, in anoblemans house of the kings bloud, called Maphradates, who had a faire woman to his wife, he taried longer there then he might well with honeftie, wherupon he fell to be a laughing stocketo the people, and in mockerie they faid: Cato will go to morrow, a thirty daies hence. And further, that Maphradates and Porcins are two good friends, but they have but one mind: and the reason was, because Maphradates wife was called Pfyche, which in the Greeke fignifieth, mind : and Case is a noble fellow, and hath a princely mind: howbeit his famous death did stop this infamous speech. For hevaliantly fighting against Augustus and Antonius at the battell of PHILIPPES, for the liberty of his country, their army being ouerthrown and fled, he would neither flie nor hide himselfe, but running in amongst his enemies, he made them know what he was by encoraging those of his side, which yet did defend themselves, till he was slain in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantnes. Furthermore, Porcia the daughter of Cato, gaue no place vnto her father, neither for chastitic, nor greatnesse of mind. For she being maried vnto Brutus, who slue Cafar, was of the conspiracie, and slue her selfas couragiously as became the vertue and nobility of her bloud from whence she came, as we have more amply declared in the life of Brutus. Statilius alfo, who had faid, he would runne Catoes fortune (as we have told you before) was kept from killing of himselfe by the Philosophers, Demetrius and Apollonides. But after that time having shewed himselfe very faithfull and serviceable vnto Brutus in all his affaires, he was flaine in the field also at the battell of PHILIPPES.

The end of Catoes life.

AGIS AND CLEOMENES.

Ruly the fable of Ixion was not ill deuised against ambitious persons, who imbracing a cloud for the goddeffe Iuno, begot (as it is faid) the of Ixion against amount of the fable of Ixion against amount of the image of vertue, do neuer any act that is good nor perfect: but being caried away with diverse fancies, and following others humors with define people they apply the proof of the people they are the people they are the people they are the people they are they are the people they are the fire to please the people, they may as the heardmen in the tragedy of Sophocles (speaking of their cattell) fay:

We waite upon their beafts, though we their masters be. And wherefocuer they become, there also follow we.

Such indeed are they compared to that gouerne common weales after peoples lust and fancy: who doubtleffe are as their feruants obedient at call, because they only may enjoy the glorious itle and name of an officer. For like as in a ship the mariners that stand in the prove, do better fee before them then the pilots that steere the helme in the poope, and yet lookes alwayes backe vnto them to fee what they command: euen fo, they that gouerne in the commonwealth for honors fake, are no better then honourable flaues of the people, having no more but thebare name of a gouernour. But indeed, the perfect good and honest man should never cover outward glory, but as a meane to bring him to noble attempts, whereby he might procure the better credit of his doings. And for a young man that coueteth honour by vertue, give him Theephra. leave a little to glory in his well doing: for as Theophrastus saith, vertue buddeth and sourisheth saith, vertue buddeth and sourisheth in youth, and taketh fast roote by praises given, as wit and courage groweth in them. But ouermuch praife is dangerous in enery person, but chiefly in ambitions gouernours. For if they Immoderate be men of great power, it makes them commit many desperate parts; for they will not allow praise very that honour proceeds of vertue, but that honour is vertue it felfe. But indeed they should say as Phocion did vnto Antipater, that requested an vnlawfull matter of him: Thou canst not, said he, haue Phocion a friend and flatterer both. This, or the very like, may be faid vnto the people: you faying. cannot both have one, a master and a servant, that can command and obey together. Or else the mischiefe spoken of in the tale of the Dragon must needs happen, which was; The taile on a The sale of time fel out with the head, and complained, faying, it would another while go before, and would the Dragons notalwayes come behind. The head granted the taile, which fell out very ill for it, not knowing bead and taile. how to guide the head; and befides that, the head thereby was tormented every way, being compelled against nature to follow that part and member, which could neither heare nor see how to guide it. The like matter have we seene happe vnto many, which in the administration of the commonwealth, did feek to pleafe the humors of y multitude. For when they have once put their heads under their girdles to please the common people, which without cause and reason do soone rebell, they can by no possible meanes afterwards bridle their furic and insolencie. Plutarel Now the reason that made vs enter into discourse against the ambition and vaine glorie time Grands Yyy 4 amongst the people, was the consideration I had of their great power, remembring the missortunes of Tiberius and Caius Gracebi: both of the which coming of a noble house, and having bin maruellous well brought vp, and managing also the affaires of the common wealth with a good defire, were not with standing in the end calt away: not fo much through conetous nessels of gloric. as for feare of dishonour, which came also of no base mind. For they having received great plea. fures and friendship of the people, were assumed to be indebted to them, and therefore earnestly fought to exceed the people in good wil, by new decrees & deuices, which they preferred for common benefit; and the people also for their parts contended to honor them the more, by how much they ftriued to flew themselues thankfull. So with like strife on either side, they to gratifie the common people, and the people to honour them, were fo vnwares entangled with publike causes, that they could no more follow the common proucibe, which saith:

Although our deeds diffent from equitie,

Yet can we not desist with honesty. This thou shalt easily find by the declaration of the historie. With these we do compare two other popular men, both kings of LACED AMON, Agis and Cleomenes. For they as the Graceki. feeking to increase the power of the common people, and to restore the just and honest gouernment againe of the common wealth of LACED EMON, which of long time had bene out of vie, did in like manner purchase the hate of the Nobilitie, which were loth to lose any part of their wonted couctousnesse. Indeed these two LACONIANS were no brethren borne, but yet did both follow one felfe course and forme of gouernment, which had beginning in this fort. After that couetous nessed again into the city of Sparta, and with riches, conetous field and misery, and by vie voluptuous field and licentious life; Sparta then was voide of all honor and goodneffe, and was long time drowned in fhame & dishonor, vntill king Agis and Leonides came to reigne there. Agis was of the house of the Emptiontides, the sonne of Endamedas, the fixt of lineall defeent after Agefilaus who had bene the greatest Prince of all GRECE in his time. This Agefilaus had a fon flaine in ITALY by the MESSAPHIANS, called Archidamus before the citie of MANDONIVM. Archidamus had iffue two fonnes. Agis and Endamidas that was king, who fucceeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater flue before the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, and left no children behind him. Eudamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Eudamidas: which Eudamidas also begat Agis, whose life we now write of. Leonidas alfo, the fonne of Cleonymus, was of the other family of the Agiades, the eight of fuccefof Leonidas, fion after Paufanias, who flue Mardonius, the kings Lieutenant generall of Persia, in a battell fought before y city of PLAT ÆES. This Paufanias had a fon called Pliftonax, & Pliftonax alfoanother, called Paulanias: who flying fro Sparta unto the city of Tegea, his eldest fon Agesipolis was made king in his fathers roome, who dying without iffue, his yoger brother Cleombrotus fucceeded him in the kingdome. Cleombrotus had two fons, Agespolis and Cleomenes : of the which, Agefipolis reigned not long king, and died without iffue. Then Cleomenes his brother, who was king after him, had two fons, Acrotatus the elder, that died in his fathers life time: and Cleonymus the yonger which furnised him, & was not king, but one Areus his nephew, the fon of Acrosatus. This Areus died before the city of Corinth, who having another Acrotatus to his fon, he fuccceded him in the kingdome. He also died at a battell before the city of MEGALIPOLIS, & was flain there by the tyrat Aristodemus, leaving his wife great with child. She being brought to bed after his death of a fonne, whom Leonidas the fonne of Cleonymus taught and brought up, the child dying very yong, the crowne by his death was cast vpon Leonidas himselfe. Howbeit his manners and conditions neuer liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the common wealth, and cleane out of order, yet Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the ancient LACONIAN life: because he had bene long time brought vp in princes houses, and followed also Sciences court, from whence he had brought all the pride and pompe sato Sparta. of those courts into GRECE, where law & reason ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not only farre excell Leonidas, in honour and magnanimitie of mind: but all other almost also which had reigned in Sparta from the time of Agefilaus the great. So that when Agis was not yet twenty yeares old, & being daintily brought vp with the finenesse of two women, his mother Agistrata, and Archidamia his grandmother, which had more gold and filuer then all the LACED EMO-NIANS els, he began to spurne against these womanish delights and pleasures, in making himselse faire to be the better liked, and to be fine and trimme in his apparell; and to cast vpon him a plaine Spanish cape, taking pleasure in the diet, bathes, and manner of the ancient LACONTAN life; and openly boafted befides, that he would not defire to be king, but onely for the hope he had to restore the ancient LACONIAN life by his authoritie. Then began the state of LACED A- The begin. MON first to be corrupted, and to leave her ancient discipline, when the LACED EMONIANS ning of the hauing subdued the Empire of the ATHENIANS, stored themselues and country both, with niams fall, plenty of gold & filuer. But yet referuing still the landes left vnto them by succession from their from their fathers, according vnto Lycurgus first ordinance and institution, for division of lands amongst discipline. them which ordinance, and equalitie being inuiolably kept amongft them, did yet preferue the common wealth from defamation of diuerie other notorious crimes, vntill the time of the au-sherra, for thoritie of Epitadeus, one of the Ephores, a feditious man, and of proud conditions; who bitterly falling out with his owne fonne, preferred a law, that every man might lawfully give his lands ken by Epiand goods whilest he lined, or after his death by testament, vnto any man whom he liked or tadeus law. thought well of. Thus this man made a law to facisfie his anger, and others also did confirme law for debuy lands of numbers, and so transferred it from the right and lawfull heires: whereby a few lands by men in flort time being made very rich, immediatly after there fell out great pouerty in the city of Sparta, which made all honelt sciences to ceasie, and brought in the reupon vnlawfull occupations, who enuied them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remained not aboue feuen hundred natural citizens of Sparta in all, and of them, not about an hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the rest were poore people in the city, and were of no countenance nor calling, and befides that, went vnwillingly to the warres against their enemies, looking euery day for firre and change in the city. Agustherefore thinking it a notable good act (as indeed it was) to replenish the city of Sparta againe, and to bring in the old equalitie, he moved the matter about to vnto the citizens. He found the youth (against all hope) to give good eare vnto him, and very reduce the well given vnto vertue, easily changing their garments and life, to recover their liberty againe. common But the oldest men, which were now even rotten with coverous field and corruption, they were bet excited to be are in the same and corruption. affraid to returne againe to the straight ordinances of Lycurgus, as a slaue and runnigate from estate. his master, that trembleth when he is brought backe againe vnto him. Therefore they reproucd Agis, when he did lament before them their present miserable estate, and wish also for the former ancient honour and true dignitie of Svarta. Howbeit Lyfander the sonne of Lybis, and Mandroclidas the sonne of Ecphanes, and Agesilaus also, greatly commended his noble defire, and perfwaded him to go forward withall. This Ly (ander was of great authoritie and estimation amongst them in the city, Mandreelidas was also very wise, and carefull about any matter of counsell, and with his wisdome and policy, very valiant: Agestlans in like manner, thekings vnckle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and couerous, and yet prickt forward to give his furtherance to this attempt as it appeared, by his some Hippomedon, who was a noble good fouldier, and could do very much, by meanes of the love and good will the young men did beare him. But indeede, the secret cause that brought Agesilans to consent vnto this practife, was the greatnesse of his debt which he ought, of the which he hoped to be discharged by changing of the state and common wealth. Now when Agu had wonne him, he fought by his meanes to draw his mother also vnto the matter, which was Agestaus fifter. She could do very much by the number of her friends, followers, and debtors in the city, by whose meanes she ruled the most part of the affaires of the city after her owne pleasure. But the young man Hippomedon making her privie vnto it, at the first she was amazed withall, and bade him hold his peace if he were wife, and not meddle in matters vnpoffible & vnprofitable. But when Ageflans had told her what a notable act it would be, and how easily in might be brought to passe, with maruellous great profit: and that king Aga began alfoto straine her with great intreatie, that the should willingly depart with her goods to win her sonne honor and glory: who though he could not in mony and riches come to be like vnto other kings (because the slaues & factors only of the kings Seleucus, and Ptolomy, had more money then all the kings of Sparta had together that euer raigned) yet if in temperance, thriftinesse, and noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he could come to restore the LACED EMONIAN'S againe vnto equalitie, that then indeed he should be counted a noble king. These women being stirred vp with ambition by those perfwafions of the young man, feeing him so nobly bent, as if by the gods their minds had secretly bin inflamed with the love of vertue, did presently alter their minds in such fort, that they them.

How lauing the Lacede monians were pato their

felues did pricke forward Agis, and fent for their friends to pray and intreate them to fauour his enterprise: and furthermore they brought on other women also, knowing that the LACEDE. MONIANS did euer heare and beleeuetheir wives, fuffering them to vnder stand more of theaffaires of the state then they theselues did of their private estate at home. Herein is to be consisdered, that the most part of the riches of LACED EMON was in the hands of the women, and therefore they were against it, not onely because thereby they were cut off from their finenesse and excesse, in the which being ignorant of the true good indeed, they put all their felicity: but also because they saw their honour and authoritie which they had by their riches, cleane troden vnder foore. Therefore comming to Leonidas, they did perswade him to reproue Agis, because he was elder manthen he, and to let that this enterprise went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in fauour of the rich, but fearing the common people, who defired nothing but alteration, he durst not openly speake against him, but secretly he did the best he could to hinder Agis practife talking with the Magistrates of the city, and accusing Agis vnto them, he told them how he did offer the rich mens goods vnto the poore, the division of their lands, and the abolishings of all debts, for reward to put the tyranny into his hands, and that thereby he got a strong guard vnto himselfe, but not many citizens vnto Sparta. This not with standing, king Agu hauing procured Lyfander to be chosen one of the Ephores, he presently preserved his law vnto the counsell. The articles whereof were these: That such as were in debt, should be cleared of all their debts, and that the lands also should be deuided into equal parts: so that from the valley of Pallena vnto mount Taugetus, and vnto the cities of Malea and Selasia, there should be foure thousand fine hundred parts; and without those bounds, there should be in all the rest, fifteene thousand parts, the which should be distributed vnto their neighbours meete to cary weapon; and the rest vnto the natural Spartans. The number of them should be replenished with their neighbors and strangers in like maner, which should be very well brought vp, and be able men besides to serue the common wealth: all the which afterwards should be deuided into sifteene copanies, of the which, some should receive two hundred, and others foure hundred men. & should live according to the old ancient institution observed by their ancestors. This law being preferred vnto the Senate, the Senators grew to diverse opinions vponit. Whereupon Lylander affembled the great counsell of all the people, and there spake vnto them himselfe, and Mandroclidas, and Agefilaus also, praying them not to suffer the honor of Sparta to be trodenynder foote, for the vanitie of a few: but that they would remember the ancient Oracles of the gods. warning them to beware of auarice, as of the plague and destruction of the commonwealth; and of the late Oracle also brought vnto them, from the temple of Passphae. The temple & Oracle of Pasiphae, was famous at the city of Thalames: & some fay, that Phasiphae was one of the daugh. ters of Atlas, which was gotten with child by Inpiter, and was delinered of a fon called Hammon; Other thinke that it was Cassandra, one of king Priamus daughters that died there, which was surnamed Paliphae, because she gaue all the answers and Oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth that Daphne the daughter of Amyela, flying from Apollo that would have ravished her. was turned into a lawrel tree, and honored by Apollo with the gift of prophecy, So, they faid that this Oracle of the god commanded them, that the Spartans should againe returne vnto their former ancient equality, stablished first by Lyourgus law. When every man else had spoken, king Agu rifing vp, briefly speaking vnto the people, said: that he would bestow great contributions for the reformation of this common wealth, which he was defirous to restore again. For first of all, he would make common all his arable & pasture he had, and besides that he would adde too fixe hundred talents in ready mony, and fo much should his mother, grandmother, kinsmen, and friends, all the which were the richest and wealthiest in Sparta. When the people heard what he faid, they maruelled much at the noble mind of this yong king, and were very glad of it, faying:that for three hundred yeares space together, the city of Sparta had not so worthy a king as he. But Leonidas contrarily affaired with all the power he could to refift him, thinking with himselfethatif king Agis purpose tooke place, he should also be compelled to do as he did, and yet he should have no thankes, but king Agis: because that all the Spartans indifferently shold be compelled to make their goods common, but the honor should be his onely that first began, it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had bene a good and just man, or not. Agis answered that he had bene. Then replyed Leonidas, Did you ever see that he had taken away and abolished any debts, or had received strangers into the number of the citizens of Sparta? Who

AGIS AND CLEOMENES 803 contrarily thought his commonwealth unperfect, if al strangers were not banished the city. Agis againe answered him: that he maruelled nor that Leonidas being brought vp in a strange countrey and also maried there in a noblemans house, he should be ignorant of Lyenrem lawes, who banishing gold and filter out of his city, did therewithall exile debt and lending. And for ftrangershe hated them that would not conforme themselues vnto the manners and fashions of life which he inflituted, and those they were which he banished; not for any ill will he bare vnto their perfons, but because he feared their manners of life, lest that mingling them with the citizens, they should make them run after vanity & couctous heffe to berich. For otherwise, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all strangers, were maruellously reuerenced and honored in Sparta in old time, because they did fing in their writings, the self same things which Lycurque had established in his lawes. And thou thy selfe also doest comend Exprepes, being one of the Ephores, because he did cut with a hatchet the two strings which Phrynis the musician had added vinothe citherne, more then the feuen common ftrings, and those also which did the like vinto Timosheus: and yet thou reprouest me, because I go about to roote out all excesse and pride out of Sparta, as though those men did not farre off preuent that these superfluous strings of the musicke, delighting the citizens minds too much with their fongs, should not cause them fall vn. to fuch trade and maner of life, as should make the city at discord with it felfe. After this contention the common people did sticke vnto king Agis, and the rich men followed Leonidas: praying and persuading him not to for sake them: & further, they did so intreate the Senators, in whom confifteth the chiefe authority, to determine and difgeff all matters before they be propounded vnto the people, that they overthrew the law by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lyfander who was yet in office, attempted to accufe Leonedas by an ancient law, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules should marie with any strange woman, nor beget children of her: and faid further, that no man youn paine of death should dwel any where, but in Sparta. When he had instructed others to object these things against Leonidas, he with others of his colleagues observed a figure in the element, the ceremony whereof was in this fort; Euery ninth yeare, the Ephori chusing a bright night without moone-light, did fit downe in some open place, and beheld the starres in the element, to fee if they faw any starre shoote from one place to another; if they did, then they accused their kings that they had offended the gods, and did deprine them of their kingdom, vntil fome Oracle came fro Delphes or Olympus, to restore them again. Zyfunder then declaring that he had feen a ftar flie in the element, did therfore accuse king Leonidas, and brought forth witnesses against him, how he had maried a woman of Asia, the which one by Lyfanof king Selencus Lieutenants had given him in mariage, and that he had two children by her; and der. afterwards being for faken of his wife that refused him, he returned again into his courty against his wil, and had fo possessed the kingdom for lacke of a lawful heire. So following his accusation in this maner against him, he allured Cleombrotus his son in law, being also of the kings bloud, to make title to the crowne. Leonidas being afraid of the fuccesse hereof, took fanctuary in the temple of Iuno, firnamed Chaleacos, and his daughter with him, who for fooke her husband Cleon, brotus. Leonidas then being cited to appeare in person, & making default, they deposed him, & made Chembrotus king. In the meane time Lyfanders office expired, and the new Ephori which fucce- Leonides ded him, did deliuer Leonidas againe, and accused Lysander and Mandroelidas, because against the his king. law they had abolished all debts, and had againe made new division of lands. When they faw dome. they were openly accused, they incensed both the kings, that joyning together, they shold make the Ephores ordinances of no effect; declaring that their authority was onely erected for the difcord of the two kings, because they should give their voices vnto that king that had the best iudgement and reason, when the other would wilfully withstand both right and reason: and therfore they two agreeing together, might lawfully do what they would, without controlment of any person and that to result the kings, was a breaking of the law, sith that by right the Ephori had no other priviledge and authority, but to be Judges and arbitratours between them, when there was any canfe of iarre or cotroucrfie. Both the kings being caried away by this perswasion, went into the market place accompanied with their friends, plucked the Ephores from their feats and put others in their roomes, of the which Agefilaus was one. Furthermore they armed a great number of young men, and opening the prilons, did fet the priloners at libertie: the which made their aduerlaries afraid of them, doubting some great murder would have followed vpon first met it, howbeit no man had any hurt. For Agefilaus being bent to kill Leonidus, who fled to the Teges.

city of TEGEA, and having also layed men in waite for him by the way: king Agis hearing of it. fent thither other friends of his in whom he put great confidence, & they did accompany Leonidas, and brought him fafely vnto the city of TEGEA. Thus their purposetaking effect, and no man contrarying them, one man onely Agesilaus ouerthrewall, and dashed a noble LACONIAN law by a shamefull vice, which was concrousnesse. For he being a great landed man, and having the best lands of any man in the countrey, and owing a great summe of money besides, would neither pay his debts, nor let go his land. Wherefore he perswaded king Agis, that if he went aboutto stablish both together, he should raise a great vprore in the city, and with all, if he did first win them that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting off of debts onely, then that they would eafily and willingly also accept the law of partition of lands. Lyfander was also of this opinion: whereby king Agis and he both were deceived by Agefilaus fubrilty. So they commanded all the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, and bils of debt (which the LA-CEDÆMONIANS do call Claria) into the market place, & there laying them on a heape together they did set fire on them. When the vsurers & creditors saw their writings obligatory on a fire. they departed thence with heavy hartsibut Agefilaus mocking them faid, he never faw a brighter fire in his life. The people then requiring that the lands also should be presently decided, and the kings likewise commanding it, Igesilaus still interposing some cause of let, delayed time, untill oportunity served, that king Agis should go to the warres: for that the Achaians their confederates had prayed aide of LACEDEMON, being bound thereunto by the league confirmed betweene them, because they looked daily that the ATOLIANS coming through the countrey of MEGARA, would invade PELOPONNESUS. Aratus Generall of the Achaians had leavied a great army to withstand their inuasion, and had also written vnto the Ephores, that they should fend then aide. Whereupon they presently sentking Agis, perceining also the readinesseand good will of the fouldiers which were appointed to go with him: for the most part of them were young men and needy, who feeing themselves discharged of the searc of their debts, and hoping also at their returne, that the lands likewise should be deuided among them, they went with glad hearts, and were obedient to king Agis. So that the cities where through they passed, wondred how they came through Peloponnesvs, from the one fide to the other, very quietly, without noise or offence to any man. Likewise many Grecians calling to mind the ancient times, told one another, that it was a noble fight then to fee the army of LACED ÆMON whethey were led by Agesilaus, Lysander, and Leonidas, famous Captaines: fith now they saw so great obedience vnto Agis by his fouldiers, who was in manner the youngest man of all his campe: who also glorying to be content with litle, to away with paines, and not to be more costly apparrelled, and armed then any private fouldier he had, he wanne himselse thereby a maruellous love of the people. Howbeitthe rich men liked not this change, and were afraid least Agis should give other people example to rife also, and to do the like with theirs, as he had done. Agis meeting with Aratus by the city of Corinth, cuenas he was confulting whether he should fight with his enemy, or not, shewed himselfe in his counsell then, no rash, but a resolute and valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, and not to suffer the warre to come any farther, leaving y entry into Peloponnesvs free to their enemy:neuertheleffe, that he would do what Aratus thought good, because he was the elder, and Generall also of the A-CHAIANS, whom he came not to command, but to aide them. But Baton SINOPIAN Writeth that king Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he had not read that which Aratus had written for his excuse & instification, alledging there that the farmers and husbandmen having brought all the corne into their barnes, he thought it better to suffer the enemics to come farther into their countrey, rather then to hazard battell, to the losse of the whole countrey of Peloponnesvs, and that therefore he licenced all the confederates to depart, and brake vp his army. Soking Agis returned home againe, greatly honoured of them that served with him in his journey, finding the citie of Sparta then in great broile and trouble. For Agefilans at that time being one of the Ephores, finding himself ridde of the seare which before kept him vnder, cared not what iniurie or mischiese he did vnto any citizen, so he might get money. For amongst other things, hat very yeare he made him pay beyond all reason the tallages and taxes due voto the common wealth for thirteene moneths, adding too the thirteenth moneth about the ordinary time of the yeare. Wherefore perceiuing euery man hated him, and being afraid of them he had offended, he kept fouldiers about him, armed with their fwords, and fo came downe into the market place among them. And for the two Kings, he made no account of the one; but of the other that was Agis, he feemed outwardly to make good account, rather for kindreds sake, then for his dignitie of a King; and furthermore gaue it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephores the next yeare following. Wherupon, his enemies speedily to preuent the danger, gathered force together, & openly brought king Leonidas fro Tega, to restore him agains to his kingdome. The people were glad to see that, because they were angry they had bin mocked in that fort, for that the lands were not deuided according vnto promife. Furthermore turneth Hippomidon was fo well beloued of every man for his valiantnesse, that intreating the people for frem exile his father Agestlaus, he faued his life, and got him out of the city. But for the two kings. Agis took fanctuary in the temple of Iuno Chalcacos; and Cleombrotus the other king fled into the temple of Neptune: for it feemed that Leonidas being much more offeded with him, did letking Agis alone, and went against him with certaine souldiers armed. Then he sharply taunted him, that being his fon in law, he had conspired against him to deprive him of his kingdom, and had driven him out of his country. But then Cleombrotus not having a word to fay, fat still, and made him no answer. Whereupon his wife Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the injury Theratural they did her father, & had left her husband Cleombrotus, that had vsurped & kingdom from him, to serue her father in his aduersitie, and while he was in sanctuary tooke part with him also of his day dayshmifery; and afterwards when he went into the city of TEGEA, wore blacks for forrow, being of. fended with her husband; she contrarily then changing her anger with her husbands fortune & her father and buying the horse and buying the shape and buying misery, became also an humble futer with him, sitting down by him, and imbracing him, hauing band, her two litle sonnes on either side of them. All men wondring, and weeping for pitie to see the goodnesse and naturall loue of this Lady, who shewing her mourning apparell, and haire of her head flaring about her eyes, bare headed, the spake in this maner vnto her farher: O father mine, this forowfull garment and countenance is not for pitie of Cleombrotus, but hath long remained the darghwith me, lamenting fore your former milery and exile: but now, which of the two should I ra- ter of Liether chuse, citherto continue a mourner in this pitifull state, seeing you againe restored to your kingdome, having ouercome your enemies, or else putting on my princely apparell, to see my husband flaine, vnto whom you maried me a maide? who if he cannot mone you to take compassion on him, and to obtain emercic, by the teares of his wife and children, he shall then abide more bitter paine of his enill councel then that which you intend to make him suffer. For he shall see fee his wife die before him, whom he loued more dearely then any thing in the world, Allo, with what face can I looke vpon other Ladies, when I could neuer bring my father to pitie by any intercession I could make for my husband, neither my husband intreate him for my father; and that my hap is to be borne a daughter and wife alwayes most vnfortunate, and despised of mine owner And for my husband, if he had any reason to do that he did, I then tooke it from him, by taking your part, and protesting against him: and contrarily your selfe doth give him honest colour to excuse his fault, when he seeth in you the defire of the kingdome so great, that for the louetherof, youthinke it lawful to kill your fonnes in law; and also not to regard the children he hathgotten, for her fake. Chelonis pitifully complaining in this fort, putting her face vpon Cleonbrotus head, cast her swollen and blubbering eyes vpon the standers by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a litle with his friends, he commanded Cleombrotus to get him thence; and to The banifly leauethe cities an exile : and prayed his daughter for his fake to remaine with him, and not to for lake her father, that did to dearly loue her, as for her take he had faued her husbands life. This long Clenotwithstanding, she would not yeeld to his request, but rising vp with her husband, gaue him one of his sonnes, and her selfe tooke the other in her armes; and then making her prayer before thealtar of the goddesse, she went as a banished woman away with her husband. And truly the example of her vertue was fo famous, that if Cleombrotus mind had not bene too much blinded with vaine glory, he had cause to thinke his exile farre more happy, to enjoy the loue of so noble lone of the a wife as he had, then for the kingdome which he possessed without her. Then Leonidas having husband banished king Cleombrotus out of the citic, and removing the first Ephores, had substituted other cleombroin their places, he presently bethought him how he might craftily come by king Agis. First, 1996. he perswaded him to come out of the fanctuary, and to governethe kingdome safely with him, declaring vnto him that his citizens had forgiuen him all that was past, because they knew he was deceived, and subtilly circumvented by Agestans craft, being a young man, ambitious of honour. Agis would not leauethe fanctuary for Leonidas cunning perswasion, but miltrusted

all that he said vnto him. Wherefore Leonidas would no more beguile him with faire words. But Amphares, Demochares and Arcefilam, did oftentimes go to visite king Agis; and otherwhile also they got him out of the fanctuary with them vnto the bath, and brought him backe againe into the temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares having borowed not long before, certain rich apparell and plate of Agefistrata, because he would not redeliuer them againe, he determined to betray king Agrs, his mother & grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefly did serve Leonidas turne, and prouoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) against Agis. Now therfore, Agis keeping al the rest of his time within the temple, saving when he went vpon occasion to the bath, they determined to intercept him by the way, & to take him when he was out of the sanctuary. So they watched him one day when he came and bathed, and came and faluted him as their maner was, and seemed to accompany him, sporting & being merry with him, as with a yong man their familiar. But when they came to the turning of a streete that went towards the prison, Amphares laying hold on him, being one of the Ephores, faid vnto him: I arrest thee Agis, and will bring thee before the Ephores, to give account of thy doings in the commonwealth. Then Demochares which was a great mightie man, cast his gowne ouer his eares, and pulled him forward: othersalfo thrust him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no man being neare them to helpe Agis, they got him into prison. Then came Leonidus incontinently with a great number of fouldiers that were strangers, & besetthe prison round about. The Ephores went into the prison, and sent vnto some of the Senate to come to them, whom they knew to be of their mindsthen they commanded Agis, as if it had bene judicially, to give account of the alteration he had mad in the commonwealth. The yong man laughed at their hypocrific. But Ampha estold him, that it was no laughing sport, & that he should pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephares feeming to deale more favorably with him, and to shew him a way how he might escape the condemnation for his fault, asked him if he had not bene entited vnto it by Agestlans and Lysander. Agis aufwered that no man compelled him, but that he onely did it to follow the steps of the ancient Lyeurgus, co bring the commonwealth vnto the former estate of his graue ordinance and institution. Then the same Senator asked him again, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The yong man boldly answered him, that he would never repent him of so wise and vertuous an enterprife, though he ventured his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, and commanded the Sergeants to cary him into the Decade, which was a place in the prison wherethey were strangled that were condemned to die. Demochares perceiving the Sergeants durst not lay hold on him, and likewise that the souldiers which were strangers, did abhorre to commit such a fact contrary to the law of God & man, to lay violent hands vpon the person of a king, he threatned and reuiled them, and dragged Agis perforce into that place called the Decade. Now the rumor ranne straight through the cirie, that king Agis was taken, and a multitude of people were at the prison doores with lights and torches. Thirher came also king Agis mother and grandmother, threeking out, and praying that the king of Sparta might yet be heard and judged by the people. For this cause they hastened his death the sooner, and were afraid besides, lest the people in the night would take him out of their hands by force, if there came any more people thither. Thus king Agis being led to his death, spied a Sergeant lamenting and weeping for him, vnto whom he faid: Good fellow, I pray thee weepe not for me, for I am an honester man than they that so shamefully put me to death; and with those words he willingly put his head into the halter. Amphares then going out of the prison into the street, found Agesistrata there, king Agis mother, who straight fell downe at his feete but he taking her vp againe, in old familiar manner, as being her very friend, told her that they should do king Agis no hurt, and that she might if she would, go and fee him. Then she prayed that they would also let her mother in with her. Amphares said, With a good will: and so put them both into the prison house, and made the doores be shut after them. But when they were within, he first gaue Archidamia vnto the Sergeants to be put to death, who was a maruellous old woman, and had lived more honorably vnto that age then any Lady or Matron beside her in the citie. She being executed, he commanded Agefistrata also to come in. Who when she saw the body of her dead son layed on the ground, and her mother also hanging on the gallowes, she did her selfe helpe the hang-manto plucke her downe, and layed her body by her fonnes. Then having covered her in decent maner, the layed her downe on the ground by the corpes of her sonne Agis, and kissing his cheeke, said: Out alas my fon, thy great modestie, goodnesse and elemency brought thee and vs vnto this death.

Then Amphares peeping in at the doore, to see what was done, hearing what she said, came in withall in a great rage, and faid: I perceive that thou hastalso bene of counsell with thy son, and fithence it is fo, thou shalt also follow him. Then she rising also to be strangled, faid: The gods grant yet that this may profit Sparta. This horrible murther being blowue abroad in the city. and the three dead bodies also brought out of prison, the feare though it were great amongst the people, could not keepe them backe from apparent fliew of griefe, and manifest hate against Leonidas and Amphares, thinking that there was never a more wicked and crueller tact committed in SPARTA, fince the DORIANS came to dwell in PELOPONNESVS. For the very enemies them- The enemies felices in battel, would not willingly lay hands upon the kings of LACED EMON, but did for beare did not as much as they could possible, both for feare & reuerence they bare vnto their maiestic. For in willingly many great battels & conflicts which the LACED EMONIANS had againft the GRECTANS, there king of Lee was neuer any king of Laced Amon flainc before Philips time, but Cleombrotus only, who was flain with a dart at the battel of Levernes. Some write also that the Messinians hold opinion, that their Aristomenes flue Theopompus: howbeit the LACEDEMONIANS faid, that he was but hurt, not flaine. But hereof there are divers opinions; but it is certaine that Agis was the first king whom the Ephores cuer put to death, for that he had laied a plot of a noble deuice, and worthy of Sparra, being of that age when men do eafily pardon them that offend and was rather to be accused of his friends then of his enemies, because he had saued Leonidas life, and had trusted other men, as the best natured yong man that could be.

Now Agis having suffered in this fort, Leonidas was not quicke enough to take Archidamns Herebester his brother alfo, for he fled prefently wet he brought Agis wife out of her house by force, with a nubcleslitle boy she hadby him, and maried her vnto his sonne Cleomenes, who was yet vnder age to menes life. matry; fearing lest this young Ladie should be bestowed elsewhere, being indeed a great heire, the some of and of arich house, and the daughter of Gylippus, called by her name Agiatis; besides that, she was the fairest woman at that time in all GRECE, and the vertuousest, and best conditioned. Wherefore for divers respects she prayed she might not be forced to it. But now being at length maried with Cleamenes, she ever hated Leonidas to the death, and yet was a good and louing wife vnto her young husband: who immediatly after he was maried vnto her, fell greatly in fancie with her, and for compassions sake (as it seemed) he thanked her for the love she bare king agin vnto her first husband, and for the louing remembrance she had of him, in so much as he him. with marifelfe many times would fall in talke of it, and would be inquisitive how things had passed, ca- ea who cleaners. king great pleasure to heare of Agis wife counsell and purpose. For Cleomenes was as defirous of honour, and had as noble a mind as Agis, and was borneal so to temperancie, and moderation of life, as Agis in like manner was: howbeit, he had not that shamefast modestie and lenitie which the other had, but was fomewhat more stirring of nature, and readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it great honeflie to bring the citizens (if he could) to be contented to live after an honest fort but contrarily, he thought it no dishonest ic to bring them vnto good life, by compulfion also. Furthermore, the manners of the citizens of Sparta giuing themselues ouer to idlenesse and pleasure, did nothing like him at all; neither that the king did suffer the commonwealth to be ruled as they listed, so no man impeached his pleasure, and that they did let him alone: in so much as no man regarding the profite of the commonwealth, euery man was for himfelfe and his family. And contrarily, it was not lawfull for any man to speake for the exercises of the youth, for their education in temperancie, and for the refloring againe of equalitie of life, the preferment whereof was the onely cause of the late death of Agis. They say also, that Cleamenes being a yong stripling, had heard some disputation of Philofophy, when & Philosopher Spharus, of the country of Borysthenes, cameto Laced Amon, and louingly stayed there to teach yong men and children. He was one of the chiefest scholers principles to the chiefest scholers of the chiefest of Zenon Citian, and delighted (as it seemed) in Cleomenes noble mind, and had a great defire of Boryto pricke him forward vnto honour. For as it is reported, that the ancient Leonidas being demanded what Poet he though Tyrtaus to be, answered, he was good to flatter young mens minds: for he fet their hearts on fire by his verses, when they began to fight any battell, fearing no danger, they were fo encouraged by them. So the Stoicke discipline is somewhat dangerous, for the stout and valiant minds, which otherwise doth make desperate: and when they are ioyned vnto a graue and gentle nature, first it lifteth vp his heart, and then maketh him tast the profite thereof. Now Leonidas (the father of Cleomenes) being deceassed, and he himselfe also the richmen followed their pleasure and profite, taking no care for the common wealth, that the poore men also for very want and need, went with no good life and courage to the warres, neither cared for the bringing vp of their children; and that he himselfe had but the name of a king, and the Ephori the absolute authoritie to do what they lifted; at his first coming to his kingdome, he determined to alter the whole state and government of the common wealth. Who having a friend called Xenares, that had bene his louer in his youth (which the LACED EMO-NIANS called Empnisha, as much as inspired) he began to found his opinion, asking what maner of man king Agis had bin, and by what reason, and whose aduice he had followed in his attempt for the reformation of the commonwealth, Xenares at the first did not willingly rehearse these things vnto him, declaring enery thing what had passed. But when he found that Cleomenes was affected vnto king Agis intent, and still defired to heare of it, then Xenares sharply and angerly reproued him, and told him he was not wife, nor well aduifed : and at length would no more come and talke with him as he was wont; yet making no man priuy why heabstained from com. ming to him, but told them that asked him, he knew a cause well enough why. Xenares now hauing thus refused him, and thinking all the rest would do the like: to bring this matter to passe, he tooke this resolution with himselfe. Because he thought he might the rather do it in warre, then in peace, he set the citie of Sparta and the Achaians at variance together: who did themselues give the first occasion to be complained upon. For Araba being the President and chiefe of althe Achaians, had practifed a long time to bring al Peloponnesus into one bodie: and had therefore onely fustained great troubles in warres, and at home in peace: thinking that there was no other way to deliuer them from forraine warres. Now when he had wonne all the other people to be of his opinion, there remained no more but the ELIANS, the LACE.

DEMONIANS, and a few of the Arcadians, which were subject to the Laced Emonians. When king Leonidas was dead, Aratus began to invade the ARCADIANS, those specially that bordered vpon the Argives to proue how the Laced Emontan's would take it, making no account of Cleomenes, being but a young king, and had no experience of warres. Thereupon the Ephori fent Cleomenes vnto Athænium (a temple of Minerua hardby the citie of Bribina) with an armie to take it, because it was a passage and entry into the countrey of LACONIA; howbeit the place at that time was in question betwixt the Megalipolitans and the Laced #.

MONIANS. Cleamenes got it, & fortified it. Aratus making no complaint otherwise of the matter, ftole out one night with his army to fet vpon the Tegeans and Orchomenians, hoping to hauetaken those ciries by treason. But the traitors that were of his confederacie, their hearts failed them when they should have gone about it, so that Aratus returned, having lost his journey, thinking that this secret attempt of his was not discouered. But Cleomenes finely wrote vnto him as his friend, and asked him, whether he had led his armie by night. Aratus returned answer againe, that vinderstanding Cleomenes meant to fortifie BELBINA, he went forth with his armie, thinking to haue let him. Cleomenes wrote againe vnto him, and faid, he did beleeue that which hespake was true: howbeit he carnestly requested him (if it were no trouble to him) to aduertife him why he brought scaling ladders and lights after him. Aratus smiling at this mocke, asked what this young man was. Democrites LACED EMONIAN being a banished man out of his

countrey, answered: if thou hast anything to do against the LACED EMONIANS, thou hadst need make hast, before this young Cockrell haue on his spurres. Then Cleomenes being in the field in the countrey of Arcadia, with a few horsemen and three hundred sociemen onely, the Ephori being afraid of warres, fent for him to returne againe. His backe was no fooner tur-

after the Achaians making warre with the Elians, Cleomenes was fent to aide them, and mer Tho faying with the armie of the Achains by the mountaine Lyceum, as they were in their returne the of the lings fetting vpon them, gaue them the ouerthrow, flue a great number of them, and tooke many also montouth prisoners that the rumor ran through GRECE, how Aratus self was flain. Cleomenes wisely taking ingtheire. the occasion which this victory gaue him, he went straight to the city of MANTINBA, and taking it ypon a sudden, when no man knew of his comming, he put a strong garrison into it. Now the LACED EMONIAN'S hearts failing them, and refifting Cleomenes enterprises, ouer wearying them with warres, he went about to fend Archidamus, king Agis brother, being then at ME ssina, vnto whom the kingdome of right belonged by the other house; supposing that he shold cafily weaken the power of the Ephores, by the authority of the two kings, if both of them iovned together. Which when the murtherers of king Agis vnderstood, being afraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be reuenged of them, they fecretly received him into the citie, and found the meanes to bring him into Sparra. But when they had him, they put him ftraight to death, whether it was vnwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainely testifieth) or elle with his prinitic suffering them to make him away, by perswasson of his friends. But it is die broa cleare case, the city was burdened withall, because probable matter fell out, that they had compelled Cleomenes to do it. Neuerthelesse, he holding, still his sirst determination, to alter the flate of the common wealth of Sparta, as foone as he could possible, he fo fed the Ephores with money, that he brought them to be contented he should make warre. He had also wonne many other citizens by the meanes of his mother Crateficlea, who furnish thim with mony, that helacked not to honour him withall: and further maried as it is reported (though otherwise she meant not to marry) for her fons fake, vnto one of the valiantest men of all the citie. So Cleomenes leading his army into the field, wan a place within the territorie of MEGALIPOLIS, called LEVETRA. The ACHAIANS also being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus, they straight foughta battellby the citie felfe, where Cleamenes had the worst on the one side of his armic. Howbeit Araus would not fuffer the Achaians to follow them, because of bogges and quanemires, but founded the retraite. But Lysiadas a MEGALIPOLITAN being angry with al caufed the horfemen he had about him to follow the chafe, who purfued fo fiercely, that they came amongst vines, wals and ditches, where he was driven to disperse his men, and yet could not get out. Cleomenes perceiving it, fent the light horsemen of the TARENTINES and CRETANS against him: of whom Lysiadas valiantly fighting was slaine. Then the LACED EMONIANS Lysiadas being couragious for this victory, came with great cries, and giuing a fierce charge upon the A. faine. CHAIANS, Ouerthrew their whole armie, and flue a maruellous number of them: but yet Cleomenes at their request suffered them to take up the dead bodies of their men to burie them. For the Athai Lysiadas corpes, he caused it to be brought with him, and putting a purple robe vpon it, and a ans. crown on his head, fent it in this array vnto the very gates of the city of MEGALIPOLIS. It was that felfe Lyfiadas, who giving over the tyranny and government of MEGALIPOLIS, made it Lyfiadasya popular state, and free citie, and to ynedit to the Achaians. After this victory, Cleomenes that ram of Mes. determined greater matters and attempts, perswaded himselfe that if he might once come to flablish the affaires of the common welch at Sparta to his mind, he might then easily ouer- bustrants, come the ACHAIANS, brake with his father in law Megistonus, and told him that it was neces- and made farie to take away the authoritie of the Ephores, and to make division of the lands among the fare. Spartans: and then being brought to equalitie, to encourage them to recouer the Empire of GRECE again vnto the LACED EMONIANS, which their predecessors before them held and enloyed. Megistonus granting his good will and furtherance, loyned two or three of his friends morevnto him. It chanced at that time, that one of the Ephores lying in the temple of Pasiphae, The dreams had a maruellous dreame in the night. For he thought he faw but one chaire franding where of one of the the Ephori did vie to fit to give audience, and that the other foure which were wont to be there, Ephores. were taken away; and that maruelling at it, he heard a voice out of the temple that faid, That was the best for Sparta. He declaring this dreame the next morning vnto Cleomenes, it somewhat troubled him at the first, thinking that he came to feele him, or that he had heard some inkling of his intent. But when he perswaded himselfe that the other meant good saith, and lyed not vinto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpole; and taking with him vnto the camp, all those Spartans which he suspected to be against his enterprise, he went and took the cities of Hen &A and ALSEA, confederates of the ACHAIANS, & victualled upon the Ephori incontinently sent Cleomenes backe againe with his armie: who tookethe fort of Methydrivm, and burnt the borders of the Argives. The Achaians came against him the countre; with an armie of twentie thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemenled by Aristomachus. Cleomenes met with them by the citie of PALANTIVM, and offered battell. But Aratus quaking at gines. the hardinesse of this young man, would not suffer Aristomachus to hazard battell, but went his way derided by the Achaians, and despised by the Laced Memonians, who in all were not aboue five thousand fighting men. Cleamenes courage being now lift vp, and brauely speaking to his citizens, he remembred them of a faying of one of their ancient kings, that the LACE-D. # MONIAN'S neuer enquired what number their enemies were, but where they were. Shortly Orchomena, and went and camped before the city of Mantinea. In fine, he so wearied and ouerharried $\foatin Laced \pm Monians by long journeys, that at length they belought him he wold let them remaine in AR CADIA, to repose themselves there. In the meane time, Cleomenes with his ftrangers which he had hired, returned again vnto Sparta, and imparted his intent by the way vnto them he trusted best, and marched at his owne case, that he might take the Ephores at supper. When he came neare vnto the citic, he fent Euryclidas before, into the hall of the Ephores.

as though he brought them newes out of the campe from him. After him, he fent also Tbe-ricion and Phebis, and two other that had bene brought up with him, whom the LACED EMO-

NIANS called the SAMOTHRACIANS, taking with them a few fouldiers. Now whileft Euryclidus was talking with the Ephores, they also came in vpon them with their fwords drawne, and did fer vpon the Ephores. Agefilaus was hurt first of all, and falling downe, made as though he had bene flaine; but by litle and litle he crept out of the hall and got fecretly into a chappell confecrated vnto Feare, the which was wont cuer to be kept flut, but then by chance was left open; when he was come in he shut the doore fast to him. The other foure of the Ephores were slaine presently.

and about ten moe befides, which came to defend them. Furthermore, for them that fate still and stirred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keepe any man that was defirous to go out of the cities but moreouer, they pardoned Agestlans, who came the next morning out of the chappell of Feare. Amongst the Laced Emonians in the citie of Sparta, there are not onely temples of Feare and Death, but also of Laughter, and of many other such passions of the mind.

They do worship Feare, not as other spirits and diuels that are hurtfull, but because they are perfwaded that nothing preserveth a common wealth better than feare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Aristotle witnesseth) when they are created, do by publike proclamation command all the Spartans to shaue their chinnes, and to obey the law, lest they should make them feeletheri-gour of the law. They brought in the shauing of their chins, in my opinion, to enure you men to obey the Magistrates even intrifles. Moreover, it seemes that men in old time did esteeme fortitude to be notaking away of feare, but rather a feare and lothnesse to incurre shame. For commonly those that are most afraid to offend the law are in the field most valiant against their enemie, and shunno perill to winne fame and honest reputation. And therefore it was wisely

That feare cannot be without shamefastnesse. And so Homer in a certaine place made Hellen say vnto king Priamus: Of truth I do confesse deare father in law. You are the man of whom I stand in aw.

And reverence most of all that ever I saw. And in another place, speaking of the GRECIAN souldiers, he faith thus !

For men do vie to renerence them whom they feare. And this was the cause why the chappell of The chaptel Feare was by the hall of the Ephores, having in maner a princely and absolute authoritie. The next morning Cleamenes banished by trumpet foure score citizens of Sparta; and ouerthrewall the chaires of the Ephores but one onely, the which he referued for himselfe to sit into give audience. Then calling the people to counfell, he gaue them account of his doings, and The oration told them that Lycurgus had joyned the Senators with the kings, and how the citie had bene gouerned a long time by them, without helpe of any other officers. Notwithstanding afterwards the city hauing great warres with the MESSINIANS the kings being alwayes employed in that warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the commonwealth at home, did chuse certaine of their friends to fit in judgement in their fleads, to determine controversies of law, which Sha Zohores. were called Ephores, and did gouerne long time as the kings ministers; howbeit that afterwards, by litle and litle, they tooke vponthem absolute gouernment by themselues. And for manifest proofe hereof, you see that at this present time when the Ephori do send for the king, the first and second time he refused to come, but the third time he riseth and goeth vnto them. The first man that gaue the Ephores this authoritie, was Asteropus, one of the Ephores, many yeares after the first institution of the kings : and yet if they had gouerned discreetly, peraduenture they might hauc continued longer. But they licentiously abusing their authoritie, by supdefire to restore that noble and former blessed gouernment vnto Sparta againe; all these things I say, are in no wisc to be suffered any longer. And therefore if it had bin possible to haue bani-Thed all these plagues of the commonwealth out of Sparta, brought from forraine nations, (I meane, pleasures, pastimes, money, debts, and vsuries, and others yet more ancient, pouertie and riches) he might then have efteemed himselfe the happiest king that ever was, if like a good Phisitian he had cured his country in that infection without griefe or forow. But in that he was constrained to begin with bloud, he followed Lyeurgus example, who being neither king nor other Magistrate, but a private citizen onely, taking vpon him the authoritie of the king, boldly came into the market place with force and armed men, and made king Charilaus that then reigned, so affraid, that he was driven to take sanctuarie in one of the temples. But the king being a Prince of anoble nature, and louing the honour of his countrey, tooke part with Lycurgus, adding to his aduice and counsell, for the alteration of the state of the government of the common wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lyourgus faw it was a hard thing to alter the commonwealth without force & feare: the which he not with standing had vsed with as great modestie and discretion as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profite and wealth of LACED EMON, giving all the lands of the countrey alfoto be equally devided amongst them, and setting all men cleare that were in debt. And furthermore, that he would make a choice and proofe of the strangers, to make them free citizens of Sparta whom he knew to be honest men, thereby to defend their city the better by force of armes to the end that from henceforth we may no more fee our countrey of LACONIA spoiled by the ATOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lacke of mento defend themselues against them. Then he began first him- cleoments selfe to make all his goods common and after him Megistonus his father in law, and consequently all his other friends. Then he caused the land also to be deuided, and ordained enery banished the state of the land are the state of the land are the land ar man a part, whom he himselfe had exiled, promising that he would receive them again into the monwealth citie, when he had established all things. So when he had replenished the number of the citizens of Lacedaof Sparta, with the choicest honest mentheir neighbours, he made foure thousand footemen well armed, and taught them to vie their pikes with both hands, in stead of their darts with one hand, and to carie their targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwards he tooke order for the education of children, and to restore the ancient LACONIAN discipline againe: and did all these things in manner by the helpe of Spherus the Philosopher. Insomuch as he had quickly set vp again schoole-houses for children, and also brought them to the old order of diet: and all, but a very few, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old institution of life. Then because the name of one king should not offend any man, he made his brother Euclidas king with him. But this was the first time that euer the two kings were of one housebut then. Furthermore, vnderstanding that the Achaians and Aratus were of opinion, thathe durst not come out of LACED EMON, for feare to leaue it in peril of revolting, because of the late change & alteration in the commonwealth, he thought it an honourable attempt of him to make his enemies see the readines and good will of his army. Therupon he inuaded the terri- cleoments tories of the MEGALIPOLITANS, and brought away a great prey and bootie, after he had done imade the great hurt vnto his enemies. Then having taking certaine plaiers and minstrels that came from the briders of the Me. Messina, he set vp a stage within the enemies country, made agame of 40 Minas for the victor galipolina. and fate a wholeday to looke vpon them, for no pleasure he tooke in the fight of it, but more to despite the enemies withall, in making them see how much he was stronger then they to make fuch a Maygame in their owne country, in despite of them. For otherwise of all the armies of the GRECIANS, or kings in all GRECE, there was no armie but his only that was without players, minstrels, fooles, and inglers; for his campe onely was cleane of such rabble and foolerie, and all the young men fell to some exercises of their bodies, and the old men also to teach them. And if they chanced to have any vacant time, then they would pleafantly be one merric with another, ingining some pretie fine mocke after the LACONIAN manner. And what profite they got by that kind of exercise, we have written it at large in Lycurgus life. But of al these things, the king himself was their schoolemaster and example, shewing himselfe very temperate of life, and menes the plaine without curiofitie, no more then any private souldier of all his campe: the which were teacher and great helps vnto him in his enterprises he made in GRECE. For the GRECIANS having cause of fuite and negotiation with other kings and princes, did not wonder so much at their pompe and riches, as they did abhor and detest their pride and insolencie: so distantially they would answer Zzz 4

Cleomenes leadeth his army against An ratus and the Athaians.

them that had to do with them. But contrarily when they went vnto Cleomenes, who was a kind in name and deed as they were, finding no purple robes nor stately mantles, nor rich imbrodered beds, nor a Prince to be spoken to but by messengers, gentlemen vshers, and supplications and yet with a great ado: and feeing him also come plaintly apparelled vnto them, with a good countenance, and courteoufly answering the matters they came for the thereby did martielloufly win their hearts and goodwils, that when they returned home, they faid he only was the worthic king that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his diet at his boord, that was very straight and LACONIAN like, keeping onely three boords: and if he chanced to feast any Ambassadours or other his friends, that came to see him, he then added too, two other boords; & besides made his men see that his fare should be amended, not with pastrie and conserues, but with more store of meate, and some better wine then ordinarie. For he one day reproued one of his friends, that bidding strangers to supper, he gaue them nothing but blacke broth, and browne bread only, according to the LACONIAN manner. Now, faid he, we may not vie strangers so hardly after our manner. The boord being taken vp, another litle table was brought with three feet, whereupon they fet a bowle of copper full of wine, and two filuer cups of a pottle a peece, and certain other few filuer pots befides: fo euery man dranke what they lifted, and no man was forced to drink more then he would. Furthermore, there was no fport, nor any pleasant fong sung to make the companie merry, for it needed not. For Cleomenes felfe would entertaine them with some pretie questions or pleasant tale: wherby, as his talke was not seuere and without pleasure, so was it also pleasant without insolencie. For he was of opinion, that to win men by gifts or mony as other kings & princes did, was but base and coynclike; but to seek their good wils by courteous meanes and pleasantnesse, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought most fit and honorable for a Prince. For this was his mind, that there was no other difference betwixt a friend and hireling, but that the one is won with money, and the other with civilitie and good entertainment. The first therefore that received king Cleomenes into their citie, were the MANTINE-ANS, who opened him the gates in the night, and helping him to drive out the garrifon of the A-CHATANS, they yeelded themselues vnto him. But he referring them to the vse and gouernement of their owne lawes and liberty, departed from thence the same day, and went vnto the citie of TEGEA. Shortly after, he compassed about ARCADIA, and came vnto PHERES in ARCA-DIA, determining one of the two, either to give the ACHAIANS battell, or to bring Aratus out of fauour with the people, for that he had fuffered him to spoile and destroy their countrey. Hyperbatas was at that time Generall of the Acharans, but Aratus did beare all the sway and authoritic. Then the Achaians coming into the field with all their people armed, and encamping by the citic of DYME's neare vnto the temple of Hecatombaum, Cleomenes going thither, lay betwixt the city of DYMEs that was against him, and the campe of his enemies, which men thought a very vnwise part of him. Howbeit valiantly prouoking the ACHAIANS, he procured them to the battell, ouerthrew them, made them flie, and flue a great number in the field, and took many of them also prisoners. Departing from thence, he went & set vpon the city of LAN-GON, and draue the garrifon of the Acharan's out of it; and restored the citic againe vnto the ELIANS. The ACHAIANS being then in very hard state, Aratus that of custome was wont to be their Generall (or at the least once in two yeares) refused now to take the charge, not with standing the Achaians did specially pray and increase hims the which was an ill act of hims to let another steere the rudder in so dangerous a storine and tempest. Therefore the Acharas sent Ambassadors vnto Cleomenes to treat peace, vnto whom it seemed he gave a very sharpe answer. After that he fent vnto them, and willed them only to refigne the figniorie of GRECE vnto him: and that for all other matters he wold deale reasonably with them, & presently deliver them vp their townes and prisoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The Achaians being glad of peace with these conditions, wrote vnto cleamenes that he should come vnto the city of Lerna, where the diet and generall affembly should be kept to confult thereon. It chanced then that Gleomenes marching thirther, being very hote, dranke cold water, and fel on fuch a bleeding withall, that his voice was taken from him, and healmost stifled. Wherefore he sent the Achaians their chiefest prisoners home againe, proroging the Parliamont till another time, and returned backe to LACED EMON. It is supposed certainely, that this let of his coming to the diet, was the only cause of the vtter destruction of GRECE: the which otherwise was in good way to have rifen againe, to haue bene deliuered from the present miseries, and extreme pride and couctousnesse of the Macedonians. For Aratus, either for that hetrusted not Cleanenes, or for that he was affraid of his power, or that he otherwise enuied his honour and prosperitie, to see him rifen to fuch incredible greatnesse in so short a time; and thinking it also too great shame and dishonour to him, to suffer this yong man in a moment to deprive him of his great honour and power, which he had poffeffed fo long time, by the space of thirtie yearestogether, ruling all GRECE: first he sought by force to terrifie the ACHATANS, and to make them breake off from this peace. But infine, finding that they little regarded his threates, and that he could not preuaile with them, for that they were affraid of Cleomenes valiantnesse and courage, whose request they thought reasonable, for that he sought but to restore Paloponnesvs vnto her former ancient state againe; he fell then into a practife farre vnhonest for a GRECIAN, very infamous for himfelfe, but most dishonourable for the former noble acts he had done. For he brought Anti- Aratus gonus into Grece, and in his age filled the country of Peloponnesvs with Macedonians, becomere whom he himself in his youth had driven thence, had taken from them the castle of Corinth, and had alwaies bene an enemy of the kings (but specially of Antigonus, of whom before he had fpoken all the ill he could, as appeareth in his writings, faying that he tooke maruellous paines, and did put himselfe into many dangers, to deliver the city of ATHERS from the garrison of the Macedonians.) And yet notwith standing he brought them armed with his owne hands, not into his countrey onely, but into his owne house, yea euen into the Ladies chambers and closets: disdaining that the king of LACED EMON, descending of the bloud royall of Hercules (who fetting vp againe the ancient manner of life of his countrey, did temper it as an instrument of mulicke out of tune, and brought it to the good, ancient, and fober discipline, and Dortean life inftituted by Lycargus) should be called and written king of the Sickonians, and of the TRICE # IANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with browne bread & with the plain course caps of y LACED EMONIANS, and that went about to take away riches (which was the chiefest matter they did accuse Cleamenes for) and to prouide for the poore, he went and put himselfe and all Achaia vnto the crowne and diademe, the purple robe, and proud imperious commandement of the MACEDONIANS, fearing left men should thinke that Cleomenes could command him. Furthermore his folly was fuch, that having garlands of flowers on his head, he did facrifice vnto Antigonus, and fing fongs in praife of his honor, as if he had bin a god, where he was but a rotten man confumed away. This that we have written of Aratus (who was indued with many noble vertues, and a worthy GRECIAN) is not fo much to accuse him, as to make vs fee the frailtie and weaknesse of mans nature; the which, though it have never so excellent vertues, cannot yet bring forth fuch perfect fruite, but that it hath euer fome maime and blemish. Now when the Achaians were met againe in the citie of Ar Gos, to hold the session of their parliament before proroged, and Cleamenes also being come from TEGEA, to be at that parliament, enery man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before on the chiefest articles of the capitulations with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by faire words or force would grant the people to bring that he defired, fent to let him understand, that he should but come himselfe alone into the citie, and for safety of his person, they would give him three hundred hostages: or otherwise, if he would not leaue his armie, that then they would giue audience without the city, in the places of exercises, called Cyllarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their answer, he told them they had done him great wrong, for they should have aduertifed him of it before he had taken his journey, and not now when he was almost hard at their gates, to fend him backe againe, with a flea in his care. Thereupon he wrote a letter vnto the Councell of the ACHAIANS, altogether full of complaints against Aratus. On the other sidealso, Aratus in his Oration to the counsell, inueighed with bitter words against Cleomenes. Thereupon Cleomenes departing with speede, sent an Herauld to proclaime warres against the A-CHAIANS, not in the citie of ARGOS, but in the citie of ÆGION, (as Aratus writeth) meaning to fet vpon them being vnprouided. Hereupon all Achara was in an vprore: for divers cities did prefently revoltagainst the ACHAIANS, because the common people hoped after the divifion of lands, and discharging of their debts. The Noblemen also in many places were offended With Aratus, because he practised to bring the MACE DONTANS into the country of PELOPON-NESVS. Cleamenes therefore hoping well for all these respects brought his army into Achara, and at his first comming tooke the citic of PALLENA, and draue out the garrison of the ACHAI-ANS: and afterthat, wan also the cities of PHENEVM, and PENTELIVM. Now the ACHAIANS

fearing some treason in Corinth and Sicyone, sent certainehorsemen out of the citie of AR GOS, to keepe those cities. The ARGIVES in the meane time, attending the celebration of the feast at the games Nemcea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to Ar Gos, he should find the citie full of people that were come to see the feasts and games, and that assailing them vpon the sodaine, he should put them in a maruellous feare: brought his army in the night hard to the wals of the city of Ar gos, and at his first coming wan a place they call Aspis, ave. ry strong place about the Theater, and ill to come vnto. The ARGIVE's were so amazed at it, that no man would take vpon him to defend the city, but received Cleomenes garrison, and gave him twenty hostages, promising thenceforth to be true confederates vnto the LACED EMONIANS, vnder his charge and conduct. The which doubtlesse wan him great same, and increased his power: for that the ancient kings of LACEDÆM ON, could never before with any policie or denice, winne the city of ARGO's . Forking Pyrrhus one of the most valiantest & warlikest Princes that euer was, entring the city of ARGOS by force, could not keepe it, but was flaine there, and the most part of his army: wherby enery man wondered greatly at the diligence and counsell of Cleomenes. And where enery man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes faid that he would follow Solon and Lyeurgus, in making the citizens goods common, and discharging all debts: they were then clearely perfwaded, that he only was the caufe and meane of that great change which they faw in the courage of the Spartans, who were before so weake and our of heart, that they hauing no courage to defend themselues, the Atolians entring Laconia with an armie, tooke away at one time fifty thousand slaues. Wherupon an old man of Sparta pleasantly said at that time, that their enemies had done them a great pleasure, to rid their courty of Laconia of such a rabble of rascals. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former ancient discipline of Lyoungus, as if Lyoungus selfe had bene aline to hanerrained them vnto it, they showed themselves very valiant, and obedient also vnto their Magistrates; whereby they recovered again the commandement of all GRECE, and the countrey also of PELOPONNESVS. After Cleomenes had taken the city of Argos, the cities also of CLEONES & PHLIVNTHodid yeeld themselves Virto him. Aratus in the meane time remained at Corinth, and there did bufily accuse them which were suspected to fauour the LACED EMONIANS. But when newes was brought him that ARGOS westaken, and that he perceived also the city of CORINTH did leane vnto Cleomenes pare, and draue away the Achaians, he then calling the people to counsell in Corinth, fecretiv fole to one of the gates of the citie, and caufing his horse to be brought vnto him, took his backe, & gallopped for life vncothe city of SICYONE. When the CORINTHIANS heard of it, they tooketheir horsebacks also, striving who should be there soonest, & posted in such hast vnto Cleemenes at the city of An Gos, that many of the (as Aratus writeth) killed their horses by the way:howbeit Cleomenes was very much offended with them, for that they hadler him scape their hands. But dratus faith further, that Magistonus came vnto him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great summe of money to deliuer him the castle of Corinta, wherein there was a great garrifon of the Achaians. But he answered againe, that things were not in his power, but rather that he was subject to their power. Now Cleomenes departing frothe city of ARGOS, ouercame the Troezenians, the Epidavrians, and the Hermionians. After that, he came vnto Corinth, and presently intrenched the castlethere round about, and sending for Aratus friends and factors, commanded them to keepe his house and goods carefully for him; and fent Trytimallus MESSINIAN againe vnto him, to pray him to be contented that the castle might be kept indifferently betwixt the Achaians and Laced Amonians, promifing him prinatly to double the pension that king Ptolomy gaue him. But Aratus refusing it, sent his sonne vnto Antigonus with other hostages, and perswaded the Achaians to deliver vp the castle of CORINTH into Antigone hands. Cleomenes understanding it, entred with his armie into the country of the Steventans, and destroyed it as he went, and took Aratus goods and money of the gift of the Corint Hams Dycecres. Now Antigonus in the meane time being passed the mountaire of Gerania vinage me power, Cleomenes determined not to fortific the Isthmys or the fire cat of Fri apo rays, but the wayes of the mountaines of Onienes; determining to keepe cuer on or then coinft the Mac a donians, with intent to confume them rather by time then fig. about with an armic, so good fouldiers, and well trained as they were. Cleamenes solle ing ais gererranation, did put Antigonus to great trouble, because he had not in time prouded for corne, and could not win the passage by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with fuch guard and fouldiers. Then Antigonus ftealing fecretly into the hauen of LECH EVM. he was fourly repulted, and loft a number of his men; whereupon Cleomenes and his men being couragious for this victory, went quietly to supper. Antigonus on the other side fel into despaire to seehim brought by necessitie into such hard termes. Wherefore he determined to go to the temple of Iuno, and from thence to passe his armie by sea into the citie of Sicrone, the which required a long time, and great preparation. But the same night there came some of ziratus friends of the Augives, who coming from Angos by sea, broughtnewes that the An- The Ar-GIVE'S were rebelled against Cleomenes. The practifer of this rebellion was one Ariffoleles, who gives dorecassly brought the people vato it, that were already offended with Cleomenes, that had promised cleomenes. to passe a law for the clearing of debts, but performed it not according to their expectation. Wherefore, Aratus with a thousand and five hundred men which Antigonus gave him, went by fea vnto Epidavnym. Howbeit Arifloteles taried not his coming, but taking them of the citie with him, went and befreged the garrifon of the LACED EMONTANS within the castell, being aided by Timoxenus, with the ACHAIANS that came from SICYONE. Cleomenes receiving aduertifement hereof, about the fecond watch of the night; fent for Megistonus in hast, and commanded him in anger speedily to go and aide their menthat were in the citie of Argos. For it was Megistonus himselfe that promised Cleomenes the sidelitie of the Argives, and that kept him from driving them out of the citie, which he suspected. So sending him away forthwith withtwo thousand men, he attended Antigonus, and comforted the Corinthians the best he could: aduertifing them that it was but a little mutinie of a few, that chanced in the citic of Argos. Megistonus being come to Argos, and slaine in battell, fighting for the Laced E-MONIANS in garrison there, who being in great distresse, and scantable to keep the castel against the enemies) fent fundrie messengers vnto Cleomenes, to pray him to fend them immediate aide. Cleamenes then being affraid that the enemies having taken Argos, would stoppe his way to returne backe into his countrey, who having opportunitie fafely to spoile LACONIA, and also to befiege the citic felfe of Spanta that had but a few men to defend it, he departed with his clammes armie from Corinth. Immediatly after came Antigonus and tooke it from him, and put a loft sheeing ftrong garrifon into it. When Chemenes came before the citie of Angos, he scaled the walles, and breaking the vaults and arches of the place called Aspis, entred into the citie, and ioyned with his garrifon there, which yet refifted the Achaians: and taking other parts of the fame also, affiulted the walles, and cleared the streets in such fort, that not an enemie durst be feene, for feare of the archers of the CRETANS. In the meane time, when he faw Anticonus clements afarre off, coming downe the hilles into the valley with his footemen, and that his horsemen left the oute also came vpon the spurre into the citie, despairing then that he could any longer keepe it, he gatheredall his men together, and fafely going downe by the walles, retired without loffe of anie man. So, when in fhort time he had conquered much, and had almost wonne all within PELOPONNESVS, in shorter space also he loss all againe. For, of the confederates that were in his campe, fome did presently for sake him, others also immediatly after surrendred vp the townes vnto Antigonus. Cleomenes being thus oppressed with the fortune of warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the rest of his armie, newes came to him in the night from La-CED EMON, which grieued him as much as the loffe of all his conquefts: for he was aduertifed "of the death of his wife Agiates, whom he loued fo dearely, that in the middeft of his chiefest prosperitie & victories, he made often iourneys to Sparta to secher. It could not be but a marucllous griefe vino Cleomenes, who being a young man, had loft fo vertuous and faire a yong La- ling Cleon die, so dearely beloued of him; and yet he gaue not place to his sorrow, neither did griese ouercome his noble courage, but he vsed the selfe same voice, apparell, and countenance that he did before. Then taking order with his private captaines about his affaires, and having provided also for the fafety of the TEGEANS, he went the next morning by break of day vnto SPARTA. After he had privatly lamented & forowed for his wives death, with his mother and children, he prefently bent his mind againe to publike caules. Now Cleomenes had fent vnto Ptolomy king of A-GYPT, who had promifed him aide, but vpon demand, to have his mother and children in pledge. So he was a long time before he would for shame make his mother privile vnto it, and went oftentimes of purpose to let her vnderstand it: but when he came he had not the heart to breake it to her. She first suspecting the thing, asked Cleomenes friends, if her some had not somewhat to say vnto her, that he durst not vtter. Whereupon, in fine he gaue the venture, and brake the matter to her. When the heard it, the fell a laughing, and told him: Why, how cometh it to passe, that thou hast kept it thus long, and wouldest not tell me? Come, come, faid she. put me straight into a ship, and send me whither thou wilt, that this bodie of mine may do some good vnto my country, before crooked age confume my life without profite. Then all things being prepared for their journey, they went by land, accompanied with the armie, voto the head of Tænarus; where Cratesiclea being ready to imbarke, the tooke Chomenes aside into the temple of Neptune, and embracing and kiffing him, perceiuing that his heart yearned for forow of her departure, the faid vnto him: O king of LACED EMON, let no man fee for shame when we come out of the temple, that we have wept and dishonored Sparta: for that onely is in our power; as for the reft, as it pleafeth the gods so let it be. When she had spoken these words, and fashioned her countenance againe, the went then to take her ship with a little sonne of cleome. nes, and commanded the matter of the shippe to hoife faile. Now when she was arrived in A. hollageren. GYPT, and understood that king Ptolomy received Ambassadours from Antigenus, and werein talke to make peace with him; and hearing also that Cleomenes being requested by the Achar ANS to make peace with them, durst not hearken to it, and end that warre, without king Ptalomyes consent, and because of his mother: she wrote vnto him, that he should not spare to do any thing that should be expedient for the honour of Sparta, without feare of displeasing Piolomy. or for regard of an old woman, and a young boy. Such was the noble mind of this worthic Lady in her fonne Cleomenes aduerfitie. Furthermore, Antigonus having taken the citie of Tropa. and facked the other cities of ORCHOMENE & MANTINEA, Cleomenes feeing himselfe brought to defend the borders onely of Laconia, he did manumiffe all the ILOTES, (which were the flaues of Laced. Emon) paying flue Artica Minas a man. With that mony he made the fumme of flue hundred talents, and armed two thousand of these freed slaves after the Macedonian fashion to fight against the Levelspides (to wit, the white shields of Antigonus:) and then there fell into his mind a maruellous great enterprise, vnlooked for of euery man. The citicof MEGALIPOLIS) at that time being as great as Sparta, and having the aide of the Achaians. and Antigonus at hand, (whom the ACHAIAN's as it feemed had brought in, chiefly at the request of the MEGALIPOLITANS) Chomenes determining to facke this citie, and knowing that to bring it to passe, nothing was more requisite then celeritie, he commanded his souldiers to victual themselves for five dayes; and marching with the choise of all his armie towards Salasia, as though he had meant to have spoiled the AR GIFE's, fodainly turning from thence, he inuaded the countrie of the Megalipolitans; and supping by Roetivm, went straight by ELICVNTA vnto the citic. When he was come neare vnto it, he sent Panteus before with speede, with two bands of the LACEDEMONIANS, and commanded him to take a certaine peece of the wall betweene two towers, which he knew was not kept nor guarded, and he followed him alfo with the rest of his army coming on faire and softly. When Paneas came thither, finding not onely that place of the wall without guard or watch which Cleomenes had told him of, but also the most part of that side without defence, he tooke some part of the wall at his first coming, and manned it; and overthrew another place of it also, putting them all to the sword that did defend it : and then came Cleomenes, and was within the citie with his armie, before the MEGALI-POLITANS knew of his coming. At length, the citizens understanding that the citie was taken, some fled in hast, conveying such light things as came to hand, in so great a searciand the others also arming themselnes, ran together to resist the enemies. But though they valiantly fought to repulse them out of the citie, and yet preuailed not, they gave the rest leisure thereby to flie and faue themselves, so that there remained not behind aboue five thousand men; for all the rest were fled with their wines and children, into the citie of MESSINA. The most part of them also that fought with the enemies, faued themselues, and very few were taken, the chiefest whereof were Lyfandridas and Thearidas the noblest persons that were amongst the MEGALIPOLITANS; wherefore when the fouldiers had taken them, they brought them vnto Cleomenes. Lyfandridas when he faw Cleomenes a good way off, cryed out aloud vnto him: O king of LACED EMON, this day thou hast an occasion offered thee to do a more famous princely act then that which thou half already done, and that will make thy name also more glorious. Gleomenes musing what he would request: Well (quoth he) what is that thou requirest: One thing I will tell thee beforehand, thou shalt not make me restore your citie to you againe. Yet, quoth Lysandridas, let me request thus much then, that yedo not destroy it, but rather replenish it with friends and conse-

derates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you and that shall you do, giving the ME-GALIPOLITANS their city againe, and preferring fuch a number of people as have forfaken it. Cleamenes paufing a while, antiwered, It was a hard thing to beleeue that: but yet, quoth he, let Cleamenes honour take place with vs before profit. After that he fent an Herald straight vnto Messina ing. vnto them that were fied thither, and told them that he was contented to offer them their citie againe, so that they would become good friends & confederates of § LACED EMONIANS, forfaking the alliance of the Achaians. Philopamen would by no meanes fuffer y MEGALIPOLI-TANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleamenes, nor also to leave their alliance with the Achai-ANS: telling them, that he meant not to give them their citie againe, but to take them also with their citie: and therefore draue Thearidas and Lyfandridas out of Messina, that moved this practife. It was that Philopamen that afterwards was the chiefeft man of the ACHAIANS, and that wanne fuch fame and honour among the GRECIANS, as we have particularly declared in his life. This word being brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the city from spoyling vnrill that time, he was then fo throughly offended, that he gaue the goods in prey to the foldiers, fent away their goodly tables, images, and pictures vnto Sparta, and defaced the chiefest parts of the ci- cleameres their goodly tables, images, and pletures vitto or kata, and defact the entering factor ty, and then returned home againe, being afraid of Antigonus & the Achaians. Howbeit they theory of flirred not because of the parliament that was kept at that time in the city of ÆGIVM; where Megalipolis Aratus being in the pulpit for Orations, and holding his gowne a long time before his face, the people maruelling at it, willed him to tell what he ayled: he answered them: MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and razed by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the fod ainnesse of this great losic, straight brake off their parliament and assembly. But Antigonus thinking to aide them, sent presently for all his garrisons, who being long a comming, he willed them to stay where they were, and he himselfe taking a few soldiers with him, went vnto the city of An Gos. Therefore the second enterprise of Cleomenes seemeth at the first sight a very rash and desperate attempt: howbeit Polybius writeth, that it was an attempt of great wildome and policie. For Gleomenes vn- Cleomenes derstanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in garrisons in diverse places, and that An- fratagents. tigenus lay all the winter in the city of ARGOS with a certaine number of footemen that were firangers, he invaded the countrey of the Argives: with his armie, perswading himselfe, that cither Antigonus would for fhame come & fight with him, or if he did nor, that the he should put him in difgrace with the ARGIVES: which indeed came fo to passe. The ARGIVES seeing their country spoiled by Cleomenes, were in a maruellous rage, and gathering together at Antigonas lodging, they cried out vnto him, either to go into the field & fight with the enemie, or elfe if he were afraid, to refigne his office of Generall of Green vnto others that were valianter then himselfe. But Antigonus like a wife and excellent Captaine, thinking it a dishonorto him, rashly Awie car. to put himselfe in danger, and his friends also, though he were prouoked with many injuries and fairessiald to pur himfelte in danger, and his friends and strongs the were producted with many infinites and opprobrious words, would not go into the field, but flood conflant in his first determination.

The product of the conflant in the first determination of the conflant in the first determination of the conflant in the c Then Cleomenes having brought his armie hard to the walles of the city of Argos, and spoi- in hazard. led and destroyed the country, round about, without let or danger he safely returned homeagaine. Within a while after, Cleomenes being aduertised that Antigonus was come vnto TEGEA, with intent to innade the country of LACONIA, he going another way with his army (vnwitting to his enemies) they wondred when they faw him in the morning by the city of AR GOS, spoiling their country, and cutting down their corne, not with fickles or fwords as others do vie, but with long poles in forme of fithes, wher with the foldiers as they went sporting wise, ouerthrew and spoiled it. But when they came to the place of exercises in the suburbs, called Cyllabaris, certaine of the foldiers going about to have fet it on fire, Cleomenes would not fuffer them; and The modetold them, that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honeftly done, tation of Now Antigonia presently returned backe againe, being minded first to have gone directly to the to his enecity of AR gos but sodainly altering his mind, did campe vpon the top of hils and mountaines. Cleamenes seeming not to be afraid of him, sent Heralds to him to desire the keyes of the temple of Iuno, and then after he had done facrifice, he would depart his way. Thus mocking Antigonus, after he had facrificed vntothe goddesse, vnder the templethat was shut vp, he sent his army vnto PHLIVNTA; and having driven away the garrifon out of OLOGVNTA, he came vnto the city of ORCHOMENE, having not oncly encouraged his citizens, but gotten even amongst the enemies themselues, a same also to bee a noble Captaine, and worthie to mannage great affaires. For every man judged him to be a skilfull fouldier, and a valiant Captaine, that with the power of one only city, did maintaine warre against the kingdome of MACEDON, against all the people of PELOPONNESVS, and against the treasure of so great a king: and withall, not onely to keepe his own country of LACONIA vnfoyled, but far otherwife to hurt his enemies countries, and to take so many great cities of theirs. But he that first said, that money was the sinew of all things, spake it chiefly in my opinion, in respect of the wars. Demades the Orator said on a time, when the Athenians commanded certaine gallies should be put out of the arsenall into y sea, and presently rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked mony: He that rules the prowe, must first see before him: meaning, munition and victuals must be prouided, before the ships be set out. And it is reported also, that the ancient Archidamus, when the consederates of the Laced Emonians at the beginning of the war of Peloponnesus required, that they might be seissed at a certaine rate, answered: The charges of warre haue no certaine stint. For like as wreftlers that exercise their bodies continually in games, are better able to wreftle,& ouerthrow them with time, that have no strength but onely art and slight: even so king Antigonus, who by the greatnesse of his kingdome defrayed the charge of this warre, did weary and ouercome Cleamenes at the length, because he lacked mony, both to pay the strangers that served him, and also to maintaine his owne citizens. For otherwise doubtlesse the time serued his turne well, because the troubles that fell vpon Antigonus in his realme, did make him to be sent for home. For the barbarous people his neighbours, in his absence did spoyle and destroy the realme of Mac a Don, and specially the ILLYRIAN's of the high country that came downe then with agreat armie wherupon the Macedonians being spoyled & harried on al fides by them, they fent post vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If these letters had bin brought him but a little before the battell, as they came afterwards, Antigorus had gone his way, and left the Achaians. But fortune that alwaies striketh the stroke in all weightiest causes, gaue such speed and fauour vnto him, that immediatly after the battell was fought at Selasia, (where Cleamenes lost his armic and city) the very messengers arrived that came for Antigonus to come homesthe which made the ouerthrow of king Cleamenes fo much more lamentable. For if he had delayed battell but two daies longer, when the Mac B Don LANs had bene gone, he might have made what peace he would with the Achaians: but for lacke of money, he was driven (as Polybius writerh) to give battell with twenty thousand men, against thirty thousand: where he shewed himselfe an excellent and skilfull Captaine, and where his citizens also fought like valiant men, and the strangers in like case did shew themselues good soldiers. But his only ouerthrow was by the manner of his enemies weapons, and the force of their battell of footement But Phylarchus writeth, that treason was the cause of his ouerthrow. For Antigonus had appointed the Acarnanians, and the Illyrians, which he had in his army, to steale vpon the wing of his enemies army, where Euclidas, king Cleamenes brother was, to compasse him in belind, while I he did fet the rest of his men in battell. When Cleomenes was got vp vpon some hill to looker sout him, to see the countenance of the enemie, and seeing none of the Acarna-NIANS, nor f the ILLYRIANS, he was then afraid of Antigonus, that he went about some flracageme of warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whose charge was to take heede of strangemes and secret ambushes, and commanded him to looke to the rereward of his armie, and to be very circumspect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with money, told him that all was cleare in the rereward, and bad him looke to ouerthrow his enemies before him. Gleomenes trusting this report, set forward against Antigonus, and in the end, his citizens of Sparta which he had about him, gaue fuch a fierce charge vpon the squadron of the Macedonian footemen, that they draue them backe fine furlongs off. But in the meanetime, Euclides his brother, in the other wing of his armie, being compassed in behind, Cleomenes turning him backe, and seeing the ouerthrow, cried our aloud: Alas good brother, thou art but flaine, yet thou diest valiantly, and honestly, and thy death shall be a worthic example vnto all posterity, and shall be sung by the praises of the women of Sparta. So Euclides and his men being flaine, the enemies came straight to set vpon Cleomenes wing, Cleomenes then seeing his men discouraged, and that they durst no longer result the enemie, sted, and faued himselfe. Many of the strangers also that served him, were slaine at this battell: and of fixe thousand Spartans, there were left aliue but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned vnto Sparta, the citizens comming to fee him, he gaue them counfell to yeeld themselues vnto Autigonus the conquerour : and for himselfe, if either aline or dead he could do any thing for the honour and benefit of Sparta, that he would willingly do it. The women of the city also comming vnto them that flying had escaped with him, when he saw them vnarme the men, and bring them drink to refreshthem with, healfo went home to his own house. Then amaid of the house, which he had taken in the city of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had enregained cuer fince the death of his wife) came vnto him as her maner was, to refresh him comming hot from the battell: howbeit he would not drink though he was extreme dry, nor fit being very weary, but armed as he was, laid his armed croffe vpon a pillar, and leaning his head vpon it reposed himselfe a litle and casting in his mind all the waies that were to be thought of he tooke his friends with him, and went to the hauen of Gythium, and there hauing his ships which he had appointed for the purpose, he hoissed saile, and departed his way. Immediatly after his departure, came Antigonus into the city of Sparta, and courteously entreated the citizens and Antigonus inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor proudly despite the ancient honour and dignity of Sparta, but referring them to their owne lawes and gouernement: when he had facrificed to the gods for his victory, he departed from thence the third day, newes being brought him that the warre was very great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous people did spoile his country. Now a disease took him, whereof he died afterwards, which appeared attificke, mixtwich a The death forecatarre; but yet he yeelded not to his disease, and bare it out, that fighting for his countrey, of artigiand obtaining a famous victory, with great flaughter of the barbarous people, he might yet dye honorably, as indeed he did, by Philarchus testimony, who faith, that with the force of his voice usking of fiercely crying out in the middest of his fight, he tare his lungs and lights, worse then they were Mandon. before. Yet in the schooles it is said, that after he had won the battell, he was so ioy full of it, that crying out: O bleffed day, he brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, & a great feauer took him withall, thathe died of it. Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of Cleomenes the Isle of Cythera, went & cast anker in another Hand, called ÆGLALIA. Then determining Pelopome. to faile ouer to the city of CYRENA, Therycion, one of Cleomenes friends (aman that in warres fie. shewed himselfevery valiant, but a boaster besides of his ownedoings) tooke Cleamenes aside, Theoretical and faid thus vnto him: Truly ô king, we have loft an honorable occasion to die in battel, though of thereis, euery man hath heard vs vaunt and fay, that Antigonus should never overcome the king of Spar- vnto Clea-TA aline, but dead. A second occasion yet is offered vs to die, with much lesse honour and fame notwithstanding then the first. Whither do we faile to no purpose . Why do we flie the death at hand, and feeke it fo farre off: If it be no shame nor dishonor for the posterity and race of Hercules to serve the successors of Philip and Alexander, let vs saue then our labour, and long dangerous failing, and go yeeld our felues vnto Antigonus; who in likelihood will better vie vsthen Ptolomy, because the MACEDONIANS are farre more noble persons then the EGYPTIANS. And if we disdaine to be commanded by them which have overcome vs in battell, why then will we make him Lordof vs that hath not ouercome vs: in flead of one, to make vs inferiour vnto both, flying Antigonus, and serving king Ptolomy? Can we say that we goe into Agrer, in refpect to fee your mother there? A joyfull fight no doubt, when she shall shew king Prolomies wines her fon, that before was a king, a prisoner and fugitive now. Were it not better for vs, that hauing yet LACON IA our country in fight, and our fwords befides in our owne hands, to deliuer vs from this great mifery, and fo doing to excuse our selves with them that are slaine at SELASIA for defence of Sparta: then cowardly losing our time in ÆGYPT, to enquire whom Antigonus Cleomones left his Lieutenant and Gouernor in LACEDEMON? Therycion ending his oration, Cleomenes an- evation of fwered him thus. Doest thou thinke it a glory for thee to seeke death, which is the easiest matter, and the presentest vnto any man, that can be: and yet wretch that thouart, thou syes now more " cowardly and shamefully then from the battell? For diverse valiant men, and farre better then " our felues, haue often yeelded vnto their enemies, either by fome misfortune, or compelled by " greater number, and multitude of men: but he, fay I, that submitteth himselfe vnto paine and " miserie, or to reproach and praise of men, he cannot but confesse that he is ouercome by his own miserie, or to reproach and praise of men, he cannot but confesse that he is ouercome by his own miserie, or to reproach and praise of men, he cannot but confesse that he is ouercome by his own miserie. vnhappinesse. For when a man will willingly kill himselfe, he must not do it to be rid of paines death must and labour, but it must have an honourable respect and action. For to live or die for his owie rable rerespect, that cannot but be dishonourable: the which now thou perswadest me vnto, to make frest. me flye this prefent miserie we are in, without any honour or profit in our death. And therefore, I am of opinion, that we should not yet cast off the hope we hauero serue our country in time to come; but when all hope faileth vs, then we may eafily make our felues away when we

lift. Thereunto Therecion gaue no answer, but affoone as he found oportunity to flip from Cleamenes, he went to the fea tide, & flue himselfe. Cleomenes hoisting faile from the lle of AGIALIA. went into Africke, & was brought by the kings servants vnto y city of ALEXANDRIA. King Ptolomy at his first comming, gaue Cleomenes no speciall good, but indifferent entertainement. but after that he had shewed himselse to be of great wisdome and judgement, and that Ptolomy faw in the simplicity of his LACONIAN life, he had also a noble disposition and courage, nothing degenerating from the princely race and bloud of Heronles, and that he yeelded not to his aduersity, he tooke more delight in his company then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly that he had made no more account of him before, but had suffered him to be ouerthrown by Antigonus, who through this victory of him, had maruellously enlarged his honour and power. Then he began to comfort Chomenes, and doing him as great honor as could be, promifed that he would fend him with ships and money into GRECE, and put him againe into his kingdome: and further, gaue him an annuall pension in the meane time, of four eand twenty talents, with the which he fimply and foberly entertained himfelfe and his men about him : and bestowed all the rest vpon his countriemen that came out of GRECE into ÆGYPT. But now old king Ptolomy deceasing before he could perform the promise he made vnto Cleomenes, to send him into GRECE, the realme falling the into great laseinioufnesse, drunkennesse, & into the government of women, his case & misery was cleane forgot, ten. For the yong king his fon was fo given ouer to women and wine, that when he was most fober and in his best wits, he most disposed himself to make feasts and sacrifices, and to have the taber playing in his Court, to gather people together, like a stage player or ingler; whilest one Agathoclea his lemman, and her mother, and Oenanthes a band, did rule all the affaires of the state. But when he came to be king, it appeared he had need of Cleemenes because he was afraid of his brother Magas, who by his mothers meanes, was very wel efteemed of among foldiers. Wherefore he called cleamenes to him, and made him of his prinic Councell, where he denifed by pra-Etife, which way to kill his brother. All other his friends that were of counfel with him, did confell him to do it: but Cleamenes onely vehemently diffwaded him from it, and told him, that if it were possible, rather more brethrenshould be begotten vnto y king for the safety of his person, & for deuiding of the affaires of the kingdome between them. Amongst the kings familiars that were chiefest about him, there was one Sosibius that faid vnto Cleomenes : So long as his brother Magas lived, the fouldiers that be strangers, whom the king entertained, would never be true to him. cleomenes answered him, for that matter there was no danger: for, faith he, of those hired firangers, there are three thousand Peloponnesians, which he knew at the twinckling of an eye would beat his commandement, to come with their armour and weapon where he would appoint them. These words of Cleomenes at that time shewed his faith and goodwill he bare vnto the king, and the force he was of befides. But afterwards, Ptolomies fearefulnesse increasing his mistrust, (as it commonly happeneth, that they that lack wit, thinke it the best safetie to be fearefull of enery wagging of a straw, & to mistrust enery man) the remembrance of Cleomenes words made him much suspected of the Courtiers, vnderstanding that he could doe so much with the foldiers that were strangers: infomuch as some of them faid: See (meaning Cleomenes) there is a Lyon amongst sheepe. Indeed considering his fashions and behaulour, they might well say so of him: for he would looke through his fingers as though he saw nothing, and yet saw al what they did. In fine, he required an army & ships of the king: and vnderstanding also that Antigonus was dead, and that the Achaians & Arolians were at great wars together, & that the affairs of his country did call him home, all Peloponnesvs being in armes & vprore, he prayed that they would licence him to depart with his friends. But neuer a man would give care vnto him, & the king also heard nothing of it, because he was continually entertained among ladies, with banquets, dancing, and maskes. But Sofibias that ruled all the realme, thought, that to keepe cleomenes against his will, were a hard thing, and also dangerous: and to let him go also, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a stirring mind, and one that knew the vices & imperfections of their gouernment, he thought that also no safe way, sith no gifts nor presents that could be offered hin, could foften him. For as the holy bull (which they call in AGYPT, Apis) that is full fed in goo'lly pasture, doth yet defire to follow his natural course and liberty, to runne and leape at his pleasire, and plainely sheweth, that it is a griefe to him to be kept still by the Priest: even so the courtly pleasures did nothing delight Cleomenes, but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

It irkt his noble heart to fit at home in flothfull reft, When martiall matters were in hand, the which he liked best.

Now Cleamenes standing in these termes, there arrived in ALEXANDRIA One Nicagoras MESSI- Nicagoras Now Greeners reading in the termissing the arrivation of the state of ras on a time had fold Cleomenes certaine land, but was not payed for it, either because he had no so Cleome present money, or else by occasion of the warres which gaue him no leysure to make payment. "". Cleamenes one day by chance walking upon the fands, he faw Nicagor as landing out of his ship, being newly arrived; and knowing him, he curreoufly welcomed him, and asked what wind had brought him into AGYPT. Nicagoras gently faluting him againe, told him, that he had brought the king excellent horse of seruice. Cleomenes smiling, told him, Thou hadst bene better have brought him some curtifans and dancers, for they would have pleased the king better. Nicae or as faintly laughed at his answer, but within few daies after he did put him in remembrance of the land he fold him, and prayed him then that he would helpe him to mony, telling him that he would not have prest him for it, but that he had sustained losse by merchandise. Cleomenes anfwered him, that all his penfion was spent he had of the king. Nicagorus being offended with this answer, he went and told Sosibius of the mocke Cleomenes gaue the king. Sosibius was glad of this occasion, but yet defiring further matter to make the king offended with Cleomenes, he persivaded Nicagoras to write a letter to the king against Cleomenes, asthough he had conspired to take the city of CYRENA, if the king had given him ships, money, and men of warre. When Nicagor as had written this letter, he tooke ship, and hoised saile. Foure daies after his departure, Solibius brought his letter to the king, as though he had but newly received it. The king vpon fight of it, was so offended with Cleomenes, that he gaue present order he should be shut vp in a great house, where he should have his ordinary diet allowed him, howbeit that he should keepe his house. Cleaments, This grieued Clemenes much, but yet he was worse afraid of that which was to come, by this occasion: Ptolomy the son of Chrysermus, one of the kings familiars, who had oftentimes before bene alexantris very conversant & familiar with Cleomenes, and did frankly talke together in all matters, Cleomenes one day fent for him, to pray him to come vnto him. Ptolomy came at his request, and familiarly discoursing together, went about to disswade him from all the suspitions he had, and excufed the king all o for that he had done vnto him: fo taking his leaue he left him, not thinking that Chemenes followed him (as he did) to the gate; where he sharply tooke vp the soldiers, saying, that they were very negligent and careleffe in looking to fuch a fearefull beaft as he was, and to ill to be taken if he once scaped their hands. cleomenes heard what he said, and went to his lodging againe, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very words againe vnto his friends. Then all the Spartan's concerting their good hope into anger, determined to be reuenged of the iniury Ptolomy had done them, and to die like noble Spartans, not tarying till they should be brought to the shambles like far weathers, to be fold and killed. For it would be a great shame and dishonour vnto Gleomenes, having refused to make peace with Actigonus, a noble Prince & warrier, to tarie the kings pleafure till he had left his drunkennesse and dancing, and then to come and put him to death. They being fully refolued hereof, as you have cleamenes heard, king Ptolomy by chance went vnto the city of CANOBY s, and first they gave out in ALEX- practifeth ANDRIA, that the king minded to fet Cleomenes at liberty. Then Cleomenes friends observing the custome of the kings of ÆGYPT, when they meant to fet a prisoner at liberty (which was, to fend the prisoners ment. & presents before to their supper, did send vinto him such maner of presents & fo deceived the foldiers that had the keeping of him, faying, that they brought those presents from the king. For Cleamenes himselfe did facrifice vnto the gods, and sent vnto the souldiers that kept him, part of those presents that were sent vnto him, and supping with his friends that night, made merry with them, every man being crowned with garlands. Some fay, that he made the more haft to execute his enterprise fooner then he would have done, by means of one of his men that was priny vnto his conspiracy; who went every night to lie with a woman he kept, and therefore was afraid left he would bewray them. Cleomenes about noone, perceiuing the foldiers had taken in their cups, and that they were afleepe, he put on his coate, and vnripping it on the right shoulder, went out of the house with his sword drawne in his hand, accompanied with his friends, following him in that fort, which were thirty in all. Amongst them there was one called Hippotas, who being lame, went very lively out with them at the first: but when he saw they wentfaire & foftly because of him, he praied the to kil him, because they should not hinder their enterprise for a lame man, that could do them no seruice. Notwithstanding, by chance they mee with a townes man a horse back, that came hard by their doore, whom they pluckt fro his horse and cast Hippotas vpon him : and then ran through the city, and cryed to the people, Liberty, R. berty. Now the people had no other courage in them, but onely commended Cleomenes, and wondered at his valiantnesses but otherwise to follow him, or to further his enterprise, not a man of them had any heart in them. Thus running up and downe the towne, they met with Ptolomy (the same whom we said before was the son of Chinsermus) as he came out of the Court: whereupon three of them fetting on him, flue him prefently. There was also another Piolomy that was Gouernour and Lieutenant of the city of ALEXANDRIA: who hearing a rumour of this stirre. came vnto them in his coach. They went and met him, and first having driven away his guard and foldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his coach, and flue him also. After that they went towards the castle, with intent to set al the prisoners there at liberty to take their part. Howbeit the jaylors that kept them had so strongly locked up the prison doores, that Cleomenes was repulfed and put by his purpose. Thus wandering vp and downe the city, no man neither came to joyne with him, norto relift him, for every man fled for feare of him. Wherefore at length being weary with going up and downe he turned him to his friends, and faid vnto them: It is no maruel though women command fuch a cowardly people, that flie in this fort from their liberty. Thereupon he prayed them alto die like men, and like those that were brought up with him, and that were worthy of the fame of his fo noble deeds. Then the first man that made himfelfebe flaine, was Hippotas, who died of a wound one of the young men of his companie gaue him with a fword at his request. After him enery man flue themselves, one after another, Without any feare at all, fauing Panters, who was the first man that entred the city of MEGALI-The courage POLIS. He was a faire young man, and had bene very well brought wp in the LACONIAN difeipline, and better then any of his yeares. Cleamenes did loue him dearely, and commanded him that when he should see he were dead, and all the rest also, that then he should kill himselfelast of all. Now they all being layed on the ground, he fearched them one after another with the point of his fword, to fee if there were any of them yet left aliue; and when he had pricked Cleamenes on the heele amongst others, and faw that he did yet knit his browes, he kissed him, & sate downe by him. Then perceiving that he had yeelded up the ghoft, embracing him when he was dead, he also flue himselfe, and fell vpon him. Thus Gleomenes having reigned king of Sparta fixteeneyeares, being the fame manner of man we have described him to be, he ended his daies in this fort as ye heare. Now his death being presently bruited through the citie, Cratesielea his mother, though otherwise she had a noble mind, did not with standing a little forget her greatnes, through the extreme forrow she felt for the death of her son and so embracing Cleomenes sons, she fell to bitter lamentation. But the eldest of his sonnes (no man mistrusting any such matter) found means to get out of her hands, and running vp to the top of the house, cast himselfe headlong downe to the ground, that his head was all broken and splitted, yet died not, but was taken vp crying, and angry with them, that they would not fuffer him to die. This news being brought to king Ptolomy, he comanded they should first flea Cleomenes, and then hang up his body, and also that they should put his children, his mother, and all her women waiting on her to death, among the which was Panteas wife, one of the fairest and courteousest women in her time. They had not bene long maried before, when these mischiefes lighted vpon them, at what time their loue was then in greatest force. Her parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her husband, but had locked her vp, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit, shortly after she found the meanes to get her a horse, and some mony, and stole away in the night, and galloped towards. the hauen of Tanarus, where finding a ship ready bound for ÆGYPT, she imbarked and went to feeke her husband, with whom the gladly and louingly led her life, forfaking her owne country, to liue in a strange Realme. Now whethe Sergeants came to take Cratesicles to put her to death, Panteas wife led her by the arme, carying up her traine, and did comfort her; although Cratesiclea otherwise was not assaud to die, but only asked this fauor, that she might die before her litle children. This notwithstanding, when they came to the place of execution, the hangman first flue her children before her eyes, and then her felfe afterwards, who in fuch great griefe and forrow, said no more but thus : Alas my poore children, what is become of you? And Panteas wifealfo, being a mighty tall woman, girding her clothes to her, tooke vp the flaine bodies one after another, and wrapped them vp in fuch things as she could get, speaking neuera word, nor shewing any signe or token of griefe. And in fine, having prepared her selfe to die, and plucked off her attire her selfe, without suffering any other to come neare her, or to see her, but the hangman that was appointed to strike off her head, in this fortshe died as constantly, as the flourest man living could have done; and had so covered her body, that no man needed after her death to touch her, so carefull was she to her end, to keepe her honesty, which she had alwaies kept in her life: and in her death was mindfull of her honour, wherewith she decked her body in her lifetime. Thus these LACED EMONIAN Ladies playing their parts in this pitifull tragedy, contending at the time of death, even with the courage of the flaine Spartans their countrey men, which of them should dye most constantly, left a manifest proofe and testimony, that forume hath no power ouer fortitude and courage. Shortly after, those that were appointed to keepe the body of king Cleomenes that hung vpon the croffe, they fpied a great cleomenes screen wreathed about his head, that couered all his face, in fo much as no rauching fowle durst come nearchim to cate of it: whereupon theking fell into a superstitious scare, being afraid cross-bad that he had offended the gods. Hereupon, the Ladies in his court began to make many facrithat he had offended the gods. Hereupon, the Ladies in his court began to make many lattiwreathed fices of purification, for the clearing of this finne: perfivading themselines, that they had put about his amanto death beloued of the gods, and that he had fomething more in him then a man. The bead. ALEXANDRIANS thereupon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers vnto Cleomenes, as vnto a demy god, calling him the fonne of the gods: vntill that the learned men brought them from that errour, declaring vnto them, that like as of oxen being dead and rotten there breed bees, and of horse also come waspes, and of asses likewise bettels: euen so mens bodies, when the marow melteth and gathereth together, do bring forth Serpents.

TIBERIVS AND CAIVS Gracchi.

The worthines of Tibevius Gracchus the father. Tiberius Gracchus the father, Ow that we have declared vnto you the history of the lines of these two GRECIANS, Agis and Cleomenes aforesaid, we must also write the history of two Romaines; the which is no lesse lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chanced vnto Tiberius and Caius, both of them the fonnes of Tiberius Gracehus. He having bene twife Confull, and once Cenfor, and having had the honour of two triumphes, had notwithstanding more honour and fame onely for his valiantnesse, for the which he was thought worthy to marry with Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, who ouercame Hannibal after the death of his father:

though while he lived he was never his friend, but rather his enemy. It is reported, that Tiberius on a time found two fnakes in his bed, and that the foothfayers and wifards having confidered the fignification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and alfo to let them both escape, but one onely; affuring him that if he killed the male, he should not live long after; and if he killed the female, that then his wife Cornelia should die. Tiberius then louing his wife dearely, thinking it meeter for him also, that he being the elder of both, and she yet a young woman, should die before her, he flue the male, and let the female escape; howbeit he died soone after, leauing twelue children aliue, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her husband, taking vpon her the rule of her house and children, led such a chast life, was so good to her children, and of fo noble a mind, that every man thought Tiberius a wife man for that he she Graeshi died, and left her behind him. She remaining widow, king Ptolomy made fuite vnto her, and would have made her his wife and Queene: but the refuted, and in her widowhood loft all her children, but one daughter (whom the bestowed vpon the yonger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Cains, whose lives we prefently write. Those she carefully brought up, that they being become more civill, and better conditioned then any other Romaines intheir time, every man judged, that education prevailed more in them then nature. For, as in the fauours and pictures of Caffor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference difference, whereby a man may know that the one was made for wreftling, and the other for running: even so betweene these two yong brethiren, amongst other the great likenesse betweene them, being both happily borne to be valiant, to be temperate, to be liberall, to be learned, and to be nobly minded, there grew not with standing great difference in their actions and doings in the commonwealth: the which I thinke contenient to declare, before I proceed any further. First of all, for the fauour of the face, the looke and mouing of the body, Tiberius was much more mild and tractable, and Caius more hot and earnest. For the first in his Orations was very modest, and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMAINES was the first that in his Oration ictted up & dewnethe pulpit, and that plucked his gowne over his shoulders: as they write of Cleo ATHENIAN, that he was the first of all Orators

Orators that opened his gowne, and clapped his hand on his thigh in his Oration. Furthermore, Cains words, and the vehemency of his perswasson, were terrible and full of passion; but Tiberius words in contrarie maner, were mild, moued men more to compassion, being very proper, and excellently applied; where Caius words were full of finenesse and curiosity. The like difference also was between ethem in their fare and diet. For Tiberius alwaies kept a conuenient ordinarie; and Caius also in respect of other Romain Bs, lived very temperately, but in respect of his brothers fare, curiously and superfluously. Insomuch as Drusus on a time reproued him, because he had bought certaine Dolphins of silver, to the value of a thousand two hundred and fiftie Drachmaes for every pound weight. And now, as touching the maners and naturall dispofition of them both agreeing with the diversity of their tongues, the one being mild & plausible. and the other hot and cholericke: in so much that otherwhile forgetting himselfe in his Oration, against his will he would be very earnest and straine his voice beyond his compasse, and so with great vncomelinesse confound his words. Yet finding his own fault, he deuised this remedy. He had a feruant called Licinius, a good wife man, who with an instrument of musicke he had, by the which they teach men to rife and fall in their tunes, when he was jin his Oration, he ener stood behind him; and when he perceived that his masters voice was a litle too loud, and that through choler he exceeded his ordinary speech, he played a fost stop behind him, at the sound whereof Gains immediatly fell from his extremity, and cafily came to himselfe againe. And here was the diverfity betweene them. Otherwise, for their hardinesse against their enemies, inslice vnto their tenants, the care and paines in their offices of charge, and also their continency against volupruousnes, in all these they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nine yeares, by reafon whereof their fenerall authority and doings in the commonwealth fell out at fundry times. And this was one of the chiefest causes why their doings prospered not, because they had not both authority in one selfe time, neither could they io yne their power together: the which if it had met at one selfetime, had bene of great force, and peraduenture inuincible. Wherefore we must write particularly of them both, but first of all we must begin with the elder. He, when the came to mans state, had such a name & estimation, that immediatly they made him fellow in made Anthe colledge of the Priefts which at Rome are called Augures (being those that have the charge to confider of fignes & predictions of things to come) more for his valiantnes then for nobility. The same doth Appius Clodius witnesse vnto vs, onethat hath bene both Consull and Censor, and also president of the Senate, and of greater authority then any man in his time. This Appins ata supper when althe Augures were together, after he had saluted Tiberius, & made very much of him, he offered him his daughter in mariage, Tiberius was very glad of the offer, & therewithall the mariage was presently concluded betweene them. Thereupon Appius coming home to his house, at the threshold of his doore he called aloud for his wife, and told her: Antistia, I have dividantly bestowed our daughter Clodia. She wondering at it, O gods said she, & what needed all this haste ter. what couldest thou haue done more, if thou haddest gotten her Tiberius Gracchus for her husband: I know that some referre this history vnto Tiberius, father of these two men we write of, and vnto Scipiothe African: but the most part of writers agree with that we write at this prefent. And Polybous himself also writeth, that after the death of Scipio Afra can, his friends being met together, they chose Tiberius before all the other youg men of the city to mary him vnto Cornelia, being free, and unpromised, or bestowed upon any man by her father. Now Tiberius the yonger being in the wars in Africk & vnder Scipio the fecond, who had maried his fifter: Tiberius lying in the tent with him, he found his Captaine indued with many noble gifts of nature, Gracehus to allure mens hearts to defire to follow his valiantnesse. So in a short time he did excell all the fare. yong men of his time, as well in obedience, as in the valiantnesse of his person: in so much that he was the first man that scaled the wals of the enemies, as Fannius reporteth, who saith that he fcaled the wals with him, and did helpe him in that valiant enterprise. So that being present, all the campe were in love with him: and when he was absent, every man wished for him againe. Afterthis warrewas ended, he was chosen Treasurer, and it was his chance to goe against the Tiberius NYMANTINES, With Caius Mancinus one of the Consuls, who was an honest man, but yet had shown the worst lucke of any Captaine the Romaines had. Notwithstanding, Tiberius wisedome Quefor. and valiantnesse, in this extreme ill lucke of his Captaine, did not only appeare with great glory to him, but also most wonderfull, by the great obedience and reverence he bare vnto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did fo trouble and grieue him, that he could not tell himselfe

whether he was Captaine or not. For when he was overthrowne in great foughten fields, he departed in the night, and left his campe. The Nymantines hearing of it, first tooke his camp. and then ranne after them that fled, and fetting vpon the rereward, flue them, and enuironedall his armie. So that they were driven into firaight and narrow places, whereout they could by no meanes escape. Thereupon Mancinus despairing that he could get out by force, he sent a Herauld to the enemies to treate of peace. The NVMANTINES made answer, that they would trust no man but Tiberius onely, and therefore they willed he should be sent vnto them. They defired that, partly for the loue they bare vnto the vertues of the yong man, because there was no talke of any other in all this warre but of him: and partly alfo, as remembring his father Tiberius, who making warres in Spaine, and having there subdued many nations, he granted the Nyman-TINES peace, the which he caused the Romaines afterwards to confirme & ratific. Hereupon Tiberius was fent to speake with them, and partly obtaining that he defired, and partly also granting them that they required, he concluded peace with them, whereby affuredly he faued the liues of twenty thousand ROMAINE citizens, besides slaues and other stragglers that willingly followed the campe. This notwithstanding the NVMANTINES took the spoile of all the goods they found in the ROMAINES campe, among the which they found Tiberius booke of account touching the mony disburfed of the treasure in his charge. Tiberius being maruellous desirons to have his booke againe, returned backe to NVMANTIA with two or three of his friends only. though the army of the Romaines were gone farre on their way. So comming to the towne, he spake vnto the governours of the city, and prayed them to redeliner him his bookes of ac. count, because his malicious enemies should not accuse him, calling him to account for his doings. The NVMANTINES were very glad of this good hap, and prayed him to come into the towne. He standing still in doubt with himselfe what to do, whether he should goe into the towne, or not: the gouernours of the city came to him, and taking him by the hand, prayed he would think they were not his enemics, but good friends, and that he would trust them. Whereupon Tiberius thought best to yeeld to their persuasion, being desirous also to have his bookes againe, and the rather, for feare of offending the Nymantines, if he should have denied and mistrusted them. When he was brought into the city, they provided his dinner, and were yery carneft with him, intreating him to dine with them. Then they gave him his bookes againe, and offered him moreouer to take what he would of all the spoiles they had gotten in the campe of the Romaines. Howbeit of all that, he would take nothing but frankinsence, which he vsed, when he did any facrifice for his countrey; and then taking his leaue of them, with thankes he returned. When he was returned to Rome, all this peace concluded was vtterly misliked, as dishonorable to the maiestie of the Empire of Rome. Yet the parents and friends of them that had ferued in this warre, making the greatest part of the people, they gathered about Tibe. rim, faying, that what faults were committed in this seruice, they were to impute it vnto the Confull Mancinus, and not vnto Tiberius, who had faued fuch a number of ROMAINES lines. Notwithstanding, they that were offended with this dishonorable peace, would that therein they should follow the example of their forefathers in the like case. For they sent backetheir Captaines naked vnto their enemies, because they were contented the Samnir Es should spoile them of that they had, to escape with life. Moreover, they did not only send them the Captaines and Consuls, but all those also that bare any office in the field, and had consented vnto that condition: to the end they might lay all the periurie and breach of peace vpon them. Herein therefore did manifestly appeare, the love and goodwill the people did beare vnto Tiberius: for they gaue order, that the Confull Mancinus should be sent naked and bound vnto the NYMANTINES, and for Tiberius fake they pardoned all the rest. I thinke Scipio, who bare great sway at that time in Rome, and was a man of greatest account, did helpe him at a pinch, who not withstanding was ill thought of, because he did not also saue the Consul Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the NVMANTINES, confidering it was made by Tiberius his friend and kinfman. But these mislikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius friends, and certaine men, which stirred him vpagainst Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice between them, neither followed there any hurt vponit. And furely I am perswaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into those troubles he didafterwards, if Scipio African had bene present, when he passed those things he preferred. But Scipio was then in warres at the fiege of NVMANTIA, when Tiberius Vpon this occasion passed these lawes. When the Romaine's in old time had ouercome any of their neighbours, for ranfome they tooke oftentimes a great deale of their land from them, part. whereof they fold by the crier, for the benefit of the commonwealth; and part alfothey referred to their state as a demeane, which afterwards was let out to farme for a small rent yearely, to the poore citizens that had no lands. How beit the rich men inhanced the rents, and so beganne to thrust out the poore men. Thereupon was an ordinance made, that no citizen of Roma should haue about five hundred acres of land. This law for a time did bridle the couctoufnesse of the lutters. rich men, and did ease the poore also that dwelt in the countrey, ypon the farmes they had taken vn of the commonwealth, and so lived with their own, or with that their ancestors had from the beginning. But in processe of time, their rich neighbors, by names of other men, got their farmes ouer their heads, and in the end, the most of them were openly seene in it in their owne names. Whereupon, the poore people being thus turned out of all, went with faint courage afterwards to the warre, nor cared any more for bringing vp their children. So that in short time, the free men left ITALY, and flaues and barbarous people did replenish it, whom the rich men made to plough those lands which they had taken from the Romaines. Caius Lelius, one of Scipioes why Caius friends, gaue an attempt to reforme this abuse: but because the chiefest of the city were against Labus was him, fearing it would breake out to some vprore, he desisted from his purpose, & therfore he was called Lelius the wife. But Tiberius being chosen Tribune, he did forthwith preferre the reformation aforefaid, being allured vnto it (as divers writers report) by Diophanes the Orator, and Graebus Blessins the Philosopher; of the which, Diophanes was banished from the city of MITYLENE, and bane of the Blogius the ITALIAN from the city of CVMEs; who was scholler and familiar vnto Antipater of Poople. TARSVS at ROME, by whom he was honored for certaine works of Philosophy he dedicated unto him. And some also do accuse their mother Cornelia, who did twit her sons in the teeth, that the Romaines did yet call her Scipioes mother in law, and not the mother of the Gracchi. Other fay it was Spurius Polthumius, a copanion of Tiberius, & one that cotended with him in eloquece. For Tiberius returning from the wars, and finding him farre beyond him in fame and reputation, and well beloued of enery one, he fought to excell him by attempting this noble enterprife, and of so great expectation. His owne brother Cains in a certaine booke, wrote, that as he went to the wars of NVMANTIA, passing through THVSCAN, he found the countrey in maner vnhabited: and they that did follow the plough, or keepe beafts, were the most of them slaues, and barbarous people, come out of a strange country. Whereupon euer after it ranne in his mind to bring this enterprise to passe, which brought great troubles to their house. But in fine, it was the people only that most set his heart on fire to couet honor, and that hastened his determination: first bringing him to it by bils set up on every wall, in every porch, & upon the tombes, praying him by them to cause the poore citizens of Rome to have their lands restored, which were beloging to the comonwealth. This not with standing he himself made not the law alone of his own head, but did it by the counsell and aduice of the chiefest men of Rome, for vertue and csima- Counsellers tion: among the which, Craffus the high Bishop was one, and Autius Scanola the Lawyer, that to Tiberius then was Confull, and Appius Clodius his father in law. And truly it feemeth, that neuer law for preferwas made with greater fauour, then that which he preferred against fogreat iniustice and auarice. For those that should have bene punished for transgressing the law, and should have had Lex Agridthe lands taken from them by force, which they vniustly kept against the Law of Rome, & that should also have bene amerced for it, he ordained that they should be payed by the commonwealth to the value of the lands, which they held vniustly; and so should leauethem to the poore citizens againe that had no land, and lacked helpe and reliefe. Now, though the reformation established by this law, was done with such great fauour, the people not with standing were contented, and would forget all that was past, fo that they might have no more wrong offered them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of great possessions, hated the law for their anarice, and for spite and selfewill (which would not let them yeeld) they were at deadly food with the Lawyer that had preferred the law, and fought by all denice they could to difswade the people from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this law Agraria againe, to diflurbe the commonwealth, and to make some alteration in the flate. But they prevailed not: for Tiberius defending the matter, which of it selfe was good and just, with such eloquence as might haue iustified an euill cause, was inuincible; and no man was able to argue against him Orations, to confute him, when speaking in the behalfe of the poore citizens of Rome (the people beinggathered round about the pulpit for Orations) he told them, that the wild beafts through

. ITALY had their dens and caues of abode, and that the menthat fought, and were flaine for their country, had nothing else but aire and light; and so were compelled to wander vp and downe with their wines and children, having no resting place nor house to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do butmocke their fouldiers, when they encourage them in battell to fight valiantly for the graues, the temples, their owne houses, and their predecessors. For, said he, of such a number of poore citizens as there be, there cannot a man of them shew any ancient house or rombe of their ancestors : because the poore men do go to the wars, and be slaine for the rich mens pleasures & wealth; besides, they falsly call them Lords of the earth, where they have not a handfull of ground that is theirs. These and such other like words being vttered before all the people with fuch vehemency and troth, did so moue the common people withall, and put them in fuch a rage, that there was no aductfary of his able to with stand him. Therfore, leaving to contrarie and denie the law by argument, the rich men did put all their trust in Marcus Octanius. colleague & fellow Tribune with Tiberius in office, who was a graue and wife yong man, & Tiberius very familiar friend. So that the first time they came to him, to oppose him against the cofirmation of this law, he prayed the to hold him excused, because Tiberius was his very friend. But in the end, being compelled vnto it through the great number of the rich menthat were importunate with him, he did withfrand Tiberius law, the which was inough to ouerthrow it. For if any one of the Tribunes speake against ir, though althe other passe with it, he ouerthroweth its because they all can do nothing, if one of them be against it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this first favorable law, but in a rage preferred another more gratefull to the common people, as also more extreme against the rich. In that law he ordained, that who focuer had any lands contrary to the ancient lawes of Rome, that he should presently depart from them. But thereupon there fell out continuall brawles in the pulpit for Orations, against oftanius:in the which, though they were very earnest & vehemet one against another, yet there pailed no fowle words fro them (how hot foeuer they were one with another) that should shame his companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought vp, breedeth such a stav and knowledge in a man, not only in things of pleafure to make him regard his credite, both in word and deed, but in paffion and anger also, and in their greatest ambition of glory. Thereupon Tiberius finding that this law among others touched Octamus, because he enjoyed a great deale of land that was the commonwealths, he prayed him fecretly to contend no more againft him; promifing him to give him of his owne, the value of those lands which he should be driven to forfake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he faw O Hauius would not be perfwaded, he then preferred a law, that al magistrates & officers should cease their authority, til the law was either past, or reiccted, by voices of the people; and thereupon he set his owne seale vpon the doores of the temple of Saturne, where the coffers of the treafure lay, because the treafurers themselues during that time, should neither take out nor put in any thing, vpo great penalties to be forfeited by the Prætors or any other magistrate of authority that should breakethis order. Hercupon, all the Magistrates fearing this penalty, did leaue to exercise their office for the time. But then the rich men that were of great livings, changed their apparell, and walked very fadly up and downe the market place, and layed fecret waite to take Tiberius, having hired men to kill him: which caused Tiberius himselfe, openly before them all, to weare a short dagger vnder his long gowne, properly called in Latine, Dolon. When the day came that his law should be established, Tiberius called the people to give their voices: and the rich men on the other side, they tooke away the pots by force, wherein the papers of mens voices were throwne, so that there was like to fall out a stirre vpon it. For the faction of Tiberius was the stronger side, by the number of people that were gathered about him for that purpose: had it not bene for Manlius and Fuluius, both the which had bene Confuls; who went vnto him, and befought him with the teares in their eyes, and holding vp their hands, that he would let the law alone. Tiberius thereupon, forcleeing the instant danger of some great mischiefe, as also for the reuerecehe bare vnto two fuch noble persons, he stayed a litle, and asked them what they would hauchim to do. They made answer, that they were not able to counfell him in a matter of so great weight, but they prayed him notwith standing he would be contented to referre it to the judgement of the Senate. Thereupon he granted them presently. But afterwards perceiving that the Senate sate vpon it, and had determined nothing, because the rich men were of too great authority, heentred into another denice that was neither honest nor meet; which was, to depriue Offauius of his Tribuneship TIBERIUS AND CAIVS.

Tribuneship, knowing that otherwise he could not possibly come to passe the law. But before netooke that course, he openly intreated him in the face of the people with courteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to ftand no more against him; and to do the people this pleasure, which required a matter iust and reasonable, and only requested this small recompence for the great paines they tooke in service abroad for their countrey. Octamus denied him plainly. Then faid Tiberius openly, that both of them being brethren in one selfe place and authority, and contrary one to another in a matter of so great weight, this contention could not be possibly ended, without civill warre: and that he could see no way to remedie it, vnlesse one of them two were deposed from their office. Thereupon he bad octavius begin first with him, and he would rise from the bench with a good will, and become a private man, if the people were so contented. Offauius would do nothing in it. Tiberius then replied, that he would be doing with deposits him, if he alterednot his mind, vpon a better breath and confideration; and so dismissed the affembly for that day. The next morning the people being againe affembled, Tiberius going vp to his scate, attempted againe to perswade Octavius to leave off. In fine, finding him still a man vnremoueable, he referred the matter to the voices of the people, whether they were contented off auins should be deposed from his office. Now there were five and thirty tribes of the people, of the which seuenteen of them had already passed their voices against oftanius, so that there remained but one tribe more to put him out of his office. Then Tiberius made them stay for proceeding any further, and prayed of anius again, embracing him before all the people, with all the intreatie possible, that for selfewill sake he would not suffer such an open shame to be done vnto him, as to be put out of his office, neither also to make him the occasion and instrument of fo pitifull a deed. They fay that Octavius at this last intreatie was somewhat moued and won by his perswasions, and that weeping, he stayed a long time, and made no answer. But when he looked vpon the rich men that stood in a great company together, he was ashamed (I think) to have their ill wils, and rather betooke himfelfe to the losse of his office, and so bad Tiberius do what he would. Thereupon he being depriued by voices of the people, Tiberius commanded one of his infranchised bondmento pull him out of the pulpit for Orations: for he ysed his infranchised bondmen in stead of Sergeants. This made the fight so much more lamentable, to see offanius thus shamefully pluckt away by force. Yea furthermore, the common people would haue runne voon him, but the rich men came to rescue him, and would not suffer them to doe him further hurt. So offauius faued himselfe running away alone, after he had bene rescued thus from the fury of the people. Moreouer, there was a faithfull servant of octavius, who stepping before his master to saue him from hurt, had his cies pulled our against Tiberius mind, who ranne to the rescue with all speed when he heard the noise. After that, the law Agraria passed for division of lands, and three Commissioners were appointed to make inquirie and distribution thereof. The Commissioners appointed were these: Tiberius himselfe, Appius Clodius Agraria. his father in law, aud Cains Gracehus his brother, who were not at that time in Rome, but in the campe with Scipio African, at the fiege of the citie of Nymantia. Thus Tiberius vety quietly passed ouer these matters, and no man durst withstand him: and furthermore, he substituted in Ottauius place no man of quality, but onely one of his followers, called Mutius. For which cause the Noble men were fore offended with him, and fearing the increase of his greatnesse, they being in the Senate house did what they could possible to do him despite and shame. For when Tiberius demaunded a tentat the charge of the common-wealth, when he should goe abroad to make division of these lands, as they vsually granted vnto others, that many times went in farre meaner commissions, they flatly denied him; and through the procurement of P. Nasica (who being a great landed man in his countrey, shewed himselfe in this action his mortall enemie, taking it grieuously to be compelled to depart from his land) onely granted him nine of their oboli a day, for his ordinary allowance. But the people on the other fide wereall in an vprore against the rich. In so much as one of Tiberius friends being dead vpon thefudden, vpon whose bodie being dead there appeared very ill signes, the common people ranne suddenly to his buriall, and cried out, that he was poyloned. And so taking vp the Beere whereon his body lay vpon their shoulders, they were present at the fire of his funerals, where immediatly appeared certaine fignes to make them suspect, that indeed there was vehement cause of presumption he was poysoned. For his belly burst, whereout there issued such abundance of corrupt humors, that they put out the first fire, and made them fetch another, the which also they could not make to burne, vntill that they were compelled to carry the body into some other place, where notwithstanding they had much adoto make it burne. Tiberius feeing that, to make the common people mutine the more, he put on mourning apparell, and brought his fonnes before them, and befought the people to be good vnto them and their mother, as one that despaired of his health and safetie. About that time died Attalus, sirnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his will to Rome, in the which he made the people of Rome his heire. Wherefore Tiberius, still to increase the good will of the common people towards him, preferred a law immediatly, that the ready money that came by the inheritance of this king, should be distributed among the poorecitizens. on whose lot it should fall to have any part of the division of the lands of the common-wealth to furnish them towards house, and to ser up their tillage. Furthermore, he sayd, that concerning the townes and cities of the kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to do to take any order with them, but that the people were to dispose of them, and that he himselfe would pur it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, in fo much as there was one Pompey a Schator, that standing vp, faid, that he was next neighbour vnto Tiberius and that by reason of his neighbourhood he knew that Eudemus Pergamenian had given him one of king Attalus royall bands, with a purple gowne besides, for a token that he should one day be king of Rome. And Quintus Metellus also reproued him, for that his father being Cen. for, the ROMAINES having supped in the towne, and repairing every man home to his house. they did put out their torches and lights, because men seeing them returne, they should not thinke they taried too long in company banqueting: and that in contrary manner, the seditions and needie rabble of the common people did light his fon home, and accompany him all night long up and downe the towne. At that time there was one Titus Annius, a man that had no goodnesse norhonessie in him, howbeit taken for a great reasoner, and for a subtill questioner andanswerer. He provoked Tiberius to answer him, whether he had not committed a shamefull fact against his companion and brother Tribune, to defame him that by the lawes of Rome should have bene holy and vntouched. The people tooke this prouocation very angrily, and Tiberius also comming out, and having assembled the people, commanded them to bring this Annins before him, that he might be endited in the market place. But he finding himselfe faire inferiour vnto Tiberius both in dignity and eloquence, ranne to his fine subtill questions, to take a man at his word: and prayed Tiberius before he did proceed to his accusation, that he would first answer him to a question he would aske him. Tiberius bad him say what he would. So filence being made, Annius asked him: If thou wouldest defame me, and offer me injurie, and that I called one of thy companions to helpe me, and he should rise to take my part, and angerthee: wouldest thou therefore put him out of his office : It is reported, that Tiberius was so gravelled with this question, that though he was one of the readiest speakers, and the boldest in his Orations of any man, yet at that time he held his peace, and had no power to speake, and therefore he presently dismissed the assembly. Afterwards, vnderstanding that of all the things he did, the deposing of octavius from his office was thought (not onely of the Nobility, but of the common people also) as foule and wilfull a part as cuer he played, for that thereby he had imbased and viterly overthrowne the dignity of the Tribunes, the which was alwaies hadin great veneration until that present time: to excuse himself therfore, he made an excellent Oration to the people, whereof we will fet downe some speciall points, that you may the better discerne thereby the force and effect of his eloquence. The Tribuneship (said he) indeed was a holy and facred thing, as particularly confecrated to the people, and established for their benefit and safetie: where contrariwise, if the Tribune do offer the people any wrong, he thereby minisheth their power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wils by voices; besides that he doth also imbase his owne authority, leaving to doe the thing for the which his authority was first giuen him. Or otherwise we could not chuse, but suffer a Tribune, if it pleased him, " to overthrow the Capitoll, orto fet fire on the Arfenall, and yet notwithstanding this wicked part, if it were committed, he should be Tribune of the people still, though a leud Tribune. But when he goeth about to take away the authority and power of the people, then he is no more " a Tribune. Were not this against all reason, thinke you, that a Tribune when he list, may take a " Confull, and commit him to prison: and that the people should not withstand the authority " of the Tribune, who gaue him the same, when he would vse his authority to the prejudice of the people: for the people are they that do chuse both Confull and Tribune. Furthermore, 3, the kingly dignitie (because in the same is contained the absolute authority & power of all other kinds of magistrates and offices together) is confecrated with very great and holy ceremonies, drawing very neare vnto the godhead: and yet the people expulsed king Tarquin, because he vfed his authoritie with crueltie; and for the injurie he offered one man onely, the most ancient rule and government (by the which the foundation of Rome was first layed) was veterly abolithed. And who is there in all y city of Rome to be reckoned to holy as the Vestall Nuns, which haue the custodie and keeping of the cuerlasting fire; and yet if any of these be taken in fornication, the is buried aline for her offencer for when they are not holy to the gods, they lote the liber. tie they have in respect of serving the gods. Even so also it is vancete, that the Tribune if he offend the people, should for the peoples sake be renerenced any more, seeing that through his owne folly he had deprined himfelf of that authority they gaue him. And if it be for that he was chosen Tribune by the most part of the tribes of the people, then by greater reaso is he justly deprinced that by all the whole tribes together is for faken & deposed. There is nothing more holy , nor inviolate then things offered up vnto the gods: and yet it was never feene that any man did forbid the people to take the, to remoue & transport them from place to place as they thought good. Euch for they may as lawfully transferre the office of the Tribune vnto any other, as any other offering confecrated to y gods. Furthermore, it is manifest that any Officer or Magistrate ,, may lawfully depose himselfe: for it hath bene often seene, that men in office have deprined themselves, or otherwise have sued to be discharged. This was the effect of Tiberius purgation. Now his friends perceiving the threats the rich & noblemen gave out against him, they wished him for the fafety of his person, to make suite to be Tribune againe the next yeare. Whereupon he began to flatter the common people again afresh, by new lawes which he preferred: by the Other lawes which he tooke away the time and number of yeares prescribed, when every citizen of Roma mateby was bound to go to the wars being called, and his name billed. He made it lawfull alfo for men Grachus. to appeale from fentence of the Judges vnto the people, and thrust in also amongst the Senators (which then had abfolute authority to judge among themselves) a like number of the Romaine Knights, and by this meanes fought to weaken and imbase the authority of the Senate, increafing also the power of the people, more of malice then any reason, or for any justice or benefit to the common-wealth, Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voices of the people for the confirmation of his new lawes, finding that his enemies were the stronger in the assembly, because all the people were not yet come together, he fell a quarelling with his brethren the Tribunes, alwaies to winne them; and yet in the end brake vp the affembly, commanding them to returne the next morning. There hee would be the first man in the market place, apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares, and looking heavily vpon the matter, praying the people affembled to have compassion upon him, saying, that he was afraid less his enemies would come in the night, and ouerthrow his house to kill him. Thereupon the people were so moued withall, that many of them came and brought their tents, and lay about his house to watch it. At the breake of the day, the keeper of the chickens (by fignes of the which they do deuine of things to come) brought them vnto him, and cast them downe meate before them. None of them would come out of the cage but one onely, and yet with much ado, shaking the Vitalities cage: and when it came out, it would cate no meate, but onely lift vp her left wing, and put fine vnic. forth her legge, and for anne into the cage againe. This figne made Tiberius remember another he had had before. He had a maruellous faire helmet and very rich, which he wore in the wars: vinder it were crept two fnakes vinwares to any, and layed egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, because of the ill signes of the chickens: notwithstanding, he went out of his house when he heard that the people were assembled in the Capitoll; but as he went out, he hit his foote fuch a blow against a stone at the threshold of the doore, that he brake the naile of his great toe, which fell in such a bleeding that it bled through his shooe. Againe, he had not gone far, but he faw vpon the top of a house on his left hand, a couple of rauens fighting together: and notwithstanding that there past a great number of people by, yet a stone which one of these rauens cast from them, came and fell hard at Tiberius foot. The fall thereof stayd the fourest man he had about him. But Blosius the Philosopher of Cvm s that did accompany him, told him it were a great shame for him, and enough to kill the hearts of all his followers, that Tiberius being the sonne of Gracehus, and nephew of Scipio the African, and the chiefe B b b b 2 would plainly tell the people, that this was a tricke of a tyrant that reigned indeed, and that for pride and disdaine did abuse the peoples good wils. Furthermore, diuers messengers came vnto him, and faid, that his friends that were in the Capitoll, fent to pray him to make hafte, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honourably received: for the people feeing him comming, cried out for ioy to welcome him; and when he was gotten vp to his feate, they shewed themselves both carefull and louing towards him, looking warily that none came nearehim, but such as they knew well. When Mutius began againe to call the tribes of the people to give their voices, he could not proceed according to the accustomed order in the like case, for the great noise the hindmost people made, thrusting forward, and being driven backe, and one mingling with another. In the meane time Flaums Flaceus, one of the Senators, got vp into a place where all the people might fee him, and when he faw that his voice could not be heard of Tiberius, he made a figne with his hand that he had fome matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius straight bad them make a lane through the preasse. So, with much adoe, Flanius came at length vnto him, and told him, that the rich men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Confull to their wils, determined themsclues to come and kill him, having a great number of their friends and bond-men armed for the purpose. Tiberius immediatly declared this conspiracie vnto his friends and followers, who ftraight girt their long gownes vinto them, and brake the Sergeants ianelins which they caried in their hands to make roome among the people, and tooke the trunchions of the same to refift those that would set upon them. The people also that stood furthest off, maruelled at it, and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a figne to tell them the danger he was in, layed both his hands on his head, because they could not heare his voice for the great noise they made. His enemics feeing the fignehe gaue, ranne prefently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a royall band or diademe of the people, and that it was an enident figne, because they faw him clappe his hands upon his head. This tale troubled all the company. Whereupon Nafica befought the Confull, chiefe of the Senate, to helpe the common-wealth, and to take away this tyrant. The Confull gently answered againe, that he would vie no force, neither putany citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as also he would not receive Tiberius, nor protect him, if the people by his perswasion or commandement should commit any act contrary to the law. Naficathen rifing in anger, Sith the matter is so (said he) that the Consull regardeth not the common-wealth, all you then that will defend the authority of the law, follow me. Thereupon he cast the skirt of his gowne ouer his head, and went straight to the Capitoll. They that followed him also tooke their gownes and wrapped them about their armes, and laid at as many as they might, to make them give way: and yet very few of the people durst meete with fuch states as they were to stay them, because they were the chiefest men of the city; but cuery man flying from them, they fell one on anothers neck for haft. They that followed them, had brought from home greatleauers and clubs, and as they went they took vp feete of treffles and chaires which the people had ouerthrowne and broken, running away, and hied them apace to meete with Tiberius, striking at them that stood in their way: so that in short space they had dispersed all the common people, and many were flaine flying. Tiberius seeing that, betooke him to his legges to faue himfelfe; but as he was flying, one tooke him by the gowne and stayed him but he leauing his gowne behind him, ranne in his coate, and running fell vponthem that were downe before. So, as he was rifing vp againe, the first man that strake him, and that was plainly seene strike him, was one of the Tribunes his brethren, called Publim Satureius, who gaue him a great rap on the head with the foote of a chaire; and the fecond blow he had, was giuen him by Lucius Rufus that boasted of it, as if he had done a notable act. In this tumult, there were flaine about three hundredmen, and were all killed with staues and stones, and not one man hurt with any iron. This was the first sedition among the citizens of Rome, that fell out with murther & bloudshed, fince the expulsion of the kings. But for all other former diffentions (which were no trifles) they were eafily pacified, either party gluing place to other: the Senate for feare of the Commoners, and the people for reuerence they bare to the Senate. And it fee-

led him: and how that his enemies and ill willers would not make a laughing sport of it, but executed against him, more for very spite and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparent cause they presupposed against him. For proofe hereof may be alledged, the barbarous cruelty they vsed to his body being dead. For they would not suffer his owne brother to haue his body to bury it by night, who made carnest suite vnto them for it; but they threw him amongst the other bodies into the river, and yet this was not the worst. For some of his friends among it the other bothes into the fuer-and yet this was not the world. Among the which they flue Diophanes the Orator, and one Caius Billius, whom they inclosed in Theorem a pipe among fnakes and ferpents, and put him to death in this fort. Blossus also the Philosopher death of Caims Bilof Cymes, was brought before the Confuls, and examined about this matter who boldly confossed vino them, that he did as much as Tiberius commanded him. When Nasica did aske him,

And what if he had commanded thee to fet fire on the Capitoll? He made him answer, that Tiberius would neuer haue giuen him any such commandement. And when diuers others also were still in hand with him about that question: But if he had commanded thee? I would fure haue done it, said he: for he would neuer haue commanded meto haue done it, if it had not bin for the commoditie of the people. Thus he scaped at that time, and afterwards fled into As IA vnto Arifonicus, whom misfortune having ouerthrowne, he flue himfelfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the people at that present time, did no more withstand the law Agraria, for division of the lands of the commonwealth, but suffered the people to appoint another Commissioner for that purpose in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Crassus was chosen, being allyed vnto Tiberius, for Cains Gracehus (Tiberius brother) had maried his daughter Licinia, Yet Cornelius Nepos faith, that it was not Crassus daughter Caius maried, but the daughter of Brutus, that triumphed for the Lysitani-ANS. Howbeitthe best writers & authority agree with that we write. But what soener was done, the people were maruelloufly offended with his death; and men might eafily perceive that they looked but for time and oportunity to be reuenged, and did presently threaten Nasica to accuse him. Whereupon the Senate fearing fome trouble towardshim, deuised away (vpon no occasion) to send him into As 1 A. For the common people did not dissemble \(\hat{y} \) malice they bare him when they met him, but were very round with him, and called him tyrant, & unrederer, excommunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his hands in the bloud of the holy Tribune, and within the most facred Temple of all the city. So in the end he was inforced to for fake Rome, though by his office he was bound to folemnize all the greatest facrifices, because he was then chiefebishop of Rome. Thus, trauelling out of his country like a meane man, and troubled in steep of his mind, he died shortly after, not far from the city of Pergamys. Truly, it is not greatly to be Rome. wondred at, though the people so much hated Nasica, considering that Scipio the AFRICAN himfelfe (whom the people of Rome for inster causes had loued better then any man else what soe-

uer) was like to haue lost all the peoples good will they bare him, because that being at the fiege of Nymantia, when news was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this verse of Homer: Such end voon him ener light, Which in fuch doings doth delight.

Furthermore, being asked in the affembly of the people, by Cains and Fuluins, what he thought of Tiberius death: he answered them, that he did not like his doings. After that the people handled him very churlishly, and did euer breake off his Oration, which they neuer did before: and he himselfeasso would reuile the people even in the assembly. Now Cains Gracehus at the first because he feared the enemies of his dead brother, on otherwise, for that he sought meanes to make them more hated of the people, he absented himselfe for a time out of the common affembly, and kept at home, and medled not, as a man contented to liue meanely, without bufying himselse in the commonwealth: insomuch as he made men thinke and report both, that he did vtterly mislike those matters which his brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a young man, and nine yeares yonger then his brother Tiberius, who was not thirtie yeares old when he was flaine. not stand still and looke on. When one Vectius a friend of his was sued, he took vpon him to defend his cause in court. The people that were present, and heard him speake, they leaped for ioy B b b b 3 to see him: for he had such an eloquent tongue, that all the Orators besides were but children to him. Hereupon the rich men began to be afraid againe, and whispered among themselues, that it behoued them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chanced so that he was chosen Treafurer, and it was his fortune to go into the Ile of SARDINIA, with the Confull Orestes. His enemies were glad of that, and he himselfe was not sorie for it. For he was a martiall man, & as skil. full in armes as he was else an excellent Orator: but yet he was afraid to come into the pulpir for Orations, and misliked to deale in matters of state, albeit he could not altogether denie the people, and his friends that prayed his furtherance. For this cause therefore he was very glad of this voyage, that he might absent himselfe for a time out of Rome though divers were of opinion, that he was more popular, and defirous of the common peoples good will and favour, then his brother had bene before him. But indeed he was cleane contrary: for it appeared that at the first he was drawne rather against his will, then of any speciall desire he had to deale in the common wealth. Cicero the Orator also faith, that Cains was bent altogether to flie from office in the commonwealth, and to line quietly as a prinate man. But Tiberius (Caius brother) appeared to him in his fleepe, and calling him by his name, faid vnto him: Brother, why doeft thou prolong time, for thou canst not possibly escape? For we were both predestinated to one manner of life and death, for procuring the benefit of the people. Now when Cains arrived in SARDINIA, he shewedall the proofes that might be in a valiant man, and excelled all the yong men of his age in hardinesse against his enemies, in instice to his inferiors, and in loue and obedience towards the Confull his Captaine: but in temperance, fobriety, and in painfulnesse, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The winter by chance fell out very sharpe, and full of sicknesse in Sardi-NIA: whereupon the Confull sent vnto the cities to helpe his fouldiers with some clothes: but the townessent in post to Rome, to pray the Senate they might be discharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegation reasonable, whereupon they wrote to the Consull to find fome other meanes to clothe his people. The Conful could make no other shift for them, and so the poore souldiers in the meane time smarted for it. But Caius Gracehus went himselse vnto the cities, and so perswaded them, that they of themselves sent to the Romaines camp such things as they lacked. This being caried to Rome, it was thought straight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the peoples fauour, and indeed it made the Senate also afraid. In the necke of that, there arrived Ambassadors of Africke at Rome, sent from King Micipsa, who told the Senate that the King their master, for Cains Gracehus sake, had sent their army corne into SARDINIA. The Senators were so offended withall, that they thrust the Ambassadors out of the Senate, and fo gaue order that other fouldiers should be fent in their places that were in SARDINIA: and that orestes should still remaine Consult there, meaning also to continue Caius their Treasurer. But when he heard of it, he straight tooke sea, and returned to Rome incholer. When men saw Cains returned to Rome vnlooked for, he was reproued for it, not onely by his enemies, but by the common people also, who thought his returne very strange before his Captaine, under whom he was Treasurer. He being accused hereof before the Censors, prayed he might be heard. So, answering his accusation, he so turned the peoples minds that heard him, that they all said, he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had served twelve yeares in the warres, where others were enforced to remaine butten yeares: and that he had continued Treasurer vinder his Captainethe space of three yeares, where the law gaue him liberty to return eat the end of the yeare. And that he alone of all men else that had bene in the wars, had caried his purse full, and brought it home emptie; where others having drunke the wine which they caried thither in vessels, had afterwards brought them home full of gold and filuer. Afterwards they went about to accuse him as accessary to a conspiracy that was reucaled in § city of FREGELLES. But having cleared all that suspition, & being discharged, he presently made suite to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of quality his sworne enemies. On the other side also he had so great fauour of y common people, that there came men out of all parts of ITALY to be at his election, and that such a number of them, as there was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the field of Mars not being large enough to hold such a multitude of people, there were that gaue their voices vpon the top of houses. Now the Noblemen could no otherwise let the people of their will, nor preuent Caius of his hope, but where he thought to be the first Tribune, he was onely pronounced the fourth. But when he was once possess officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, because he was as eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occasion of calamity offered him: which made him bold to speake, bewailing the death of his brother. For what matters focuer he spake of he alwaies fell in talke of that, remembring them what matters had passed, and laying before them the examples of their ancestors, who in old time had made war with the Phaliscas, by the meanes of one Genutius Tribune of the people, vnto whom they had offered iniury: who also did condemne Cains Veturius to death, because that he onely would not give a Tribune place, coming through the market place. Where these, said he, in your prefence and before your faces, have flaine my brother Tiberius with staves, & have dragged his body from the mount of the Capitoll, all the citie ouer, to throw it into the river: and with him also have most cruelly slaine all his friends they could come by without any law or justice at all. And yet by an ancient custome of long time observed in this city of ROME, when any man is accured of treason, & that of duty he must appeare at the time appointed him, they do not withflanding in the morning fend a trumpet to his house, to summon him to appeare, and moreouer the Indges were not wont to condemne him, before this ceremony was performed: so carefull and respective were our predecessors, where it touched the life of any Romaine. Now Cains having first stirred up the people with these persuasions (for he had a maruellous loud voice) he preferred two lawes:

The first, that he that had once bene put out of office by the people, should never after be ca- caius Grace pable of any other office.

Thesecond, that if any Confull had banished any citizen without lawfull accusation, the sentence and hearing of the matter should pertaine to the people.

The first of these two lawes did plainely desame octanius, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people deposed from the Tribuneship. The second also touched Popilius, who being Prætor, had banished his brother Tiberius friends; whereupon he staid not the triall, but willingly exiled himselfe out of ITALY. And touching the first law, Cains himselfe did afterwards reuoke it, declaring vnto the people that he had faued Ottauius at the request of his mother Cornelia. The people were very glad of it, and confirmed it, honouring her no lesse for respect of her sons, then cornelia, also for Scipioes sake her father. For afterwardsthey cast her image in brasse, & set it vp with this the Gracinscription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many common matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, and eloquently pleaded inher behalfe, by Cains against her adversaries. of the peo As when he faid vnto one of them: How darest thou presume to speake euill of Cornelia, that had ple of Rome. Tiberius to her sonne? And the other partie also that flandered her, being sorely suspected for a Sodomite: And art thou so impudent, said he, to shew thy face before Cornelia? Hast thou brought forth children as she hath done? And yet it is well knowne to all men in Rome, that she being but a woman, hath lived longer without a man, then thou that art a man. Thus were Cains words sharpe and stinging, and many such like are to be gathered out of his writings. Fur- Other laws thermore, he made many other lawes afterwards to increase the peoples authority, and to imbase the Senates greatnesse.

The first was, for the restoring of the Colonies to Rome, in dividing the lands of the com. mon-wealth vnto the poore citizens that should inhabit there.

The other, that they should apparell the souldiers at the charge of the common-wealth, and that it should not be deducted out of their pay; and also, that no citizen should be billed to serue in the wars, under feuenteene yeares of age at the leaft.

Another law was, for their confederates of ITALY, that through all ITALY they should have as free voices in the election of any Magistrate, as the naturall citizens of Rome it selfe.

Another, fetting a reasonable price of the corne that should be distributed vnto the poore

Another touching judgement, whereby he did greatly minish the authority of the Senate. For before, the Senators were onely Judges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honoured and feared of the people, and the ROMAINE Kinghts; and now he ioyned three hundred Romaine Knights vnto the other three hundred Senators, and brought it so to passe, that all matters indiciall should be equally judged among those fixe hundred men. After he had pasfed this law, it is reported he was very curious in obseruing all other things, but this one thing specially, that where all other Orators speaking to the people turned them towards the pallace where the Senatours fate, and to that fide of the market place which is called Comitium: he in contrary manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwards towards y other fide of the B b b b 4 of his look only he removed a great matter. For he so transferred all the government of § commonwealth from the Senate vnto the judgement of the people, to teach the Orators by his exaple, that in their orations they shold behold the people, nor the Senate. Now, the people hauing chus power, not onely confirmed the law he made touching the Judges, but given him also full power and authority to chuse among the Romaine Knights such Judges as he liked of, he found thereby he had absolute power in his owne hands, insomuch as the Senators themselves did aske counsel of him. So did he euer giue good counsell, and did preferre matters meete for their honour. As other laws amongst others, the law he made touching certaine wheate that Fabius Vice-prætor had sent out of Spaine, which was a good and honourable act; he perswaded the Senate that the come might be fold, and so to send backe againe the money thereof vnto the townes and cities from whence the corne came; and ther with all to punish Fabius for that he made the Empire of Rome hatefulland intollerable vnto the prouinces and fubiects of the same. This matter wan him great loue and commendation of all the prouinces subject to Rom E. Furthermore, he made lawes for the restoring of the decayed townes, for mending of high waies, for building of garners for prouission of corne. And to bring all these things to passe, he himselfe tooke vpon him the only care and enterprise, being neuer wearied with any paines taken in ordering of so great affaires. For, he followed all those things so earnestly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand infomuch that they who most hated and feared him, wondred much to see his diligence and quick dispatch in matters. The people also wondred much to behold him onely, seeing alwaies such a number of labourers, artificers, ambaffadors, officers, fouldiers, & learned men, whom he eafily fatisfied and dispatched, keeping still his estate, and yet vsing great courtesse and civility, entertaining cuery one of them prinatly: so that he made his accusers to be found liers, that said he was a stately man and very cruell. Thus he wanne the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his converfation and deeds then he was otherwife in his Orations. But the greatest paines and care he tooke vpon him was, in seeing the high waics mended, the which he would have as well done, as profitably done. For he would caft the causics by the line in the fostest ground in the fields, and then would paue them with hard stone, and cast a great deale of grauell vpon it, which he caused to be brought thither. When he found any low or watery places which the rivers had eaten into, he raifed them vp, or else made bridges over them, with an euen height equall to either fide of the causie; so that all his work caried a goodly leuell withall, euen by the line or plummet, which was a pleasure to behold. Furthermore, he deuided these high waies by miles, every mile containing eight fuvlongs, and at every miles end he fet vpa The Italian stone for a marke. At either end also of these high waies thus paued, he set certaine stones of conuenient height, a pretie way asunder, to help y trauellers by to take their horse backs again without any helpe. The people for these things highly praising & extolling him, and being ready to make shew of their loue & good will to him any maner of way, he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a request to make vnto them, the which if it would please them to grant him, he would think they did him a maruellous pleasure: & if they denied him also, he cared not much. Then every manthought it was the Confulship he meant to aske, and that he would sue to be Tribune and Consult together. But when the day came to chuse the Consuls, eucry man

Linius Drufus one

Cains perceiving that the Senators were his open enemies, and that Fannins the Confull was but fecond time a flack friend vnto him, he began againe to curry fauour with the common people, and to prefer new laws, fetting forth the law of the Colonies, that they should fend of the poore citizens to replenish the cities of TARENTYM & CAPVA, and that they should grantall the LATINS the freedome of Kome. The Senate perceiuing his power grew great, and that in the end he would be fo frong that they could not withftand him, they denifed a new and ftrange way to plucke the peoples good will from him, in granting them things not altogether very honest. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius called Liuius Drusus, a man nobly borne, and as well brought vp as any other Romaine: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferiour to the greatest men of estimation in RQME. The chiefest Senators went vnto him, and perswaded looking attentiuely what he would doe, they maruelled when they faw him come downethe field of Mars, and brought Caius Fannius with his friends, to further his fute for the Confulfhip.

Therein he ferued Fannius turne, for he was prefently chosen Consult: and Caius Gracchus was

him to take part with them against Caius, not to vse any force or violence against the people to withstand them in any thing, but contrarily to grant them those things which were more honeflie for them to deny them with their ill wil. Linius offering to pleasure y Senate with his autho- Lawes prerity, preferred lawes neither honourable nor profitable to the common-wealth, and were to no fand by other end, but contending with Caius who should most flatter the people of them two, as plaiers other end, but contending with Caius who should most flatter the people of them two, as plaiers do in their common playes, to shew the people pastime. Whereby the Senate shewed that they did not so much missike Cains doings, as for the desire they had to ouerthrow him and his great credit with the people. For where Caius preferred but the replenishing of the two ciries, & defired to fend the honestest citizens thither, they objected against him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other fide also they favoured Drusus, who preferred a law, that they should replenishtsvelue Colonies, and should fend to every one of them three thousand of the poorest cirizens. And where they hated Cains for that he had charged the poore citizens with an annuall rent for the lands that were deuided vnto them, Livius in contrary manner did please them by disburdening them of that rent and paiment, letting them have the lands scotfree. Furthermore also, where Cains did anger the people, because he gaue al ŷ LATINES the freedom of Rome to giue their voices in chufing of Magistrates as freely as the natural Romaines, when Drusson the other fide had preferred a law that thenceforth no Romain should whip any fouldier of the LATINS with rods to the wars, they liked the law, & past it. Linius also in every law he put forth faid in all his orations, that he did it by the counsel of the Senate, who were very carefull for the profit of the people: & this was all the good he did in his office vinto the commonwealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleased with the Senate, & where they did before hate al the zimus noblemen of the Senate, Linius took away that malice, when the people faw that all that he pronoblemen of the Senate, Livius took away that malice, when the people law that all that he procifieth the pounded, was for the preferment & benefit of the commonwealth, with the confent and furthepropletarance of the Senate. The only thing also that perswaded the people to thinkethat Drussas meant vprightly, and that he only respected the profit of the common people, was, that he never preferred any law for himself, or for his own benefit. For in the restoring of these Colonies which hepreferred, he alwaies sent other Commissioners, and gaue them the charge of it, and would neuer finger any mony himselfe: where Caiustooke vpon him the charge and care of all things himselse, and specially of the greatest matters. Rubrius also another Tribune, having preferred a law for the reedifying and replenishing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Seepio had razed & destroyed, it was Cains hap to be appointed one of the Commissioners for it: whereupon he took ship & failed into AFRIKE. Drustus in the meane time taking occasion of his absence, did as much as might be to feeke the fauour of the common people, and specially by accusing Fuluius who was one of the best friends Caius had, and whom they had also chosen Commissio-Fuluius nerwith him for the diuision of these lands among the citizens whom they sent to replenish these Colonies. This Fuluius was a seditious man, and therefore maruellously hated of the Sections, a vertex of the section of nate, and withall suspected also of them that took part with the people, that he secretly practised research to make their confederates of ITALY to rebell. But yetthey had no evident proofe of it to inftifie it against him, more then that which he himselse did verific, because he seemed to be offended with the peace and quietnes they enjoyed. And this was one of the chiefest causes of cains ouerthrow, because that Fuluius was partly hated for his sake. For when Scipio African was found The death dead one morning in his house, without any manifest cause how he should come to his death so fodainly, (fauing that there appeared certaine blind markes of stripes on his body, that had bene African giuen him, as we haue declared at large in his life) the most part of the suspition of his death was laidto Fuluius, being his mortall enemie, & because the same day they had bene at great words together in the pulpit for Oratios. So was Caius Gracchus also partly suspected for it. How socuer it was, fuch a horrible murther as this, of so famous and worthy a manas any was in Rome, was yet notwithstanding neuer reuenged, neither any inquirie made of it, because the common people would not suffer the accusation to go forward, fearing lest Caius would be found in fault, if the matter should go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Cains at that time being in Africk E about the reedifying and replenishing of the city of CARTHAGE again, the which he named Ivnonia, the voice goeth that he had many ill fignes & tokens appeared vnto him. For Valuelie the staffe of his ensigne was broken with a vehement blast of wind, and with the force of the enfigne bearer that held it fast on the other side. There came a flaw of wind also that caried away the facrifices vpon the altars, & blew them quite out of the circuit which was marked out for the

But there fell a showre of raine at that time that parted them. The next morning the Confull hauing affembled the Senate by breake of day, as he was dispatching causes within, some had taken the body of Antyllies, and laid it naked upon the beere, and fo caried it through the market place

(as it was agreed upon before amongst them) and brought it to the Senate doore, where they and finding this Becre in the market place, fome fell a weeping for him that was dead, others cryed out, that it was a shamefull act, and in no wise to be suffered. But on the other side, this did reviue the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickednesse of the ambitious Noblemen: who having themselues before slaine Tiberius Gracehus that was Tribune, and within the Capitollit felfe, and had also cast his body into the river, did now make an honourable shew openly in the market place, of the body of the Sergeant Antyllius (who though he were wrongfully flaine, yet had himself egiuen them the cause that flue him, to do that they did) and all the whole Senate were about the Becreto bewaile his death, and to honor the funerals of a hireling, to make the people also kill him that was only left the protector and defender of the people. After this, they went againe into the Capitoll, and there made a decree; whereby they gaue the should bring two of their men armed with them. Fuluius on the other side prepared his force against them, and assembled the common people together. Caius also returning from the market place, staid before the image of his father, and looked earnestly ypon it without euer a word speaking, onely he burst out a weeping, and fetching a great sigh, went his way. This made the people that faw him to pitie him: fo that they talked among themselves, that they were but beasts that paffed away the night in guzling and drinking drunk, crying out, and making noife, Fuluius himselfe being drunke first of all, who both spake and did many things sarre vnmeete for his calling. For on the other fide, they that watched Cains were very forowfoll, and made no noife.

they went to take the mount Auentine. But Cains would not arme himselfe, but went out of his wonted manner, fauing that he caried a fhort dagger at his girdle vnder his gowne. So as he was compasse of the city. Furthermore, the wolues came and tooke away the markes which they had fet downe to limit the bounds of their circuite, and caried them quite away. This not withftanding, Cains having dispatched all things in the space of threescore andten daies, he returned incontinently to Rome, understanding that Fuluius was oppressed by Drusus, and that those matters required his presence. For Lucius Hostilius that was all in all for the Nobility, and a man of great credite with the Senate, being the yeare before put by the Confulship by Cains practife, who caused Fannius to be chosen, he had good hope this yeare to speed, for the great number of friends that furthered his suite. So that if he could obtain eit, he was fully bent to set Cains beside the saddle, and the rather, because his estimation and countenance he was wontto haucamong the people, began now to decay, for that they were full of fuch deuices as his were. because there were divers others that preferred the like to please the people withall, & yet with the Senates great good will and fauour. So Cains being returned to Rome, he removed from his house, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a house vider the market place, to flew himself thereby the lowlier and more popular, because many of the meaner fort of the people dwelt thereabouts. Then he purposed to go forward with the rest of his Jawes, & to make the people to establish them, a great number of people repairing to Rome out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. How beit the Senate counfelled the Confull Familia to make proclamation, that all those which were no naturall Romains, resident & abiding within the city felfe of Rome, that they should depart out of Rome. Besides all this there was a strange proclamation made, and never feene before: that none of all the friends and confederates of the ROMAINES for certaine daies should come into ROME. But Caius on the other side set yp bils on enery post-accusing the Conful for making so wicked a proclamation; and further promised the confederates of Roma to aide them, if they would remaine there against the Confuls proclamarion. But yet he performed it not, for when he faw one of Fannius fergeants carie a friend of his to prifon, he held on his way, and would fee nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of likelihood because he seared his credit with the people, which began to decay, or esse because he was Joth (as he faid) to picke any quarrell with his enemies, which fought it of him. Furthermore, he chanced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occasion. The people were to fee the pastime of the sword-players or sencers at the sharpe, within the very market place, and there were divers of the officers that to fee the sport, did set up feaffolds round about, to take money for the fanding. Caius commanded them to take them downe againe, because the poore men might see the sport without any cost. But not a man of the would yeeld to it. Wherefore he staid till the night before the pastime should be, and then he tooke all his labourers he had under him, and went and ouerthrew the feaffolds enery one of them: fo that the next morning all the market place was cleare for the common people to fee the postime at their pleafure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him maruelloudly, and tooke him for a worthy man. Howbeithis brethrenthe Tribunes were very much offended with him, and rooke him for a bold prefumptuous man. This feemeth to be y chiefe cause why he was put from his third Tribuneship, where he had the most voices on his side: because his colleagues, to be renenged of the part he had played them, of malice and spite made false report of the voices. Howbeit there is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulse, and it is reported he ipake formewhat too proudly to his enemies that were merrie with the matter, and laughed himto fcorne: that they laughed a Sardonians laugh, not knowing how darkely his deedes were intangled. Furthermore, his enemies having chosen Opimius Consull, they began immediatly to renoke diners of Cains lawes: as among ft the reft, his doings at CARTHAGE for thereedifying of that citic, procuring thus all the waies they could to anger him, because they might haue infloccasion of anger to kill him. cains not with standing did patiently beare it at the first: but afterwards his friends, and specially Fuluius, did encourage him fo, that he began again to gather men to refift the Confull. And it is reported also, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, fecretly hiring agreat number of strangers which she sent ynto Rome, as if they had bin reapers, or harueft men. And this is that she wrote secretly in her letter vnto her son in ciphers. And yet other write to the contrary, that she was very angry he did attempt those things. When the day came that they should proceed to the renocation of his lawes, both parties met by breake of day at the Capitol. There when the Conful opimius had done facrifice, one of cains fergeants called Quintus Anylius, carying the intrailes of the beast sacrificed, said vnto Fuluins, and others of his

at length her servants tooke her vp in a swoune; and caried her so vnto her brother Crassus, Now Fuluius, by the perswasion of Caius, when all their faction were met, sent his yonger son (which was a pretie faire boy) with an Heraulds rod in his hand for his safetie. This boy humbly presenting his duty, with the teares in his eyes, before the Consull and Senate, offered them peace. The most of them that were present thought very well of it. But opinius made answer, saying, that it became them not to fend messengers, thinking with faire words to win the Senate: but it was their duty to come themselues in person like subjects, and offenders to make their triall, and fo to craue pardon, and to seeke to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commanded the boy he should not returne againe to them, but with this condition he had prescribed. Casins (as in is reported) was ready to go and cleare himselfe vnto the Senate: but the residue would not suffer him to go. Whereupon Fuluius sent his sonne back againe vnto them, to speake for themas he had done before. But Opimius that was desirous to fight, caused the boy to be taken, and com. mitted him to safe custody, & then went presently against Fuluius with a great number of foormen well armed, and of CRETAN archers besides; who with their arrowes did more trouble and hurt their enemies, then with any thing else, that within a while they all began to flie. Fuluins on the other fide fled into an old hot-house that no body madereckoning of, and there being found shortly after, they sluchim and his eldest sonne. Now for caius, he fought not at all, but beind madde with himselfe, and grieued to see such bloudshed, he got him into the temple of Diana, where he would have killed himselfe, had not his very good friends Pomponius and Licinius faued him. For both they being with him at that time, tooke his sword from him, and counselled him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, & holding vp both his hands vnto the goddesse, he besought her that the people might neuer come out of bondage, to be reuenged of this their ingratitude and treason. For the common people (or the most part of them) plainely turned their coates, when they heard proclamation made, that al men had pardon granted them that would returne. So Caius fled vpon it, and his enemies followed him so neare, that they ouertooke him vpon the woodden bridge, where two of his friends that were with him staid, to defend him against his pursuers, and bad him in the meane time make shift for himselfe, whilst they fought with them upon the bridge: and fo they did, and kept them that not a mangot the bridge of them vntil they were both flaine. Now there was none that fled with Caius, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithstanding, every man did still encourage and counsell him, as they do men to win a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horse though he often required it, because he saw his enemics so neare vnto him. This notwithstanding, by their defence that were flaine upon the bridge, he got ground on them fo, that he had leifure to creepe into a litle groue of wood which was confecrated to the Furies. There his feruant Philocrates flue him, and then flue himselfe also, and fell dead vpon him. Other write notwithstanding, that both the master and servant were overtaken, and taken aliue; and that his servant did so straight embrace his mafter, that none of the enemies could strike him for all the blowes they gaue, before he was flaine himselfe. So one of the murtherers strake off Caius Gracehus head to earie to the Consult. Howbeit one of Opimius friends called Septimuleins, took the head from the other by the way, because proclamation was made by trumpet before they fought, that who focuer brought the heads of Fuluius and Cains, they should be paid the weight of them in gold. Wherefore this Septimuleius caried Caius head vpon the top of his speare vnto Opimius: whereupon the scales being brought to weigh it, it was found to weigh seuenteene pound weight and two third parts of a pound : because Septimuleius besides the horrible murder he had committed, had also holpenie with this villanie, that he had taken out his braine, and in lieu thereof had filled his fcull with Lead. Now the other also that brought Fulnius head, because they were poore men, they had nothing. The bodies of these two men, Caius Gracchus and Fuluius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thouland that were flaine) were all throwne into the river, their goods confileate, and their widowes forbiddento mourne for their death. Furthermore, they took from Licinia Cains wife, her ioynter:butyetthey dealt more cruelly and beaftly with the young boy, Fuluius sonne; who had neither lift vp his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but onely came to them to make peace before they fought; whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battel ended they put him to death. But yet that which most of all grieued the people was the temple of Concord, the which Opinius caused to be built for it appeared The temple that he boasted, and in maner triumphed, that he had slaine so many citizens of Rome. And therefore there were that in the night wrote vnder the inscription of the temple these verses:

This Opimius was the first man at Rome, that being Confull, vsurped the absolute power of the Opimius Dictator: and that without law or instice condemned three thousand citizens of Rome, besides the street Fuluins Flaccus, (who had also bene Consul, and had received the honour of triumph) and Caius Consul, Gracehus a yong man in like case, who in vertue and reputation excelled althe men of his years. the power This notwithstanding could not keepe opinius from thecueric and extortion. For when he was of the Difent Ambassador vnto Iugurth king of Nv MIDIA, he was bribed with mony; and thereupon being accused, he was most shamefully connicted, and condemned, Wherefore he ended his daies bribed with with this reprochand infamy, hated and mocked of all the people: because at the time of the ouerthrow he dealtheastly with them that fought for his quarrell. But shortly after it appeared to condemned. the world how much they lamented the loffe of the two brethren of the Gracebi, For they made The Gracimages and statues of them, and caused them to be set up in an open and honourable place, confecrating the places where they had bene flaine: and many of them also came and offered to loafig dethem of their first fruites and flowers, according to the time of the yeare, and went thither to fired of the mem or their nruntes and nowers, according to the time or the years, and went timer to people make their prayers on their knees, as vnto y temples of the gods. Afterwards she dwelt continually by the mount of Mifene, and neuer changed her maner of life. She had many friends, and because she was a noble Ladie, and louedeuer to welcome strangers, she kept a very good house, and therefore had alwaies great repaire vnto her, of GRECIANS and learned men: befides, there was no king nor prince but both received gifts from her, & sent her again. They that frequented her company delighted maruelloufly to heare her report the deeds & maner of her fathers life, Seigio African: but yet they wondred more, to heare her tell the acts and death of her two fonnes, Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, without shedding teare, or making any shew of lamentation or griefe, no more then if she had told an history vnto them that had requested her. Insomuch as some writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had ouercome and taken her reason and sense from her to feele any forrow. But indeed they were fenflesse to say so, not vinderstanding how that to be The power nobly borne and vertuoufly brought vp, doth make mentemperatly to digeft forrow; and that fortune oftentimes ouercomes vertue which regardeth honestie in all respects, but yet

the Graceli

Ow that we be come to the end of this history, we are to compare the liues of these two menthe one with the other. First, as touching the two Gracchi, their enemies that most hated them, and spake the worst they could of them, could not deny but that they were the best given to vertue, and as well taught and brought vp as any Romaines that were in their time. But yet is appeareth, that nature had the vpper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they having bene very ill brought vp both for learning and good manners, for lacke whereof the oldest men, were almost spoiled, yet did they not with standing make themselues the first masters and example of sobriety, temperance, and simplicity of life. Furthermore, the two first having lived in that time when Rom B flourished most in honour and vertuous desires, they were more then ashamed to for sake the vertues inherited from their ancestors. These two last alfo being borne of fathers that had a cleane contrary disposition, & finding their country altogether without any order, & infected with diffolute life, were not therefore any whit the more flack in their defire to do well. Furthermore, the greatest praise they gaue vnto the two Gracehi, was, theirabstinence & integrity from taking of mony all the time they were in office, & dealt in matters of state, euer keeping their hands cleane, and tooke not a penny wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on the other fide was offended if any man praised him, for that he took nothing fro another man: seeing that he dispossessed himselfe of his owne goods, and gaue it to his citizens, which amounted in ready coyne to the value of fixe hundred talents. Whereby men may cafily iudge, how grieuous a finne he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man, feeing that he thought it a kind of auarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was maruellous great difference in their alterations, and renewing of the state, which they did both preferre. For the acts of the two Romaines were to mend high waies and to reedificand replenish decayed townes: and the worthiest act Tiberius did, was the law Agraria, which he brought in for deuiding of the lands of the commonwealth amongst the poore citizens. And the best act his brother Cains also did, was the mingling of the Judges, adding to the three hundred Senators three hundred ROMAINE Knights to be indifferent Judges with them. Whereas Acis and Cleamenes in contrary manner were of opinion, that to reforme small faults, and to redresse them by litle and litle, was (as Plato faid) to cut off one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards feuen in the place: and therefore they tooke vpon them a change and innovation, euen at once to root out all the mischieses of their country, (or to speake more truly, to take away the disorder which brought in all vice & mischiefe to the commonwealth,) and so to restore the city of Sparta againeto her former ancient honourable estate. Now this may be said againe for the government of the Gracchi, that the chiefest men of Rome were ever against their purposes. Where, in that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the noblest ground that could be. and that was the ancient lawes and ordinances of Sparta, touching temperance and equality: the first, instituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by The acts of the alterations of the first, Rome became no greater then it was before. Where, by that which the Gracelli Cleomenes did, all GRECE in short time faw that Sparta commanded all the rest of Pelopon- profit Rome NESVS, and fought at that time against those that were of greatest power in all GRECE, so the figniorie thereof. Whereby their only markeand purpose was, to rid all GRECE from the wars of the GAYLES and ILLYRIANS, and to restore it agains to the honest gouernment of the race and line of Hercules. Their deaths (me thinkes) do shew great difference of their courages. For the Gracehi fighting with their owne citizens, were flaine flying. Of these two also, Agis, because The end of he would put neuer a citizen to death, was flaine in manner voluntarily; and Cleamenes receiving the Gracelis injurie food to his defence, and when he had no oportunity to do it, he ftoutly killed him felfe. And fo may it be faid on the other fide, that Agis did neuer any notable act of a Captaine or foldier, because he was slaine before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on the other fide, may be opposed the scaling of the wals of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the first manthat at the affault got vp vpon the wall, which was no small exploit: and the peace which he made also at the siege of NVMANTIA, whereby he saued twenty thousand fighting men of the ROMAINE Sa the which had no meanes otherwise to faue their liues. And Cains also in the selfe fame war, at the fiege of NYMANTIA, and afterwards in SARDINIA, did many noble feats of war; fothat there is no doubt, but if they had not bene flaine fo foone as they were, they might haue bene compared with the excellentest Captainesthat euer were in Rome. Againe, touching their doings in civill policie, it appeareth that Agis dealt more flackly, being abused by Agesilans: who likewise deceined the poore citizens of the division of the lands which he had promifed them. In fine, for lacke of courage, because he was very yong, he left the things vndone which he had purposed to have performed. On the other side, Cleomenes went too roundly to work, to renue the ancient government of the common-wealth againe, by killing the Ephores with too much cruelty, whom he might eafily haue wonne, or otherwise by force haue gotten the vpper hand. For it is not the part of a wife Phisician, nor of a good gouernour of a common-wealth to vsethesword, but in great extremity, where there is no other helpe nor remedie; and there lacked judgement in them both, but worst of all in the one, for injury is euer joyned with crueltie. The Gracchi on the other side, neither the one nor the other began to imbrue their hands in the bloud of their citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Cains, yet he would never defend himselfe; and where it was knowne that he was very valiant in battell with his sword in his hand against the enemie, he shewed himselfe as cold againe in the vprore against his citizens. For he went out of his house vnarmed, & fled when he saw them fight, being more circumspect not to do hurt, then not to fuffer any. Therfore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearcfull to offend any man. For they were driven either to yeeld to them that followed them, or else if they stayed, to stand to their defence, because they might keepe themselues from hurt. And where they accuse Tiberius for the faults he committed, the grea- The faults test that euer hedid, was when he deposed Octanius his colleague from the Tribuneship, and of the Graethat he himself made suite for the second. And as for Caius, they fallly accused him for the death of Anyllius the Sergeant, who indeed was flaine vnknowneto him, and to his great griefe. Where Cleamenes on the other fide, though we should forget the murther he committed vpon the Ephores, yet he set slaues at liberty, and ruled the kingdome in maner himselfe alone: but yet for manners fake only he joyned his own brother with him, which was of the selfe same house. And when he had perswaded Archidamus, (who was next heire to the kingdome of the other royall house) to be bold to returne home from MESSINA vnto SPARTA, he suffered him to be Cccc2 fla ee; and because he did not revenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that though the was consenting to his death. Lycurgus on the other fide, whose example he did counterfeitto follow, because he did willingly resigne the kingdome vnto his brothers son Charilans, & being afraid also, that if the young child should chance to miscarie, they would suspect him for his death, he exiled himselfe out of his owne country along time, trauelling vp and downe, and returned not to Sparta againe, before Charilans had gotten a fon to succeed him in his kingdome. But we cannot fet another GRECIAN by Lycurgus comparable vnto him. We have declared also that among ft Cleomenes deeds, there were many other greater alterations then these, & also many other breaches of the law. So they that do condemne the manners of the one and the other. fay, that the two GRECIANS from the beginning had an afpiring mind to be tyrants, still practifing warres: whereas the two Romaines onely, even by their most mortall enemics, could be blamed for nothing else, but for an extreme ambition; and did confesse that they were too earnest & vehement about their nature, in any strife or contention they had with their aduersaries. and that they yeelded vnto their choler and paffion, as vnto ill winds, which brought them to do those things they did in the end. For what more iust and honest intent could they have had, then the first was: had not the rich men (cuen through stoutnesse and authority to ouerthrow the lawes) brought them against their wils into quarrell: the one to saue his life, the other to reuenge his brothers death, who was flaine without order, instice, or the authority of any Officer? Thus thou may est thy selse see the difference that was betwixt the GRECIANS and the ROMAINS and now to tell you plainely my opinion of both, I think that Tiberius was the stoutest of the source. that the yong king Agis offended least; and that for boldnesse and courage, Cains came nothing neare vnto Cleomenes.

Gfeth in the manners of maninet in any place or countrej.

E that madethe litle booke of the praise of Alcibiades, touching the victory he wanne at the horse race of the Olympian games, (were it the Poet Euripides, as some thinke, or any other) my friend Sosius, said: that to make a man happie, he must of necessity be borne in some famous city. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, doubtlesse, true happings. nesse chiefly consisteth in the vertue and qualities of the mind, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in a famous city: no more then it is for one to be borne of a faire or foule mother. For it were a madnesse to thinke that the little village of

and that the Isle of ÆGINA (which is of so small a length, that a certaine ATHENIAN on a time made a motion it might betaken away, because it was but as a straw in the fight of the hauen of Piraa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comedians: and not breed an honest, inst, and wife man, and of noble courage. For, as we have reason to think that arts and sciences which were first deussed and inuented to make somethings necessary for mens vse, or otherwise to win fame and credit, are drowned, and cast away in litle poore villages; so are we to judge also, that vertue, like a strong and fruitfull plant, can take roote, and bring forth in enery place, where it is graffed in a good nature, and gentle person, that can patiently away with paines. And therefore if we chance to offend, and live not as we should, we cannot accuse the meannesse of our countrie where we were borne, but we must justly accuse our selues. Surely he that hath taken vpon Expedient him to put forthany worke, or to write any history, in the which he is to thrust many strange fortigera. things vnknowne to his countrey, and which are not ready at his hand to be had, but difperfled abroad in diverse places, and to be gathered out of diverse books and authorities: first of all, in a famous he must needes remaine in some great and famous city throughly inhabited, where men do delight in good and vertuous things, because there are commonly plenty of all sorts of bookes: and that perufing them, and hearing talke also of many things besides, which other Historiographers peraduenture haue not written of, and which will carie fo much more credit, because men that are aliue may presently speake of them as of their owne knowledge; whereby he may make his worke perfect in euery point, having many and diverse necessary things contained in it. But I my selfe that dwell in a poore litle towne, and yet do remaine there willingly lest it Platarchs should become leffe, whilest I was in ITALY, and at ROME, I had no leysure to studie and exercisethe Latine tongue, aswell for the great businesse I had then to do, as also to satisfie them that came to learne Philosophie of me: so that even somewhat too late & now in my latter time, I began to take Latine bookes in hand. And thereby a strange thing to tell you, but yet true; Ilearned not, nor vnderstood matters so much by the words, as I came to vnderstand the words, by common experience and knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to know how to pronounce the Latine tongue well, or to speake it readily, or to vnderstand the figures, translations, and fine ioyning of the simple words one with another, which do beautifie and fet forth the tongue, furely I judge it to be a maruellous pleafant and sweete thing; but withall it requireth a long and labour some studie, meete for those that haue better ley sure then I haue, and that have yong yeares on their backes to follow such pleasure. Therefore in this present booke, which is the fifth of this worke, where I have taken vpon me to compare the lives of Noble men one with another: vndertaking to write the lines of Demostheres and Cicero, we will confider and examine their nature, manners and conditions, by their acts and deeds in the gouernment of the common-wealth, not meaning otherwise to conferre their works and writings of eloquence, neither to define which of them two were sharper or sweeter in his oration. For as the Poet Iohn faith:

In this behalfe a man may rightly say, The Dolphines in their proper soyle do play.

The which Cecilius litle vnderstanding, being a man very rash in all his doings, hath vnaduisedly Periossis written and set forth in print, a comparison of Demostheres eloquence with Ciceroes. But if it red with were an easie matter for euery man to know himselfe, then the gods indeed haue given vs no commandement, neither could men haue faid that it came from heaven. But for my opinion, me thinks Fortune even from the beginning hath framed, in maner, of one selfe mold Demosthenes and Cicero, and hath in their natures fashioned many of their qualities one like to the other as both of them to love the liberty of their country, & both of them very fearefull in any danger of wars. And Ikewise their fortunes feeme to me, to be both much alike. For it is hard to find two Orators againe, that being so meanely borne as they, have come to be of fo great power and authority as they two; nor that have descrued the ill will of kings & noblemen so much as they have done, nor that have lost their daughters, nor that have bene banished their countries, and that have bene restored againe with honor, and that againe have sted, and have bene taken againe, nor that have ended their lives with the liberty of their country. So that it is hardto be judged, whether Nature haue made them liker in maners, or Fortune in their doings: as if they had both like cunning workmasters striued one with the other, to whom they should make them best resemble. But first of all we must write of the elder of them two.

Demosthenes the father of this Orator Demosthenes, was (as Theopompus writeth) one of the chiefe men of the city, and they called him Macharopaus, to wit, a maker of sword blades, becausche had a great shop where he kept a number of slaues to forge them. But touching Afebines the Orators report of his mother, who faid that the was the daughter of one Gelon, (that fled from Athens being accused of treason) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother, I am not able to fay whether it be true, or deuised of malice to do him despite. How soeuer it was, it is true that his father died, leaving him but seuen yeares old, and left him reasonable well: for his goods came to little lesse then the value of fifteene talents. How beit his guardians did him great wrong, for they stole a great part of his goods themselves; and did let the rest runne to nought, as having litle care of it, for they would not pay his schoolemasters their wages. And this was the cause that he did not learne the liberall sciences which are vsually taught vnto honest mens fons:and to further that wantalfo, he was but a weakling and very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him go to schoole, neither also durst his masters keepe him too hard to it, because he was but a fickly child at the first, and very weake. And it is reported also, that the firname of Battalus was giuen him in mockery by other schoole boyes his companions, because of his weaknesse of body. This Battalus (as diverse men do report) was an esseminate player on the flute, against whom the Poet Antiphanes to mocke him, denised a litle play. Others also do write of one Battalin, a diffolite Orator, and that wrote Infeitious verses; and it seemeth that the ATHENIANS at that time did call a certaine part of mans body vncomely to be named, Battalus. Now for Argas (which sirname men say was also given him) he was so called, either for his rude and beaftly manners (because some Poets do call a snake Argas) or else for his manner of speech, which was very vnpleasant to the care; for Argas is § name of a Poet that made alwaies bawdy and il-fauoured fongs. But hereof enough, as Plato faid. Furthermore, the occasion (as it is reported) that moved him to give himselfe to eloquence, was this. Callistratus the Oratour was to defend the cause of one Oropus before the Ludges, & enery man longed greatly for this day of pleading, both for the excellency of the Oratoi, that then bare y bell for eloquence as for the matter, and his accusation, which was manifestly knowne to all. Demosthenes hearing his schoolemasters agree together to go to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his schoolmaster to be so good as to let him go with him. His mafter granted him, and being acquainted with the keepers of the hall doore where this matter was to be pleaded, he so intreated the, that they placed their scholer in a very good place, where being at his ease, he might both heare and see all that was done, and no man could see him. Thereupon when Demosthenes had heard the case pleaded, he was greatly in loue with the honor which the Orator had gotten, when he saw how he was waited vpon home with such a traine of people after him: but yet he wondered more at the force of his great eloquence, that could so turne and conuey all things at his pleasure. Thereupon he left the studie of all other sciences, and all other exercises of wit and body, which other children are brought vp in: and began to labor continually, and to frame himselfe to make Orations, with intent one day to be an Orator among the rest. His master that taught him Rhetoricke was Isaus, notwithstanding that Isocrates also kept a schoole of Rhetoricke at that time: either because that being an orphane he was not able to pay the wages that Isocrates demanded of his scholers, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he found Ifaus maner of speech more proper for the vie of the eloquence he defired, because it was more fine and subtil. Yet Hermippus writeth not withstanding, that he had read certaine bookes having no name of any author, which declared that Demosthenes had bene Platoes scholer, & that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation & eloquence. And he writeth also of one Ctesibius, who reporteth that Demostbenes had fecretly read ifocrates works of Rhetoricke, and also Alcidamus bookes, by meanes of one Callian Syracvsan, and others. Wherefore when he came out of his wardship, he began to put his guardians in suite, and to write Orations and pleas against them: who in contrary manner dideuer vie delaies and excuses, to saue themselues for giuing vp any account vnto him, of his goods and patrimonie left him. And thus following this exercise (as Thueydides writeth)it prosperced so well with him, that in the end he obtained it, but not without great paines and danger; and yet with all that he could do, he could not recover all that his father left him, by a good deale. So having now gotten some boldnesse, and being vsed also to speake in open presence, and withall, having a feeling and delight of the estimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading, afterwards he attempted to put forward himself, and to practise in matters of state. For, as there

cocth a tale of one Lanmedon an Or chomen ian, who having a grievous paine in the fplene, by adnice of the Phisitians was willed to runne long courses to helpe him: and that following their of the plane order, he became in the end fo lustie and nimble of body, that afterwards he would needs make one to run for games, and indeed grew to be the swiftest runner of all men in his time. Euen so the like chanced vnto Demosthenes. For at the first, beginning to practise Oratory for recourry of his goods, and thereby having gotten good skill and knowledge how to pleade, he afterwards tooke upon him to speake to the people in assemblies, touching the government of the common wealth, eucn as he should have contended for some game or price, and at length did excell all the Orators at that time that got vp into the pulpit for Orations:notwithstanding that when he first ventured to fpeake openly, the people made fuch a noise, that he could scant be heard; and befides they mocked him for his maner of speech that was so strange, because he vied so many long Demostre confused periods, and his matter he spake of was so intricate with arguments one vpon another, of the troop o that they were tedious, and made men weary to heare him. And furthermore, he had a very foft for his long voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had also a short breath, the which made that men could not well understand what he meant; for his long periods in his Oration were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at y end of his fentence. So that at length perceiuing he was thus rejected. ments of nas he gaue over to speake any more before the people, and halfe in despaire withdrew himselfe into the hauen of Piraa. There Eunomus the THESSALIAN being a very old man, found him, and fharply reproued him, and told him, that he did himfelfe great wrong, confidering, that having a maner of speech much like vnto Pericles, he drowned himselfe by his faint heart; because he did not feeke the way to be bold against the noise of the common people, and to arme his body to away with the paines and burthen of publike Orations, but fuffering it to grow teebler for lacke of vie and practife. Furthermore, being once againe repulsed & whitled at as he returned home hanging downe his head for shame, and vtterly discouraged, Satyrus an excellent player of comedics being his familiar friend, followed him, and went to speake with him. Demost benes made his complaint vnto him, that where he had taken more paines then all the Orators befides, and had almost euen worne himselfe to the bones with studie, yet he could by no meanes deuise to please the people whereas other Orators that did nothing but bib all the day long, & marriners that understood nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the pulpit with Orations: and on the other fide that they made no account of him. Satyrus then answered him, Thou fayest true Demosthenes, but care not for this, I wil helpe it straight, and take away the cause of all this, so thou wilt but tell me without booke certaine verses of Euripides, or of Sophocles. Thereupon Demostheres prefently rehearfed fome vnto him, that came into his mind. Saturus repeating them after him, gaue them quite another grace, with such a pronunciation, comely gesture, and modest countenance becoming the verses, that Demostheres thought them cleane changed. Whereby perceiving how much the action (to wir, the comely maner and gesture in his Oration) doth give grace and comlinesse in his pleading, he then thought it but a trisse, and almost nothing to speake of, to exercise to pleade well, vnlesse therewithall he did also studie to haue a good pronunciation and gefture. Thereupon he built him a celler vnder the ground, the nesseller. which was whole euen in my time, and he would daily go downe into it, to fashion his gesture and pronunciation, and also to exercise his voice; and that with such earnest affection, that oftentimes he would be there two or three moneths one after another, and did shaue his head of purpole, because he durst not go abroad in that fort, although his will was good. And yet he tooke his theame and matter to declaime your, and to practile to pleade, of the matters he had had in hand before, or elfe vpon occasion of such talke as he had with them that came to see him, while he kept his house. For they were no sooner gone from him, but he went downe into his celler, and repeated from the first to the last all matters that had passed betweene him and his friends in talke together, and alledged also both his owne and their answers. And if peraduenture he had beneat the hearing of any long matter, he would repeate it by himself: and would finely coucly and conuey it into proper fentences, and thus change and alter every way any matter that he had heard, or talked with others. Thereof came the opinion men had of him, that he had no very quieke capacity by nature, and that his eloquence was not naturall, but artificially gotten with extreme labour. And for proofe hereof, they make this probable reafon, that they never DemoRhefaw Demosthenes make any Oration on the sudden, and that oftentimes when her was set in restellance the affembly, the people would call him by his name, to fay his opinion touching the matter the fulden.

DEMOSTHENES of counfell then in hand: howbeit that he neuer rose vpon their call, vnlesse he had first studied the matter well he would speake of. So that all the other Orators would many times give him a taunt for it: as Pythias among other, that taunting him on a time, told him, his reasons smelled of the lampe. Yea, replied Demosthenes sharply againe: so is there great difference Pythias, betwixt thy labour and mine by lamp-light. And himselfe also speaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told the plainly, that he did not alwaies write at length al that he would speake.

neither did he also offer to speake, before he had made briefes of that he would speake. He said

furthermore, that it was a token the man loued the people well, that would be carefull before what he would fay to them. For this preparative (quoth he) doth shew that he doth honor and reuerence them. In contrary maner also, he that passeth not how the people take his words, it is a plaine token that he despiseth their authority, and that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to vie force against them rather then reason & perswasion. But yet further to enlarge the proofes, that Demosthenes had no hart to make any oration on the sudden, they do alleadge this reason: That Demades many times rose vp on the sudden to maintaine Demosthenes reasons, when the people otherwhile did reject him: and that Demosthenes on the other side, did neuer rise to make Demades words good, which he had spoken in his behalfe. But now might a man aske againe: If Demosthenes was so timorous to speake before the people vpon the sudden, what meant Aschines then to fay, that he was maruellous bold in his words? and how chanceth it, that he rifing vpon the sudden, did presently answer the Orator Python BIZANTINE in the field, that was very lufty in speech (and rough like a vehement running streame) against the Athenians and how chanced it that Lamachus Myrrhenian, having made an oration in the praise of Philipand A. lexander kings of Macedon, in the which he spake all the ill he could of the Thebans, and of the OLYNTHIANS: & when he had read and pronounced it in the open affembly of the Olympian games, Demosthenes vpon the instant rising vp on his feete, declared, as if he had read some history, and pointed as it were with his finger vnto all the whole assembly, the notable great seruice and worthy deeds the which the CHALCIDIAN'S had done in former times, for the benefit and honor of GRECE: And in contrary maner also, what mischiefe and inconvenience came by meanes of the flatterers that altogether gaue themselves to curry favour with the Macedoni-ANS: With these and such like perswasions, Demosthenes made such stirre amongst the people, that the Orator Lamachus being afraid of the sudden vprore, didsecretly conuey himselfe out of the affembly. But yet to tell you what I thinke; Demosthenes in my opinion fashioning himselse cuen from the beginning, to follow Pericles steps and examples, he thought that for other qualities he had, they were not fo requisite for him; and that he would counterfeit his gravity and sober countenance, and to be wise, not to speake ouer-lightly to enery matter at all aduentures: iudging, that by that maner of wisedome he came to be great. And like as he would not let slip any good occasion to speake, where it might be for his credit: so would he not likewise ouerrashly hazard his credit and reputation to the mercy of fortune. And to proue this true, the orations which he made vpon the fudden without premeditation before, do shew more boldnesse & courage then those which he had written and studied long before, if we may beleeue the re-

dinine spirit, and faid:

By fea and land, by rivers, springs and ponds. There are also certaine comicall Poets that do call him Ropoperperethra, as who would say, a great babler that speakethall things that commeth to his tongues end. Another mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rhetoricke called Antitheton: which is, opposition, with faying, sic recepit sicut cepit, which fignifieth, he tooke it as he found it.) In the vie of this figure Demosthenes much pleased himselfe, vnlesse the Poet Antiphanes speaketh it of pleasure, deriding the counsell he gaue the people, notto take the Ile of HALONESVS of king Philip, as of gift, but to receiue it as their owne restored. And yet euery body did grant, that Demades of his owne naturall wit, without art, was inuincible: and that many times speaking vpon the sudden, he did vtterly ouerthrow Demosthenes long studied reasons. And Aristo of the Ilc of Chio, hath written Theophrassus indgement of the Orators of that time. Who being asked what manner of Orator he thought Demosthenes: he answered, worthie of this city. Then againe, how he

king one day to the people, he sware a great oath in rime, as if he had bene possessed with some thought of Demades: about this city, faid he. The fame Philosopher writeth also, that Polyeuctus Spherman (one of those that practised at that time in the commonwealth) gaue this sentence: that Demosthenes indeed was a great Orator, but Phocions tongue had a sharper vinderstanding, because in few words he comprehended much matter. And to this purpose, they say that Demosthenes himselfe said also, that as oft as he saw Phocion get vp into the pulpit for Orations to speake against him, he was wont to say to his friends: See, the axe of my words riseth. And yet it Photom is hard to judge, whether he spake that in respect of histongue, or rather for y estimation he had gotten, because of his great wisdome: thinking (as indeed it is true) that one word onely, the twinckling of an eye, or a nod of the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the history his worthines had attained or the head, of such a man(that through his worthines had attained or the history his that credit) hathmore force to perswade then all the fine reasons and deuices of Rhetoricke, But now for his bodily defects of nature, Demetrius PHALERIAN Writeth, that he heard Demo- Demofihe-Wienes himselfe say, being very old, that he did helpethem by these meanes. First, touching the nesty inflammering of his tongue, which was very fat, & made him that he could not pronounce all fyllables distinctly, he did helpe it by putting of little pibble stones into his mouth, which he found defects of vponthe fands by the rivers fide, & fo pronounced with open mouth the Orations he had withoutbooke. And for his small and soft voice, he made that louder, by running vp steepe and high hils, vttering euch with full breath some Orations or verses that he had without book. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great looking-glasse in his house, and ever standing on his feet before it, he would learne & exercise himselfe to pronounce his Orations. For proofe hereof it is reported, that there came a man vnto him on a time, & prayed his helpe to defend his cause, & told him that one had beaten him: and that Demosthenes faid againe vnto him, I do not beleeue this is true thou tellest me, for furely the other did neuer beate thee. The plaintife then thrusting out his voice aloud, said: What, hat inhe not beaten me? Yes indeed, quoth Demosthenes then: I beleeueit now, for I heare the voice of a man that was beaten indeed. Thus he thought that the found of the voice, the pronunciatio or gesture in one fort or other, were things of force to credit or discredit that a man faith. His countenance when he pleaded before the people, did marunto unterest that tall the common fort: but the noble men and men of vnderstanding, found it too nance and base and meane, as Demetrius Phalerius said, amongst others. And Hermippus writeth, that one gesture micalled Allow, being asked of the ancient orators, & of those of his time, answered; that every man holding. that had feene them, would have wondred with what honor, reverence and modesty, they spake vnto the people; howbeit that Demosthenes Orations (whosoeuer read them) were too artificiall and vehement. And therefore we may eafily hidge, that the Orations Demosthenes wrote are very seuere and sharpe. This notwithstanding, other whiles he would give many pleasant & witty answers vpon the sudden. As when Demades one day said vnto him, Demosthenes will teach me: Demosthenes after the common proucibe, the Sow will teach Minerus. He answered straight againe: This Mi-nes with nerus not long fince was in Collitus street taken in adultery. A certaine theese also called Chalens (as much to fay, as of copper) stepping forth to fay somewhat of Demosthenes late sitting vpa nights, and that he wrote & studied the most part of the night by lamp-light: Indeed, quoth Demosthenes, I know it gricues thee to see my lampe burne all night; and therefore my Lords of A-THENS, me thinks you shold not wonder to see such robberies in your city, considering we have thecues of copper, & the wals of our houses be but of clay. We could tell you of divers others of his like pleasant & witty answers, but these may suffice for this present and therfore we wil proceed to confider further of his nature and conditions, by his acts and deeds in the affaires of the The time of commonwealth. Now Demosthenes first beginning when he came to deale in the affaires of the nestowing state, was in the time of the war made with the Phocians, as himselfe reportethand as appeareth further in his Orations which he made against Philip: of the which, the last were made after in the afthe war was ended, and the first do touch also some particular doings of the same. He made the faires of the same. Oration against Midias, when he was but 32 yeares old, and was of small countenance & reputation in the commonwealth: the want whereof was the chiefest cause (as I thinke) that induced him to take meny for the iniury he had done him, and to let his action fall against him:

He was not of a mild and gentle mind, But fierce and hastie to revenge by kind.

But, knowing that it was no small enterprise, nor that could take effect by a man of so small power and authority as himselfe, to ouerthrow a man so wealthy, so befriended, and so cloquent as Midias, he therefore yeelded himselfe vnto those that did speake and intreate for him. Neither nes franke u Orațios. do I think that the three thousand Drachmaes which he received, could have bridled the bitternesse of his nature, if otherwise he had seene any hope or likelihood that he could have prevailed against him. Now at his first coming vnto the commonwealth, taking a noble matter in hand, to speake against Philip, for the defence and maintenance of the lawes and liberties of the GREGI-AN s, he behaued himself so worthily, that in short space he wa him maruellous same for his great eloquence and plaine manner of speech. Thereby he was maruellously honored also through all GRECE, and greatly esteemed with the king of PERSIA: and Philip himselfe made more account of him then of all the Orators in ATHENS; and his greatest foes which were most against him, were driven to confesse, that they had to do with a famous man. For, in the Orations which Eschines and Hyperides made to accuse him, they write thus of him. And therfore I maruel what Theopompus meant, when he wrote that Demosthenes had a subtill vnconstant mind, and could nor long continue with one kind of men, nor in one mind for matters of state. But in cotrary maner. in my judgement he continued confrant still to the end, in one selfe maner and order, vnto the which he had betaken himfelfe at the beginning and that not onely he neuer changed all his life time, but to the contrary, he loft his life, because he would be no changeling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuse himselfe for that he had oft turned coate in matters of government, said that he went oftentimes against his owne fayings, as matters fell out: but neuer against the benefit of the commonwealth. And Melanopus also, who was ever against Callifratus, having his mouth many times stopped with mony, he would vp to the pulpit for Orations, and tell the people, that indeed Callestratus, which maintaineth the contrarie opinion against me, is my enemy. and yet I yeeld vnto him for this time: for, the benefit of the commonwealth must cary it. And another alfo, Nicodemus Messenian, who being first of Cassanders side, tooke part afterwards with Demetrius & then faid, that he did not speake against himself, but that it was meet he should obey his superiors. They cannot detect Demostheres with the like, that he did ever halt or yeeld either in word or deed. For he euer continued firme and conftant in one mind in his Orations. Infomuch that Panatius the Philosopher faith, that the most part of all his Orations are grounded vpon this maxime and principle: that for it selfe, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honest. As, the Oration of the crowne, the which he made against Aristogrates: that also which he made for the franches and freedome: and in fine, all his Orations against Philip of Macedon; in all those he doth not perswade his countrimento take that which is most pleasant, easiest, or most profitable: but he proueth that oftentimes honesty is to be preferred aboue fafety or health. So that, had he in al his Orations & doings to yned to his honestie, courtefie, and franke speech, valiantnesse in wars, and cleane hands from bribery, he might descruedly haue bene compared, not with Mirocles, Polyeuctus, Hyperides and other Orators: but even with the highest, with Cimon, Thucidides, and Pericles. For Phocion, who tooke the worst way in go. uernment of the commonwealth, because he was suspected that he tooke part with the Mace-DONIANS: yet for valiantnesse, wisedome and instice, he was euer thought as honest a manas Ephialtes and Aristides. But Demosthenes on the other side (as Demetrius saith) was no man to trust to for wars, neither had he any power to refuse gifts and bribes. For though he would neuer be corrupted by Philipking of Macedon, yet he was bribed with gold and filuer that was brought from the cities of Svsa and Ecbatana; and was very ready to praise and commend the deeds of their ancestors, but not to follow them. Truly, yet was he the honestest man of all other Orators in his time, excepting Phocion. And befides, he did euer speake more boldly and plainly vnto the people then any man else, and would openly contrarie their minds, and sharply reproue the ATHENIANS for their faults, as appeareth by his orations. Theopompus also writeth, that the people on a time would have had him to accuse a man, whom they would need shave condemned. But he refusing to do it, the people were offended, and did mutine against him. Thereupon he rifing vp, faid openly vnto them: My Lords ATHENIANS, I will alwaics counfell you to that which I thinke best for the benefit of the common-wealth, although it be against your minds: but falfly to accuse one to sarisfie your minds, though you command me, I will not do it. Furthermore, that which he did against Antiphon, sheweth plainely, that he was no people-pleafer, and that he did leane more vnto the authority of the Senate. For when Antiphon was quit by the people in the affembly of the city, Demostheres notwithstanding tooke him, and called him againe into the court of the Areopagites, and did not passe for the peoples ill will, but there continced him for promiting Philip of MACEDON to burne the Arfenall of ATHENS:

to by fentence of that court he was condemned, and fuffered for it. He did also accuse the Nun Theorides for many lewed parts committed, and amongst others, for that she taught slaves to deceine their mallers; and fo following the matter against her, she was condemned to death, and executed. It is thought alfo, that he made the Oration Apollodorus spake against the Prætor Timotheres, and proued therby that he was a debtor to the commonwealth, and fo a naughty man; and necessions that he wrote those Orations also intituled to Formio and Stephanus, for the which he was justly reproued. For Formio pleaded against Apollodorus with the Oration which Demosthenes selfe had which falle. made for him; which was even alike, as if out of one felfe cutlers shop he had fold his enemies fwords one to kil another, and for his knowne Orations, those which he made against Androcion. Timecrates and Ariflocrates, he caused them to give them vnto others, when he had not yet dealt in matters of state. For indeed when he did put them forth, he was not passing seuen or eight and twenty yeares old. The Oration which he had made against Aristogiton, and the other also of liberry against Cresipous the son of Chabrias, he spake the mas he saith himself (or as others write) openly vnto the people because he intended to marry Chabrias mother; howbeit he did not, but maried a Samian woma, as Demetrius Magnesian writeth in his book he made, intituled synonyma. But that he wrote against Africa, where he accuse th him that he dealt fallly when he was ambaffador, it is not known whether it was recited or not, although Idomeneus writeth, that there lacked but thirty voices only to have quit Aschines, But in this me thinks he spake not truly, and doth but coniccture it by that one and the other have faid in their Orations against the crowne, in the which neither the one nor the other do fay precifely, that this accufation proceeded to indgement. But let other that lift decide this doubt. Now before the war began, it was euident inough, to which part Demostheres would incline in the commonwealth. For, he would neuer leave to reproue and withstand Philips doings. Therefore he being more spoken of in Phi- Demosible. lips court then any manelle, he was fent vnto him y tenth person with nine others in ambassage. "" desings Philip gaue them all audience one after another; howbeit he was more carefull and circumfpect Fhilip. to answer Demoliberes Oration then all the rest. But other wife out of that place, he did not Demost benes fo much honor, nor gaue him so good entertainment, as to his other companions: for Philip shewed more kindnesse, and gaue better countenance vnto Aschines and Philocrates then vnto him. Wherfore when they did highly praise Philip, & faid that he was a wel spoken Prince, a faire man, and would drinke freely, and be pleasant in company, Demosthenes smiled at it, and turned all things to the worst, saying, that those qualities were nothing commendable nor meete for a king. For the first was a quality meet for a pleader, the second for a woman, & the third for a fponge. In fine, wars falling out betweene them, because Philip of the one side could not line in peace, & the Athenians on the other fide were still incensed & stirred vp by Demesthenes daily Orations, the ATHENIANS first sent into y lie of EVDOBA (the which by meanes of certaine private tyrants that had taken the townes, became fubicat againe vnto Philip) following a decree Demosibenes had preferred, and so went to expulse the MACEDONIAN'S againe. After that also he caused them to send aide vnto the BYZANTINE s, and to the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made war. For he fo perswaded the ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare vnto those two nations, and the faults which either of both the cities had comitted against them in the wars, touching the rebellion of their confederates; and he caused them to send them aide, which kept them from Philips force and power. Furthermore, going afterwards vnto althe great cities of Grece as Ambassadour, he did so solicite and perswade them, that he brought them all in a maner to be against Philip. So that the armie which their tribe should find at their ness sirred.

Theophrastus writeth, that it was at ans. that time their confederates did pray that they would fet down a certaine fumme of mony, what enery city should pay: and that Crobylus an Orator should make answer, that the warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of warre was infinite. Now all GRECE being in armes, attending what should happen, and all these people and cities being vnited in one league together, as the Eve o eians, the Athenians, the Corinthians, the MEGARIANS, the Leveadians, and those of Corfv: the greatest matter Demosthenes had to doe, was to perswade the THEBANES also to enter into this league, because their countrey confined and bordered with ATTICA; besides, their force and power was of great importance, for that they caried the fame of all GRECE at that time, for the valiantest foldiers. But it was no trifling matter to winthe THEBANS, and to make them breake with Philip, who but lately before had bound them vnto him by many great pleasures which he had done to them in the war of the PHOCIANS: besides also that betwixt ATHENS and THEBES. by reason of vicinity, there fell out daily quarrels and debates, the which with enery little thing were foone renued. This notwithstanding Philip being proud of the victory he had won by the city of AMPHISSE, when hecame &inuaded the country of ELATIA, and was entred into Pho-CIDE, the ATHENIANS were then so amazed with it, that no man durst occupy the pulpit for Orations, neither could they tell what way totake. Thus the whole affembly standing in a doubt with great filence, Demosthenes onely stept vp, and did againe give them counsell to seeketo make league and alliance with the THEBANS: and fo did further encourage the people, and put them in good hope, as he was alwaies wont to do. Then with others he was sent Ambassadour VINO THEBES and Philipalfo for his part, fent Ambassadors vinto the Thebans, Amontas & Cleerchus, two gentlemen Mace DONIANS, and with them Daochus, Theffalus, and Thracydaus, to answer and withstand the perswasions of the Athenian Ambassadors. Thereupon the The-BAD'S began to adulfe themselues for the best, and laid before their eyes the miserable fruites and calamities of war, their wounds being yet greene and vncured, which they got by the wars of PHOCIDE. Notwithstanding, the great force of Demosthenes cloquence (as Theorem pus wri. teth) did fo inflame the THEBANS courage with defire of honour, that it trode vnder their feete all maner of confiderations, and did for anish them with the loue and defire of hone fty, that they caft at their heeles all feare of danger, all remembrance of pleafures received, & all reason perfivading the contrary. This act of an Orator was of logreat force, that Philip forthwith fent Ambaffadors virto the GRECTANS, to intreat for peace, and all GRECE was vp to fee what would become of this firre. Thus, not onely the Captaines of ATHEN's obeyed Demostly energeloing all that he commanded them, but the gouernours also of THERES and of all the country of Boso-TIA besides. And the assemblies also of the councell of THEBES were as well governed by him as the affemblies of Athens, being alike beloued both of the one and the other, & having alike authority to command both, and not vndeseruedly, as Theopompus saith, but by inst desert. But some fatall destinie, and the revolution of times had determined the finall end of the liberty of GRECE at that time, cleane contrarie to his purpose and intent. There were also many celestiall signes that did foreshew and prognosticate what end should ensue thereof. And amongst others, Apolloes Nunne gauethese dreadfull Oracles: and this old prophecy of the Sieves was commonly fungin enery bodies mouth: What time the blondy battell shall be fought at Thermoden, God grant I may be farre away; or elfe (10 looke thereon) Haue Eagles wings to foare about, among the cloudes on hie: For there the vanquisht side shall weepe, and Conquerer shall die.

Men do report that this Thermodon is a litle river of the country of CHERONEA, which falleth into the river of Cephifus: howbeit at this present time there is never a river nor brooke in all our countrey, that I know, called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that river which we call now Hamon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the temple of Heronles, where the GRB-CIANS lay in camp. And it may be, that because it was filled with dead bodies, and that it ranne bloudat the day of the battell, it changed her name, and was firnamed Hæmon, because Hæma in the Greeke tongue, fignifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithstanding that this Thermodon was no river, but that certaine men setting vp their tent, and trenching it about, found a litle image of stone, whereupon were engrauen these letters: whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermedon, who caried an AMAZON hurt in his armes; and that for this image of Therme; don, they do fing fuch another old Oracle as this:

Ye Ernes and Rauens tarry till the field of Thermodon: There will be fore of carkasses of men to feede vpon.

This not with standing, it is very hard to tell the troth of these things. But Demost benest trusting to the valiantnesse and power of the GRECIANS, and being maruellously incouraged to see such a great number of valiant and resolute men, so willing to fight with the enemie, he bad them be of good courage, and not to buzze about fuch Oracles, and to giue care to fuch prophecies. And furthermore he told them plainely, that hee did mistrust the Nunne Pythea did leane VIITO Philip, as fauouring him, and did put the THERANS in mind of their Captaine Epaminondas, and the Athenians of Pericles; and perswaded them, that those two famous men were alwaies of opinion, that fuch prophecies were no other but a fine cloake for cowards, and that taking no heed to them, they did dispatch their matters according to their owne discretion. Vntill this present time, Demosthenes showed himselfe alwaies an honest man. But when it came to the battell, he fled like a coward, and did no valiant act any thing answerable to the orations whereby he had perswaded the people. For he left his ranke, and cowardly cast away his weapons to from the runne the lighter, and was not ashamed at all (as Pythias said) of the words written vpon his banks. shield in golden letters, which were, Good fortune. Now Philip having won the battell, he was Demostheatthat present so joy full, that he fell to commit many fond parts. For after he had drunke well net words atthat present so soyfull, that he zell to commit many rond parts. For after he had drunke well and deute with his friends, he went into the place where the ouerthrow was given, and there in mockerie ponhis beganto fing the beginning of the decree which Demosthenes had preferred (by the which the field. ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed warres against him) rising and falling with his voice, and dancing it in measure with his foote:

Demosthenes the sonne of Demosthenes Peanian did put forth this.

But afterwards beginning to waxe fober, and leaving his drunkennesse, when he had remembred himselfe what danger he had bene in, then his haire stood bolt vpright vpon his head, confidering the force and power of such an Orator, that in a peece of a day had enforced him to hazard his Realme and life at a battell. Now Demosthenes fame was so great, that it was caried even to the great king of PERSIAES court, who wrote vnto his Lieutenants and gouernors, that they should feed Demosthenes with mony, and should procure to entertaine him about all the men in GRECE, as he that could best withdraw Philip, and trouble him with the warres and tumults of GRECE. And this was afterwards proued by letters found of Demosthenes himselfe, the which money of cameroking Alexanders hands in the city of Sardis, and by other writings also of the gouernours and Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, in the which were named directly the expresse fummes of money which had bene fent and given vnto him. Now the GRECIAS being thus ouerthrowne by battel, the other Orators, aduerfaries vnto Demosthenes in the commonwealth, began to set vpon him, and to prepare to accuse him. But the people did not only cleare him of all the accusations objected against him, but did continue to honour him more then before, and to call him to affemblies, as one that loued the honour and benefit of his country. So that when the bones of their countrimen which were flaine at the battell of CH ÆR ON EA, were brought to be openly buried according to the custome, the people gaue him the honour to make the funerall Oration in praise of the dead, and made no shew of sorow or griefe for the losse they had receiued (as Theopompus witnesseth, and doth nobly declare, but rather in contrary maner shewed vere slains that they did not repent them in following of his counfell, but did honor him that gaue it. Demosthenes then did make the funerall Oration. But afterwards in all the decrees he preferred to round. the people, he would neuer subscribe any, to preuent the finister lucke and misfortune of his name, but did passe it vnder his friends names one after another, vntill he grew couragious againe, shortly after that he vinderstood of the death of Philip, who was slaine immediatly after the victory he wan at CHERONEA. And it feemeth this was the meaning of the prophecy or Oracle in the two last verses:

The vanquished bewailes his lucklesse lot, And he that winnes, with life escapeth not.

Now Demostheres hearing of Philips death, before the newes were openly knowne, to preuent them, he would put the people againe in good hope of better lucke to come. Thereupon he of his comwent with a chearefull countenance into the assembly of the councell, and told them there, that trey, before he had a certaine dreame that promised great good hap, and that out of hand vnto the ATHENI-ANS: and immediatly after, the messengers arrived, and brought certaine newes of king Philips daughter. death. Thereupon the ATHENIAN'S made facrifices of ioy to the gods for this happienewes, & appointed a crowne vnto Pausanias that had flainchim. Demosthenes also came abroad in his Pharch best gowne, and crowned with flowers, seuen daies after the death of his daughter, as Afchines forbisfond reporteth: who reproueth him for it, and noteth him to be a man having little love or charitie blubbering vnto his ownechildren. But indeed Æschines selfe deserueth more blame, to haue such a ten- and serowder womanissisheart, as to beleeue, that weeping and lamenting are signes of a genrle and charitable nature, condemning them that with patience and constancie doe passe away such mis-Dddd fortunes. But now to the ATHENIAN's againe. I canneither thinke nor fay that they did wifely to shew such open signes of iou as to weare crownes and garlands vpon their heads, nor also, to facrifice vnto the gods for the death of a Prince, that behaued himselfe so princely and curteous ly vnto them in the victories he had won of them. For though indeed all crucky be subject to the reuenge of the gods, yet is this an act of a vile and base mind, to honor a man while he lived. and to make him free of their city; and now that another had flaine him, they to be in fuchan exceeding iolity withall, and to exceed the bounds of modesty so far, as to rampe in maner with both their fecte vpon the dead, and to fing fongs of victory, as if they themselues had bene the men that had valiantly flaine him. In contrary manner also, I praise and commend the constancy and courage of Demosthenes, that he leaving the teares and lamentation of his home trouble vnto women, did himselfe in the meane time that he thought was for the benefit of the commonwealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a man of courage, and worthy to be a gouernor of a commonwealth, neuer to stoupe nor yeeld, but alwaies to be found stable and constant, for the benefit of the commonwealth, rejecting all his troubles, cares, and affer ctions, in respect of the service of his countrey; and to keepe his honour much more carefully. then common players vie to do, when they play the parts of Kings and Princes, whom we fee neither weepe nor laugh when they lift, though they be on the stage, but when the matter of the play falleth out to give them infloccation. But we omit those reasons, if there be no reason (as indeed there is not) to leave and forfake a man in his forrow and trouble, without giving him fome words of comfort, but rather to deuise some matter to allwage his forrow, & to withdraw his mind from that, to thinke vpon some pleasanter thing: euenas they should keepe sore eyes from seeing bright and glaring colours, in offering them greene and darker. And from whence can a man take greater comfort for his troubles and griefes at home, when the common wealth doth well, then to io yne their private griefes with common ioyes, to the end that the better may obscure and take away the worse. But thus farre I digressed from my history enlarging this matter, because Aschines in his oration touching this matter, did mouethe peoples hearts too much vnto womanish forow. But now to the rest. The cities of GRECE being againe ftirred up by Demosthenes, made a new league againe together: and the THEBANS also having armed themselues by his practise, did one day set upon the garrison of Macedonians within their city, and flue many of them. The ATHENTANS prepared also to maintaine warre on the THEBANS behalfe, and Demosthenes was daily at all the affembles of councell, in the pulpit, perfwading the people with his orations: and he wrote also into Asia vnto the king of Persiaes Lieutenants and Captaines, to make warre with Alexander on their side, calling him child, and Margites, as much to fay, as foole. But after that Alexanaer having fet all his things at stay within his Realme, came himselfe in person with his army, and inuaded the country of Bo E or 1A, then fell the pride of the ATHENIANS greatly, and Demostheres also plied the pulpit no more as he was wont. At length the poore THEBAN'S being left vnto themselues forsaken of cuery man, they were compelled themselues alone to beare the brunt of this warre, and so came their city to vtter ruine and destruction. Thereby the Athenians being in a maruellous feare and perplexity, did suddenly chuse Ambassadors to send vnto this yong king, and Demostheres chiesly among others: who being afraid of Alexanders fury and wrath, durst not go to him, but returned from mount Cythæron, and gaue vp the Ambassade. But Alexander sent to summon the ATHENIANS, to fend vnto him ten of their Orators, as Idomeneus and Duru both do write: or eight, as the most writers and best historiographers do report, which were these: Demossheres, Polycuetus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Callifthenes and Charidemus. At which time they write that Demosthenes told the people of ATHENS, the fable of the Sheepe and Wolues, how that the Woluescame on a time, and willed the Sheepe, if they would have peace with them, to deliuer them their mastines that kept them. And so he compared himselfe and his companions that trauelled for the benefit of the people, vnto the dogges that keepe the flockes of sheepe, and called Alexander the Wolfe. Moreover, said he, like as you see these come mafters bringing a sample of their corne in a dish or napkin to shew you, and by that little do sell all that they have: fo I thinke you will all wonder, that delivering of vs, you shall also deliver your sches into the hands of your enemies. Aristobulus of Cassandria reporteth this matterthus. Now the ATHENIANS being in consultation, not knowing how to resolue, Demades hauing taken fine talents of them whom Alexander demannded, did offer himselse, and promifed promised to go in this Ambassage vnto Alexander, and to intreate for them; either because he trufted in the loue the king did beare him, or elfe for that he thought he hoped he should finde him pacified, as a Lyon glutted with the bloud of beafts which he had flaine. How loeuer it happened, he perswaded the people to send him vnto Alexander, whom he so handled, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the city of ATHENS. Thereupon Alexander being retired, Demades and his fellowes bare all the fivay & authority, and Demosthenes was vnder foot. Indeed when Agisking of LACEDEMON, came with his armie into the field, he began a litle to rouze himselfe, and to lift vp his head: but he shrunke collar againe soone after, because the A-THENIANS Would not rife with the LACED EMONIANS, who were ouerthrowne, & Agis flaine in battell. At that time was the cause of the crowne pleaded against Ctesiphon, and the plea was The indee. written alitle before the battell of CHERONEA, in the yeare when Charondas was Prouoft of ment of the ATHENS: howbeit no fentence was giventill ten yeares after, when Ariflophon was Prouost. This was fuch an open judgement, and fo famous, as never was any, as well for the great fame (iphon. of the Orators that pleaded in emulation one of the other, as also for the worthinesse of the Iudges that gaue sentence thereof: who did not leave Demosthenes to his enemics, although indeed they were of greater power then he, and were also supported with the fauour and good will of the MACEDONIANS: but they did not with standing so well quit him, that Aschines had not so much as the fift part of mens voices and opinions on his fide. Wherefore immediatly after the fentence given, hewent out of ATHENS for shame, and travelled into the country of longa, and vnto the KHODEs, where he didteach Rhetoricke. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alex. Harpalus a anders scruice, came vnto Athens, being to be charged with many foule matters he had committed by his exceeding prodigality: and also because he feared Alexanders furie, who was same to growne seuere and cruell vnto his chiefest servants. He coming now amongst the Athens Athens, fly with flore of gold and filuer, the Orators being greedy and defirous of the gold & filuer he had decanders brought, began straight to speake for him, and did counsell the people to receive and protect a poore futter that came to them for fuccour. But Demostheres gave counsell to the contrary, and badthem rather drive him out of the city, and take heed they brought not warres upon their backes, for a matter that not onely was not necessarie, but furthermore meerely vinust. But within few daies after, an inuentorie being taken of all Harpalus goods, he perceining that Demost benes tooke great pleasure to see a cup of the kings, and considered very curiously the sathion and workmanship vpon it, he gaue it him in his hand, to judge what it weyed. Demesthenes peyzing it, wondered at the great weight of it, it was so heavie: so he asked how many pound weightit weyed. Harpalus finiling, answered him: It will bring theetwenty talents. So when night was come, he fent him the cup, with the twenty talents. This Harpalus was a very wife man, and found straight by Demostheres countenance that he loued money, and could presently iudge his nature by feeing his pleasant countenance, and his eyes still vpon the cup. So Demost hence refused not his gift, and being ouercome withall, as if he had received a garrison into by Harratum his house, he took Harpalus part. The next morning, he went into the assembly of the people, ha with the my uing his necke bound vp with wooll and rolles. So when they called him by his name to step vp talents into the pulpit, to speake to the people as he had done before, he made a figne with his head, that he had an impediment in his voice, and that he could not speake. But wife then laughing at *The con: his fine excuse, told him, that it was no squinance that had stopped his westell that hight, as he ceit can would make them beleeue: but it was Harpalus money which he had received, that made him hardly be in that case. Afterwards when the people vinderstood that he was corrupted, Demosthenes going about to excuse himselfe, they would not abide to heare him, but made a noise and exclamation against him. Thereupon there rose vp a pleasant conceited man, and said: Why my mafters, do ye refuse to heare a man that hath * such a golden tongue? The people thereupon did immediatly banish Harpalus; and fearing lest king Alexander would require an account of the goldand filter which the Orators had robbed and pilfered away among them, they made very diligent fearch and inquiry in enery mans house, excepting Gallicles house, the sonne of Arrenidas; whose house they would by no meanes have searched, because he was but newly maried, and had his new spouse in his house, as Theopompus writeth. Now Demosthenes desiring to show thathe was inno fault, preferred a decree, that the court of the Areopagites should digit is hearethe matter, and punish them that were found faultie, and therewithall straight offered pleasant himselfe to betried. Howbeit he was one of the first whom the court condemned in the summe sound.

of fiftic talents, and for lacke of payment, they put him in prison: where he could not endure long both for shame of the matter for the which he was condemned, as also for his fickly bodie. So he brake prison, partly without the privity of his keepers, and partly also with their consent: for they were willing he should make a scape. Some do report, that he fled not farre from the city: where it was told him, that certaine of his enemies followed him, whereupon he would haue hidden himselfe from them. But they themselues first called him by his name, and comming to him, praied him to take mony of them, which they had brought him from their houles to helpe him in his banishment wand that therefore they ran after him. Then they did comfort him the best they could, and perswaded him to be of good cheere, & not to despaire for the misfortune that was come to him. This did pierce his heart the more for forrow, that he answered them: Why, would you not have me be forie for my misfortune, that compelleth me to forfake the city, where indeed I have so courteous enemies, that it is hard for me to find any where fo good friends: So he took his banishment vnmanly, and remained the most part of his banish. ment in the city of AGINA, or at the city of TTOEZEN, where oftentimes he would cast his eves towards the country of ATTICA, and weepe bitterly. And some have written certaine words he spake, which shewed no mind of a man of courage, nor were answerable to the noble things he was wont to perswade in his orations. For it is reported of him, that as he went out of Athens. he looked backe againe, and holding vp his hands to the Castle, said in this sort: O Lady Mi. merua, Lady patronesse of this city: why doest thou delight in three so mischieuous beasts: the Owle, the Dragon, and the People: Besides, he perswaded the yong men that came to see him. & that were with him, neuer to meddle in matters of state; assuring them, that if they had offered him two waies at the first, the one to go into the assembly of the people, to make Orations in the pulpit, and the other to be put to death prefently; and that he had knowne as he did then, the troubles a man is compelled to suffer that medleth with the affaires of the state, the feare, the envie, the accusations, and troubles in the same, he would rather have chosen the way to have suffered death. So, Demosthenes continuing in his exile, king Alexander died, and all GRECE Wasyp againe: insomuch as Leosthenes being a man of great valour, had shut vp Antipater in the city of LAMEA, and there kept him straightly besieged. Then Pytheas and Callimedon, sirnamed Carabos, two Orators, and both of them banished from ATHENS, they tooke part with Antipater, and went from towne to towne with his Ambassad friends, perswading the Grecians not to flir, neither to take part with the ATHENIANS. But Demosthenes in contrary manner, joyning with the Ambassadors sent from ATHENS into every quarter to solicite v cities of GRECE, to feeke to recouer their liberty, he did aide them the best he could, to solicite the GRECIANS, to take armes with the ATHENIANS, to drive the MACEDONIANS out of GRECE. And Phylarchus writeth that Demosthenes encountered with Pytheas words in an open assembly of the people in a certaine towne of ARCADIA. Pytheas hauing spoken before him, had said: Like as we presume alwaies that there is some sicknes in the house whither we do see Asses milke brought: To must that towns of necessity be sicke, wherein the Ambassadors of Athens doenter. Demeshbenes answered him againe, turning his comparison against him: That indeed they brought Affes milke, where there was need to recouer health: and even so, the Ambassadours of A-THENS were fent to heale and cure them that were ficke. The people at ATHENS vnderstanding what Demostheres had done, they foreioyced at it, that presently they gaue order in the field, that his banishment should be reuoked. He that perswaded the decree of his reuocation, was called Damon P. EANIAN, that was his nephew: and thereupon the ATHENIANS sent him a galley to bring him to ATHENS, from the city of ÆGINA. So Demostheres being arriued at the hauen of Piraa, there was neither gouernour, Priest, nor almost any townes man left in the city, but went out to the hauen to welcome him home. So that Demetrius MAGNE-SIAN Writeth, that Demostheres then lifting up his hands unto heaven, faid, that he thought himselse happie for the honour of that iourney, that the returne from his banishment was farre more honourablethen Alcibiades returne in the like case had bene. For Alcibiades was called home by force: and he was fent for with the good will of the cirizens. This notwithfanding, he remained still condemned for his fine: for by the law, the people could not dispence withall, nor remit it. Howbeit they deuised a way to deceive the law: for they had a manner to giue certaine money vnto them that did prepare and set out the Altar of lupiter sauiour, for the day of the solemnitie of the facrifice, the which they did yearely celebrate vnto him: fo they gaue him the charge to make this preparation for the fumme of fiftie talents, being the summe of the fine aforesaid wherein he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enjoy the good hap of his restitution to his country and goods: for the affaires of the GRECIANS were immediatly after brought to vtter ruine. For the battell of Cranon which they loft, was in the moneth Munychion (to wit, Iuly:) and in the moneth Bædromion nextenfuing (to wit, August) the garrison of the MACEDONIANS entred into the fort of Munychia. And in the moneth Pyanepfion (to wit, the October following) Demosthenes died in this maner. When newes came to Athens, that Antipater and Graverus were coming thither with a great armic, Demostheres and his friends got out of the towne a litle before they entred; the people by Demades perswasion, hauing condemned them to die. So, euery man making shift for himselfe, Antipater sent soldiers after them totake them: and of them Archias was Captaine, firnamed Phygadotheras, as Archias ers after them to take them: and of them Carbins was Captaine, in the strength of the banished men. It is reported that this Archias was borne in the theres, a city of THVRIES, and that he had bene fometimes a common player of tragedies; and that Poliss hunter of also who was borne in § city of ÆGINA(the excellentest craftsmaster in that faculty of al men) the baniford was his scholer. Yet Hermippus doth place him amongst the number of the scholers of Lacritus men. the Orator. And Demetrius also writeth, that he hadbene at Anaximenes schoole. Now this Archias having found the Orator Hyperides in the city of EGINA, Iristenicus MARATHONIAN, & Hymeraus the brother of Demetrius the PHALERIAN, which had taken fanctuary in the templeof Aiax, he tooke them out of the temple by force, and fent them vnto Antipater, who was at that time in the city of CLEONES, where he did put them all to death: and some say, that he did cut off Hyperides tongue. Furthermore, hearing that Demosthenes had taken functuary in the

Ileof CALAVRIA, he tooke litle pinnaces, with a certaine number of THRACIAN fouldiers, and being comethither, he fought to perfwade Demosthenes to be contented to goe with him vnto Antipater, promiting him that he should have no hurt. Demosthenes had a strange dreame the Domosthe. night before, and thought that he had played a tragedy contending with Archias, and that he nesdreame, handled himselfe so well, that all the lookers on at the Theater did commend him, and gaue him the honour to be the best player showbeit that otherwise he was not so well furnished as Archias & his players, & that in all manner of furniture he did far exceed them. The next morning when Archias came to speake with him, and vsing gentle words vnto him, thinking thereby to winne him by faire meanes to leave the fan Quarie, Demosthenes looking him full in the face, fitting still where he was, without remouing, faid vnto him: O Archias, thou diddest neuer perswade me when thou plaiedst a play, neither shalt thou now perswade me, though thou promise me. Then Archias beganto be angry with him, and to threaten him. O faid Demosthenes, now thou spea-kest in good earnest, without dissimulation, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commanded thee: for before, thou spakest in the clouds, and farre from thy thought: but I pray thee stay a while, till I haue written somewhat to my friends. After he had said so, he went into the temple as though he would have dispatched some letters, and did put the end of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his maner was when he did vie to write any thing, and held persosthethe end of the quill in his mouth a prety while together then he cast his gowne ouer his head, & set taken layed him downe. Archias fouldiers feeing that, being at the doore of the temple, laughed him kill himselfe to scorne (thinking he had done so for that he was afraid to dye) calling him coward, and beast. in the ten-

Archins also coming to him, prayed him to rise, and began to vie the former perswasions to him, ple of Neppromising him that he would make Antipater his friend. Then Demosthenes feeling the poyson ite of caworke, cast open his gowne, and boldly looking Archias in the face, said vnto him: Now when lawria. thou wilt, play Greens part, and throw my body to the dogs, without further graue or buriall. For my part, o god Neptune, I do go out of thy temple being yet aliue, because I will not prophane it with my death, but Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS, hauenot spared to defile thy fanctuary with bloud and cruell murther. Hauing spoken these words, he prayed them to stay him vp by his arme-holes, for his feete began already to faile him; and thinking to go forward, as he past by the Altar of Neptune, he fell downe, and giving one gaipe, gave vp the ghoft. Now touching of Demo-faid: Demosthenes vnto Antipater, but no more. Now his death being thus sudden, the THRACIAN foldiers that were at the temple doore, reported that they faw him plucke the poy fon which he put into his mouth, out of a litle cloth he had, thinking to them that it had bene a peece of gold he had swallowed downe. Howbeit a maid of the house that served him, being examined about it, told them, that he had caried it about him a long time for a preservative for him. Eratosthenes writeth, that he kept this poyfon in a litle boxe of gold made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arme. There are many writers also that do report his death diversly, but to recite them all were in vaine: fauing that there was one called Demochares (who was Demosthenes very friend) who faid, that he died not so suddenly by poyson, but that it was the speciall famour of the gods (to preserve him from the cruelty of the Macedonians) that sud-The time of denly tooke him out of his life, and made him feele fo litle paine. Demosthenes died the fixteenth day of the moneth Pynepfion(to wit, October) on the which day they do celebrate at ATHENS the feast of Ceres, called Tesmophoria, which is the dolefullest feast of al the yeare: on the which day also, the women remaine all day long in the temple of the goddesse, without meate or drinke. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS to honour him according to his deserts, did cast his image in braffe, and made a law befides, that the oldest man of his house should for ever be kept within the pullace, at the charge of the commonwealth: and ingraned these verses also vpon the ter bis death base of his image : Hadft thou Demosthenes had strength according to thy heart,

The Macedons should not have wrought the Greekes such woe and smart. For they that thinke that it was Demosthenes himselfe that made these verses in the Ile of Ca-LAVRIA, before he tooke his poylon, are greatly deceived. But yet a litle before my first comming to ATHENS, there went a report that fuch a thing happened: A certaine fouldier being fent for to come vnto the Captaine, did put such peeces of gold as he had into the hands of Demosthenes statue, which had both his hands iouned together; and there grew hard by it a great Plane tree, diuerfe leaues whereof either blowne off with wind by chance, or else put there of purpose by the foldier, couered so this gold, that it was there a long time, and no man found it: untill fuch time as the foldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereupon this matter running abroad in enery mans mouth, there were diverse men that tooke occasion of this subject, to make Epigrams in the praise of Demosthenes, as one who in his life was neuer corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enjoy the honour he thought he had newly gotten. For the iustice of the gods, reuenger of the death of Demosthenes, brought him into MACEDON, to receiue iust punishment by death, of those whom he dishonestly flattered : being before growne hatefull to them, & afterwards committed a fault whereby he could not escape. For there were letters of his taken, by the which he did perswade and pray * Perdice as, to make himselfe king of MACEDON, and to deliuer GRECE from bondage, saying, that it hung but by a thred, and yet in was halfe rotten, meaning thereby, Antipater. Dinarchus Corinthian accused him, that he wrote these letters: the which so grieuously offended Cassander, that first he slue his owne some in his armes, & then commanded they should afterward kill Demades, making him feele then by those miseries (which are the cruellest that can happen vnto man) that traitors betraying their owne countrey, do first of all betray themselues. Demosthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would neuer beleeue him. Thus, my friend sofius you have what we can deliner you, by reading or report, touching Demosthenes life and doings.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Tullius Cicero.

S touching Ciceroes mother, whose name was Heluia, it is reported she cierropawas a Gentlewoman borne, and lined alwaies very honefuly: but for temage. his father, the reports of him are diversand infinite. For some say, that he was borne and brought vp in a Fullers shop: others report, that he came of Tullus Appius, who while he lived was honoured among the Volsces as king, and made very sharpe and cruell warres with the ROMAINES. But furely it seemes to me, that y first of that name called Cicero, was fome famous man, and that for his fake his of-spring continued still that firname, and were glad to keepe it; though many men feorned it, because Cicer in English signifieth a cich pease; and Cicero had athing vpon the tip focalled.

of his nose, as it had bene a litle wart, much like to a cich pease, whereupon they firnamed him Cicero. But this Cicero, whose life we write of now, nobly answered certaine of his friends on a timegiuing him counfell to change his name, when he first made suite for office and beganto practife in matters of flate: that he would endeuour himselfe to make the name of Ciceroes more noble and famous, then the Seauri or Catuli. After that, Cicero being made Treasurer in Sicila, for. he gaue an offering of certaine filter plate vnto the gods, and at large engraued on it his two first names, Marcus Tullius: and in place of his third name, he pleafantly commanded the workman to cut out the forme and fashion of a cich pease. Thus much they write of his name. Now for Gierres his birth, it was faid that his mother was brought to bed of him without any paine, the third birth. day of Ianuarie: on which day the Magistrates and Gouernours of Romb do vse at this prefear, yearely to make folemne prayers and facrifices vnto the gods, for the health and profeerity of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an image to his nurse, that did di image prognosticate vnto her, she gaue a child sucke, which in time to come should doe great good deterois vnto all the ROMAINES. Now though such things may seeme but dreames and fables vnto mule. many, yet Cicero himselfe shortly after proued this Prophesie true: because that when he came of age to learne, he grew fo toward, and wanne fuch fame among the boyes, for his excellent wit and quicke capacity. For thereupon came the other boyes fathers themselues to the schoole to see his face, and to be eye-witnesses of the report that went of him, of his sharpe and quicke and wis.

wit to learne. But others of the rude and baser sort of men were offended with their sonnes, because to honour Gicero, they did alwaies put him in the midst betweene them, as they went in the streetes. Cicero indeed had such a naturall wit and understanding as Plato thought meete for learning and apt for the studie of Philosophie. For he gaue himselfe to all kind of knowledge,& there was no Artnor any of the liberall sciences that he disdained: not with standing in his first vong yeares he was apter and better disposed to the studie of Poetrie then any other. There is a pretic Poem of his in verses of eight staues, called Pontius Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boy. After that, being ginen more carneftly vnto this studie, he was not only thought the best Orator, but the best Poet also of all the Romaines in his time; and yet doth the excellency of his cloquence, & commendation of his tongue continue cuen to this day, not with standing the great alteration and change of the Latine tongue. But his Poetric hath loft the name and estimation of it, because there were many after him that became far morecxcellent therein then he. After he had left his childish studies, he became then Philoes scholer, the Academicke Philosopher, the onely scholer of all Clitomachus scholers, whom the ROMAINES esteemed so much for his cloquence, & loued more for his gentle behaulour and conversation. He gaue himselfe also to be a follower of Mutius Scauola, who at that time was a great manin Rome, and Prince of the Senate, and who did also instruct Cicero in the lawes of Rome. Hedid also follow Sylla for a time, in the wars of the Marsian's. But when he saw that the Commonwealth of Rome fell to civill wars, and from civill wars to a Monarchie, then he returned agains to his book and contemplative life, and frequented the learned men of GR E C E, and alwaies fludied with them, vntill \hat{S}_{γ} lla had gotten the vpper hand, and that he faw all the commonwealth againe at fome stay. About that time, Sylla causing the goods of one that was faid to be slaine, to be fold by the Crier, being one of the outlawes and profcripts, to wit, banified by bils fet up on postes, Chrysogenus, one of Syllaes freed bondmen, and in great fauour with his master, bought them for the fumme of two thousand Drachmaes. Therewithall the sonne and heire of the dead person called Roscius, being maruellously offended, he shewed that it was too shamefull an abuse: for his fathers goods amounted to the fumme of two hundred and fiftie talents. Sylla finding himselfe thus openly touched with publike fraud and deceit, for the only gratifying of his man, he procured Chrysogonus to accuse him, that he had killed his owne father. Neuer an Oratour duist speake in Roseius behalfeto defend his cause, but shrunke backe, fearing Syllaes cruelty and feuerity. Wherefore poore Roscius the yong man, seeing euery man forsake him, had no other refuge but to go to Cicero, whom his friends did counfell and perswade boldly to take vpon him the defence of Roseins cause: for he should neuer haue a happier occasion, nor so noble a beginning to bring himselse into estimation, as this. Thereupon Cicero determined to take his cause in hand, and did handle it fo wel, that he obtained the thing he fued for whereby he wan him great fame and credit. But yet being afraid of Syllaes displeasure, he absented himself from Rome, and went into Grece, gining it out that his tranell was for a disease he had vpon him. Indeed Cicero was dog-leane, a litle eater, and would also cate late, because of the great weaknesse of his stomacke: but yet he had a good loud voice, though it was somewhat harsh, and lacked grace and comelinesse. Furthermore, he was so earnest and vehement in his Oration, that he mounted still with his voice into the highest tunes; insomuch that men were afraid it would one day put him in hazard of his life. When he came to ATHENS, he went to heare Antiochus of the city of As-CALON, and fell in great liking with his fweet tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwise he missiked new opinions in Philosophie. For Antiochus had then forsaken the opinions of the new Academicke Philosophers, and the sect of Carneades: being moued thereunto, either through the manifest proofe of things, or by his certaine judgement, or (as some say) for that of an ambition or diffention against the scholers and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reproued the refolutions of the Academicks, which he had of long time defended, onely to leane for the most part to the Stoicks opinions. Howbeit Cicero had most affection vnto the Academickes, and did studie that seet more then all the rest, of purpose, that if he saw he were forbidden to practife in the commonwealth at Rome, he would then go to Athens (leauing all pleas and affaires of the common wealth) to bestow the rest of his time quietly in the studie of Philofophie. At length, when he heard newes of syllaes death, and faw that his bodie was growne to good state and health by exercise, and that his voice became daily more and more to fill mens cares with a fweet and pleafant found, and yet was loud enough for the constitution of his body: receining receiving letters daily from his friends at Rome, that prayed him to returne home; and moreouer, Antiochus felfe also earnestly perswading him to practise in the common-wealth, he began againe to fall to the studie of Rhetoricke, and to frame himselfe to be eloquent, being a necessarything for an Oratour, and did continually exercise himselse in making Orations vpon any speech or proposition, and so frequented the chiefe Oratours and masters of cloquence that were at that time. To this end therefore he went into Asia vnto Rhodes, and amongst the O- circo rent rators of Asia he frequented Xenocles Adrametrin, and Dionysius, Magnesian, and stu- into asia, rators of As I and requested Apollonius Molon, and the Philosopher and to died also with Menippus Carian: at R HO DE's he heard Apollonius Molon, and the Philosopher Rhodes. Politidenius. And it is reported also, that Apollonius wanting the Latine tongue, he did pray Cicero for exercise sake to declame in Grecke. Cicero was very well contented with it, thinking that cicero dethereby his faults should be the better corrected. When he had ended his declamation, all those Greeke. that were present were amazed to heare him, and every man praised him one after another. Howbeit Apollonius all the while Cicero spake, did neuer shew any glad countenance: and when he had ended, he stayed a great while, and said neuer a word. Cicero misliking withall, Apolloniwarlength said vnto him: As forme Cicero, I doe not onely praise thee, but more then that, I refirmanie wonder at thee: and yet I am forie for poore GR BCB, to fee that learning and eloquence (which of Citero. were the two onely gifts and honours left vs) are by thee obtained with vs, and caried vnto the ROMAINES. Now Cicero being very well disposed to go with good hope to practise at Rome, Anorale he was a litle discouraged by an Oracle that was told him. For inquiring of the god Apollo DE L- ginen to PHIAN, how he might do to winne fame and estimation, the Nunne Pythias answered him, he fiere. should obtaine it, so that in his doings he would rather follow the disposition of his owne nature then the opinion of the common people. Wherefore when he came to Rome, at the first he clifing in proceeded very warily, and discreetly, and did vnwillingly seeke for any Office, and when he did, he was not greatly esteemed: for they commonly called him the GRECIAN, and scholer, which are two words which the Artificers (and fuch base Mechanicall people at Rome) haue euer ready at their tongues end. Now he being by nature ambitious of honor, and prickt forward also by the perswassion of his father &friends, in the end he began to pleade, and there obtained not the chiefest place by litle and litle, but so soone as he fell to practife, he was immediatly esteemed aboue all other Oratours and pleaders in his time, and did excell them all. Yet it is reported not with standing, that for his gesture and pronunciation, having the selfe same defects of nature at the beginning, which Demosthenes had, to reforme them, he carefully studied Roseins and to counterfeit Roseius, an excellent Comedian, and Alope also a player of Tragedies. Of this A- Alope fope men write, that he playing one day Atreus part vpon a stage (who determined with himfelfehow he might be reuenged of his brother Thyelles) a feruant by chance having occasion to runnefuddenly by him, he forgetting himselfe, striuing to shew the vehement passion and surie of this king, gaue him such a blow on his head with the scepter in his hand, that he slue him dead in the place. Euen so Ciceroes words were of great force to perswade, by meanes of his grace and pronunciation. For he mocking the Oratours that thrust out their heads, and cried in their Orations, was wont to say, that they were like to lame men, who were driven to ride, because they could not go on foote: euen so (said he) they crie out because they cannot speake. cicero, a fine Truly pleasant taunts do grace an Oratour, and sheweth a fine wit: but yet cicero vsed them so commonly, that they were offensive vnto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious scoffer and spitefull man. He was chosen Treasurer in the time of dearth, when there was great Giero chofcarcitic of corne at Rome: and the prouince of Sicile fell to his lot. At his first coming this ther, the Sicilians misliked him very much, because he compelled them to send corne vnto Rome: but after they had found his diligence, inflice, and lenity, they honoured him aboue any cieroes di-Gouernour that euer was fent from Rome. Now there were diuerse young Gentlemen of ligence, and Rome: of noble houses, who being accused for fundry faults committed in wars against their lening. honour and martiall discipline, had bene sent backe againe vnto the Prætor of Sicile; for whom Gicero pleaded, and did so excellently defend their cause, that they were pardoned enery man. Thereupon, thinking wellof himselfe, when his time was expired, he went to Rome, and by the way there hapned a prety iest vnto him. As he passed through the countrey of CAMPA-NIA (otherwise called the land of labour) he met by chance with one of the chiefest ROMAINES of all his friends. So falling in talke with him, he asked him what they faid of him at Rome, and what they thought of his doings: imagining that all Roma had bene full of the glorie of his name and deeds. His friend asked him againe: And where hast thou bene Cicero all this while, that we have not seene thee at Rome? This killed his heart straight, when he saw that the report of his name and doings, entring into the city of Rome as into an infinite fea, was fo fuddenly vanished away againe, without any other fame or speech. But after that, when he looked into himselfe, and saw that in reason he tooke an infinite labor in hand to attaine to glory, wherin he faw no certaine end wherby to attaine vnto it, it cut off a great part of the ambition he had inhis head: and yet the great pleasure he tooke to heare his owne praise, and to be ouermuch giuento defire of honour and estimation, these two things continued with him euen to his dying day, and dideftfoonesmake him fwarue from inftice. Furthermore, when he began throughly to practife in the affaires of the state, he thought it an ill thing that Artificers and crafts men should haue many forts of instruments and tools without life, to know the names of euery one of them, the places where they should take them, and the vse whereto they should employ them: and that a man of knowledge and quality (who doth all things with the helpe and service of men) should be flothfull and carelesse to learne to know the names of his citizens. Therefore he gaue himfelfe to know, not onely mens names of quality, but the streets also they dwelt in, what part of the city foeuer it was: their goodly houses in the countrey, the friends they made of, and the neighbours whom they companied with. So that when he went abroad into ITALY, wherefocuer he became, Cicero could fliew and name his friends houses. He was not very rich, and yethe had enough to serue his turne: the which made men muse the more at him, and they loued him the better, because he tooke no fee nor gift for his pleading, what cause socuer he tooke in hand, but then specially, when he defended a matter against Verres. This Verres had bene Prætor of Si-CILIA, & had committed many lewd parts there, for the which the SICILIANS did accuse him. Cicero taking vpon him to defend their cause, made Verresto be condemned, not by pleading, but in maner without pleading, and in this fort. The Prators being his indges, and fauouring Verres, had made so many reiornements and delayes, that they had driven it off to the last day of hearing. Cicero perceiuing then he should not have time to speake all that he had to say against him, and that thereby nothing should be done and judged, he rose vp and said, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but only brought forth the witnesses before the Iudges; and hauing caused their depositions to betaken, he prayed they would proceed to sentence, according to their euidence giuen on that behalfe. Yet some doe report, that Gicero gaue many pleasant taunts and girds, in pleading the accusation of the Sicilians against Verres. The ROMAINES do call a Bore, Verres. There was one Cacilius, the fon of a freed bondman, who was suspected to hold with the superstition of the IEVVES. This Cacilius would have put by § SICILIANS from following the accusation of verres, and would have had the matter of his accusation only referred to him, for the profecuting of it against him. Cicero scorning his suite, said vnto him: What hatha I Evv B to do with a Bore? This Verres had a sonne somwhat about twenty yeares of age, who (as the report went) had a very ill name for his beauty. And therefore when Verres one day thoughtto mocke Cicero, faying, that he was too effeminate. Thy children (faid he) are to be reproued of that secretly at home. In this accusation, Hortensius the Oratour durst not directly defend Verres: but touching the condemnation of his fine, he was then contented to answer for him, for he had a Sphinx of Yuorie giuen him by Verres for his reward. Thereupon Cicero gaue him a pretie nip by the way: but Hortensius not vnderstanding him, said, he could not skill of dark speeches. Well faid Cicero, yet hast thou a Sphinx in thy house. In the end Verres being condemned, and a fine fet on his head to the value of threescore and fifteene Myriades, Cicero notwithstanding was suspected to be bribed with money for agreeing to cast him in so small a summe. But yet when he came to be Ædilis, the Sicilians to flew themselves thankfull to him, both brought and sent him many presents out of Sicile. Of all that he tooke nothing to his owne vse, but only bestowed their liberality in bringing downey prices of victuals at Rome. He had a goodly house within the confines of the city of Arpos, a farmealso by Naples, & another about the city of Pomperisbut all these were no great things. Afterwards he had also the joynter of his wife Terentia, which amounted to the summe of twelue Myriades, and besides all this, there came to him by inheritance, eleuen Myriades of their Denarij. Thereupon he liued very honeftly & foberly, without excesse, with his familiar friends that loued him, both GRECIANS and Romaines, and would neuer go to suppertillafter Sunne set, not so much for any great bufine Te he had, as for the weakenesse of his stomack. But otherwise he was very curious, & carefull of his person, and would be rubbed & announted, and he would vie also to walke a certaine number of turnes by proportion: and so exercifing his body in that fort, he was never sicke, and besides was also very strong and lustie of body, able to abide great paines and sorrowes which he fell into afterwards. He gaue his fathers chiefe mansion house to his brother, and went to dwell himselfe in the mount Palatine: because such as came to waite vpon him to do him honor, should Citeros not take the paines to go fo farre to fee him. For he had as many men daily at his gate enery refe and x morning, as either Crassus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his estimatio among & soldiers, both reserve of them being atthattime the chiefest men of Rome. Yea furthermore, Pompeys selfe came vnto Cicero, because his Orations stood him to great purpose, for the increase of his honor and authority. Now when Gicero came to make suite to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinary Judge) though he had many competitors, and fellow fuiters with him, yet was he first chosen afore the cierochoall; and he did so honestly behave himselfe in that Office, that they did not so much as once suf- fen Prator. pecthim of briberie or extortion. And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that Licinius Macer (a man that of himself was of great power, and yet fauoured and supported besides by Crassus accused before Cicere of theft and extortion in his Office: but he trusting much to his supposed credit, and the great suite and labour his friends made for him, went home to his house before fentence pronounced against him, (the Iudges being yet to give their opinions) and there speedily trimmed his beard, and put a new gowne vpon his backe, as though he had bene sure to haue bene quit of his accusation; and then returned againe into the market place. But Crassus went to meete him, and told him, all the Iudges had condemned him. Licinius Macer tooke such a griefe zinius and conceit vpon it, that he went home to his house againe, laid him downe on his bed, and neuer rose after. This iudgement wan Cicero great fame, for they praised him exceedingly for the great paines he tooke, to see instice duly executed. Another also called Vatinius, (a bedlem sellow, and one that behaued himself very vnreuerently to the magistrates in his pleading, and besides had a swollen neck) came very arrogantly one day vnto Cicero being in his Prætoriall seate; and asked him a thing which Gicero would not grant him there, but would thinke of it at better leyfure. Thereupon Vatinius told him, that he would not be scrupulous to grant that, if he were Prætor. Cicero turning to him, answered him againe: No more haue I (said he) such a swollen necke asthou hast. Towards the end of his Office, two or three daies before his time expired, there was one accused Manilius before him, that he also had robbed the commonwealth. This Manilius was very well beloued of the common people, who were perswaded that he was put in fuite, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to despite Pompey with, whose familiar friend he was. So he required certaine daies to answer the matter he was accused of: but Cicero would give him no further respite, but to answer it the next day. The people therewith were maruellously offended, because the other Prætors in such like cases, were wont to give ten daies respite vnto others. The next morning when the Tribunes had brought him before the Iudges, and also accused him vnto them, he besought Cicero to heare him patiently. Cicero made him answer, that having alwaies vsed as much favour and courteste as he possibly might by law vnto those that were accused, he thought he should offer Manilius too great wrong, if he should not do the like to him: wherefore, because he had but one day more to continue Prætor in office, he had purposely giuen him that day to make his answer before him. For he said, that to leaue his accusation to the hearing of an other Prætor, he could not have bene thought a man that had borne him good will, and meant to pleasure him. These words did maruellously change the citer with peoples opinion and affection towards him, and euery man speaking well of him, they prayed him to defend Manilius cause. He willingly granted them: and coming from the bench, standing at the barre like an Oratour to pleade for him, he made a notable Oration, and spake Tribunes. both boldly and sharply against the chiefemen of the city, and those specially that did enuie Pompey. This not with standing, when he came to sue to be Confull, he found as great fauour a- cheero made mongst the Nobility, as he did with the communaltie. For they did further his suite, for the conful. common-wealths fake, vpon this occasion. The change and alteration of government the which sylla brought in, was thought strange at the first among the people: but now men by processe of time being vsed to it, it was throughly established, and no man misliked it. At that time many men practifed to subuert the gouernment, not for the benefit of the commonwealth, The confidence but to serve their owne couetous minds. For Pompey being then in the East parts, made warres racke of with the kings of Pontys and Armenia, and had not left sufficient force at Rome to refist cantion.

fo dead with his eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in Rome made the Romaines know.

that returning presently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receive otho with clapping of their hands, and contended with the knights which of them should do him greatest honour.

But now againe, the rebels of Catilines conspiracie (who were pretily cooled at the first for the fearethey stood in) began to be lusty againe, and to gather together, boldly incouraging one another to broach their practife, before Pompey returned, who was said to be on the way towards Romewith his army. But besides them, those souldiers that had served before in the wars vnfivading themselves that they should once againe have goods enough at home, to spoile and ransacke at their pleasure. These fouldiers having one Manlius to their Captaine, that had borne office in the field vnder Sylla, conspired with Cateline, and came to Rome to affist him in his suite:

who purposed once againe to demaund the Consulship, being determined at the election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The gods also did plainly shew by earth-quakes, lightning and thunder, and by vision of spirits that did appeare, the secret practise and conspiracie: besides also, there fell out manifest coniectures and proofes by men that came to reucale them, how beit they had no power sufficient to encounter so noble a man, and of so great power as Catiline was.

his conspiracie, he gaue Cicero a gentle answer, and said thus: What do I offend, said he, if that being two bodies in this towne, the one leane and weake, and throughly rotten, & hath a head; and the other being great, strong, and of power, having no head, I do give it one? meaning vnder this darke answer, to signifie the people and Senate. This answer being made, Cicero was more afraid then before, infomuch that he put on a brigantine for the fafety of his body, & was accompanied with the chiefest men of Rome, and a great number of yong men besides going with him from his house into the field of Mars, where the elections were made; and had of purpose left open his iacket loose at the coller, that his brigantine he had on might be seen; therby to let every mã that faw him, know the danger he was in. Euery man misliked it when they saw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offered to affaile him. But it so came to passe, that by voices of the peo-

Catiline, and the day appointed being at hand to broach their enterprise, about midnight, there these seditious persons, that sought nothing but rebellion. These men had made Lucius Catilini their Captaine, a desperate man to attempt any great enterprise, subtill and malicious of nature. He was accused before (besides many other vile faults) for deslouring of his owne daughter, and killing his brother; and being afraid to be put in suite for it, he prayed Sylla to put his brothera. mongst the number of the outlawes (or proscripts) as if he had bene then aliue. These wicked rebels having chosen them such a Captaine, were sworne and bound one to another in this man. ner. They killed a man, and did eate of his flesh together, and had besides corrupted the most part of all the youth. For Cattline their Captaine suffered euery man to take his pleasure, as his youth was inclined vnto, as to banquet, to follow harlots; and gaue them mony largely to beflow in these vaine expences. Furthermore, all THYSCAN began to rise, and the most partos GAVL Balfo, lying betweene the Alpes and ITALIE. The city of Rome it felfe was also ingreate danger of rifing, for the inequality of the goods of the inhabitants. For the Noblemen and of greatest courage, had spent all their lands in plaies and feasts, or in buildings & common works, which they built at their owne charge, to curry fauor with the common people, that they might obtaine the chiefe offices: fo that thereby they became very poore, and their goods werein the hands of the meanemen and wretches. Thus the state of Rome stood in great hazard of vprore, the which any man might cafily have procured that durft have taken vpon him any change or alteration of gouernment, there was then such division among them in the state. Catiline notwithstanding, to prouide him of a strong bulwarketo prosecute his intent, came to sue Confull, hoping that he should be chosen with Carus Antonius, a manthat of himself was aptneither to do any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that could be a great strength and aide you him that would attempt any thing. Diverse noble & wise men foreseeing that, did procure Cheroto fue for the Consulfhip. The people accepted him, and rejected Catiline, Antonius and Cicero therupon were created Consuls, although that cicero of all the suiters for y Consulship was but only a Knights son, and not the son of a Senatour of Rome. Now, though the common people vnderstood not the secret practise and meaning of Catiline, yet at the beginning of Cicerots Confulship, there fell out great trouble and contention in the commonwealth. For they of the one fide, whom Sylla had by his ordinances deposed from their dignities and offices in Rome (who were no small men, neither few in number) began to creepe into the peoples good wil, alledging many true and iust reasons against the tyrannicall power of Sylla: howbeit spokenin ill time, when it was out of time to make any change or alteration in the commonwealth. The Tribunes on the other fide preferred lawes and ordinances to further this deuice. They preferred the law to choose the Decemuiri, with soueraigne power and authority through all ITALY and Syria, and alfothrough all the countries and provinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of Rome: to sell, and release all lands belonging to the state of Rome, to accuse any man whom they thought good, to banish any man, to restore y Colonies with people, to take what mony they would out of the Treasurie, to leavie men of warre, and to keepe them. in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and absolute power of the Decemuiri, there were many men of great account that fauoured this law, but Antonius chiefly, being colleague and fellow Confull with Cicero, for he had good hope to be chosen one of these ten Commission oners; and furthermore, it was thought that he was privile vnto Catilines conspiracie, and that he misliked it not, because he was so much in debt, And this was it that the Noblemen most feared of all other things. Thereupon Cicero, to prouide first to preuent this danger, granted to him the prouince of the Realme of MACEDON: and the prouince of GAVLE being offered vnto himselse, herefused it. By this good turne he wan Antonius like a hired player, making himto promise him that he would assist and aide him for the benefit of the commonwealth, and that he would say no more, then he should will him. When he had brought him to this, and had won him to his mind, he then began to be the bolder, and more stoutly to resist them that were authors of this innouation and new lawes. Cicerotherefore in open Senate, did one day sharply reproue and inueigh against this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes would have established. And thereby he did so terrifie the authors thereof, that there was not one man durse speake against him. This notwithstanding, the Tribunes afterwards attempted once againe to haue it to passe, and appointed the Consuls to appeare before the people. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abashed at it, he commanded the Senate to follow him. So he did not only overthrow this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes did preferre, but furthermore they were veterly how much eloquence doth grace and beautifie that which is honest, & how inuincible right and inflice are, being eloquently fet forth; and also how that a man that will be counted a wise gouernour of a commonweale, should alwaies in his doings rather preferre profit, then seeke to currie fanour with the common people: yet fo to vse his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be also vnpleasant. And to proue his sweet and pleasant tongue, may be alledged that which he did in the time of his Consulship, touching the placing of men at the Theater to see the paftimes. For before, the knights of Rome did fit mingled one with another amongst the common people, & tooke their place as they came. The first that made the difference between them, was * others *Marcus Otho, at that time Prætor: who made a law, by the which he appointed seuerall seates for dosar Luthe knights, where they might from thenceforth fee the pastimes. The people tooke this grie-noufly, as a thing done to discountenance them: insomuch that Otho comming afterwards into bune of the the Theater, althe common people fell a whistling at him, to shame him withal. The knights also people. in contrariwise made him roome among them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honor. Rotati Therewith the people fell a whistling lowder then before, and the knights in like maner to clap- ding of the ping of their hands, and so grew to words one with another, that all the Theater was straight in vprore with it. Cicero vnderstanding it, went thither himselfe, and calling the people to the temple of the goddesse Bellona, he there so sharply reproued them, and therwith so perswaded them, ftranger vnknown, which were directed vnto divers persons among the which, one of them had no name subscribed, but was onely directed vnto Crassus himselfe. The effect of the letter was that there should be made a great slaughter in Rome by Cariline, & therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of Rome to faue himselfe. Crassus having read his own letter, would not open the rest, but went forthwith vnto Cicero, partly for feare of the danger, & partly also to cleare himselfc of the suspition they had of him for the friendship that was betweet him and Catiline. Cicero counfelling with them what was to be done, the next morning affembled the Senate very early, and carying the letters with him, he did deliuer them according to their direction, & commanded they should reade them out aloud. All these letters, and every one of them particularly. did bewray the conspiracy. Furthermore, Quintus Arrius a man of authority, and that had bene Prætor, told openly the fouldiers and men of war that were leavied in Thysean. And it is reported alfo, that Manlius was in the field with a great number of fouldiers about the cities of THUSCAN, gaping dayly to heare newes of fome change at ROME. All these things being throughly confidered, a decree passed by the Senate, that they should referre the care of the commonwealth vnto the Confuls, to the end that with absolute authority they might (as we las they could prouide for the fafety and preferuation thereof. Such manner of decree and authority, was not often feene concluded of in the Senate, but in time of prefent feare and danger. Now Cicero having this absolute power, he referred all forreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge, & did himfelfe take vpon him the care and gouerument of al civill affaires within Rome. On the day time when he went up and downe the towne, he had fuch a troupe of men after him. that when he came through y great market place, he almost filled it with his traine that followed him. Thereupon Cattline would no longer delay time, but refolued to go him felfe vnto Manlins, where their army lay. But before he departed, he had drawne into his confederacy one Marting, and another called Cethegus, whom he commanded betimes in the morning to goe to Ciceroes house with short daggers to kill him, pretending to come to salute him, and to give him a good morow. But there was a noble woman of Rome called Fuluia, who went our right vnto Cieero, and bad him beware of that Cethegus, who indeed came the next morning betimes vnto him and being denied to be let in, he began to chafe & raile before the gate. This made him the moreto be suspected. In the end cicero comming out of his house, called the Senate to the temple of Inpiter Stator, (as much to fay as, Stayer) which standeth at the upper end of the holy street as they go to the mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he meant to cleare him-Telfe of the suspition that went of him: how beit there was not a Senator that would fit downeby him, but they did all rife from the bench where Cattline had taken his place. And further, when he began to speake, he could have no audience for the great noise they made against him. So at length Cicero rose, and commanded him to avoid out of Rom H, saying, that there must needs be a feparation of wals betweene them two confidering that the one yfed but words, and the other force of armes, catiline therupon immediatly departing the city with three hundred armed men, was no fooner out of the precinct of the walles, but he made his Sergeants cary axes and bundels of rods before him, as if he had bene a Confull lawfully created; and did difplay his enfignes of warre, and so went in this order to seeke Manlins. When they were joyned, he had not much leffe then twenty thousand men together, with the which he went to practise the townes to rebell. Now open warre being thus proclaimed, Antonius, Ciccroes colleague and fellow Confull, was fent against him to fight with him. In the meane space, Cornelius Lentulus, sirnamed Sura (a man of a noble house, but of a wicked disposition, and that for his ill life was put off the Scnate) affembled all the rest which were of Catilines conspiracie, and that remained behind him in Rome, and bad them be afraid of nothing. He was then Prator the second time, as the maner is when any man comes to recouer againe the dignity of a Senator which he had loft. It is reported, that this firname of Sura was given him vponthis occasion. He being Treasurer in Syllaes Dictarorship, did fondly wast and consume a maruellous summe of mony of the common treasure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demanding an account of him before the Senate, he carelefly and contemptuoufly flepped forth, faying, he could make him no other account, but shewed him the calfe of his leg, as children do when they make a fault at tennis. And thereof it came, that ever after that they called him Sura, because Sura in Latine fignifieth the calfe of the leg. Another time also being accused for a leud part he had committed, he bribed some of the Judges with money; and being onely quit by two voices more which he had in his fauour, he

him to be cleared by one voice more. This mā being of this disposition, was first of all incensed by Catiline, and lastly marred by certaine wizards & false prognosticators that had mocked him with a vaine hope, singing verses vnto him which they had fained and deuised, and false prophecies also, which they bare him in hand they had taken out of Sybilles books of prophecic, which faid, that there should reigne three Cornelij at Rome, of the which, two had already fulfilled the neligibat prophecie, Cinna and Sylla, and for the third, fortune laid it vpon him, and therefore badhim goe found through withall, and not to dreame it out, losing oportunity as Catiline had done. Now this Lenthlus yndertook no small enterprise, but had an intent with him to kill all the whole Senate, and Greattreas as many other citizens as they could murther, and to fet fire on Rome, sparing none but Pompeys on praction fonnes, whom they would referue for pledges, to make their peace afterwards with Pompey: for fed in Rome for new to the content of the conten the rumor was very great and certain also, that he returned from very great wars and conquests lus and Cewhich he had made in the East countries. So they layd a plot to put their treason in execution, in thegus. one of the nights of Saturnes feasts. Further, they had brought flaxe and brimstone, and a great number of armours and weapons into Cethegus house. Besides all this prouision, they had appointed a hundred men in an hundred parts of the city, to the end that fire being raised in many places at one time, it should the sooner runne through the whole city. Other men also were appointed to stop the pipes and water conduits which brought water to Rome, and to kill those also that came for water to quench the fire. In all this stir, by chance there were two Ambassadors of the Allobroges, whose country at that time did much mislike of the Romaines, and were viwiling to be subject vinto them. Lentulus thought these men very fit instruments to cause all GAVLE to rebell. Thereupon practifing with them, he wanthem to be of their conspiracie, and gaue them letters directed to the Councell of their country, and in them did promise them freedome. He fent other letters also vnto Catiline, and perswaded him to proclaime liberty to all bondmen, and to come with all the speed he could to Rome : and sent with them one Titus of the city of Crotona, to carrie these letters. But all their counsels and purposes (like fooles that neuer met together but at feasts, drinking drunke with light women) were easily found out by Cicero, who had a carefull eye vpon them, and very wifely and discreetly saw through them. For he had appointed men out of the city to spie their doings, which followed them to see what they intended. Furthermore, he spake secretly with some he trusted, (the which others also took to be of the conspiracie) and knew by them that Lentulus and Cethegus had practised with the Ambassadors of the Allogross, and drawne them into their conspiracie. At length he watched them one night fo narrowly, that he tooke the Ambassadors, and Titus CROTONIAN with rators apthe letters he caried, by helpe of the Ambassadors of the Allor Roges, which had secretly informed him of all before. The next morning by breake of day, Cicero assembled the Senate in $ temple of Concord, and there openly read the letters, and heard the cuidence of the witnesses. Further, there was one Iunius Syllanus a Senator that gaue in euidence, that some heard Cethegus fay, that they should kill three Consuls and foure Prætors. Pife a Senator also, and that had bene Confull, told in maner the selfe same tale. And Caius Sulpitius a Prætor, that was sent into Cethegus house, reported that he had found great store of darts, armor, daggers, and swords new made. Lastly, the Senate having promised Titus CROTONIAN he should have no hurt, so he would tell what he knew of this confipracie, Lentulus thereby was conuinced, and driven to give vp his office of Prætor before the Senate, and changing his purple gowne, to take another meete for his miserable state. This being done, Lentulus and his conforts were committed to ward to the Prætors houses. Now growing towards evening, the people waiting about the place where the Scnate was affembled, Gicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Therupon he was conueyed by all the people vnto a friends house of his hard by: for that his owne house was occupied by the Ladies of the city, who were busie, solemnly celebrating a secret sacrifice in the honour of the goddesse, called of the Romaines the Good goddesse, and of the GRECIANS Gynecia, to wit, feminine: vnto her this yearly facrifice is done at the Cofuls house, by the wife or mother of the Consuli then being, the Vestall Nunnes being present at it. Now Cicero being come into his neighbors house, began to bethinke him what course he were best to take in this matter. For to punish the offenders with seuerity, according to their deserts, he was afraid to do it, both because he was of a courteous nature, as also for that he would not seeme to rigour, citizens that were of the noblest houses of the city, and that had besides many friends. And contrariwise also, being remisse in so weighty a matter as this, he was afraid of the danger that might enfuc of their raffines, mistrusting that if he should punish them with lesse then death. they would not amend for it, imagining they were wel rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and desperate then everthey were, adding moreover the sting and spite of a new malice vnto their accustomed wickednesses that he himselfe should be thought acoward and timorous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with these doubts, there appeared a miracle to y Ladies, doing sacrifice at home in his house. For the fire being thought to be cleane out vpon the Altar where they had sacri. ficed, there suddenly rose out of the imbers of the rindes or barks which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amazed al the other Ladies. Howbeit the Vestall Nuns willed Terentia (Ci. cerees wife) to go straight vnto her husband, & to bid him not to be afraid to execute that boldly which he had confidered of for the benefit of the comonwealth, & that the goddeffe had raifed this great flame, to flew him that he should have great honor by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timorous nor faint hearted woman, but very ambitious, & furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her husband of the affaires of the state, then otherwise she had acquainted him with her housewifery in the house, as cicero himselfe reporteth, she went to make report thereof ynto him & prayed him to do execution of those men. The like did Quintus Cicero his brother, & also Publius Nigidius his friend and fellow student with him in Philosophie and whose counsell also Cicere followed much in the gouernment of the commonwealth. The next morning the matter being propounded to the arbiterment of the Senate, how these male factors should be punished. Syllanus being asked his opinion first, said, that they should be put in prison, and from thence to suffer execution. Others likewise that followed him were al of that mind, but Caius Casar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, & was then but a yong man, and began to come forward, but yet fuch a one, as by his behauior & the hope he had, took fuch a courfe, that afterwards he brought the commonwealth of Rome into an absolute Monarchie. For at that time Cicero had vehement fuspitions of Casar, but no apparent proofe to conuince him. And some say, that it was brought cefar tring fo neare, as he was almost connicted, but yet faued himself. Others write to the contrary, that ciconspiration. cero wittingly diffembled, that he either heard or knew any fignes which were told him against Cafar, being afraid indeed of his friends & estimation. For it was a cleare case, that if they had accufed Cafar with the rest, he vindoubtedly had sooner saued altheir lives then he should have lost his own. Now when Gafar came to deliver his opinion touching the punishment of these prisoners, he flood vp & faid, that he did northink it good to put them to death, but to confiscate their goods; and as for their persons, that they should bestow them in prison, some in one place, some in another, in such cities of ITALY as pleased Cicero best, vntill the warre of Catiline were ended. This fentence being very mild, and the author thereof maruellous cloquent to make it good, Cicero himselse added thereunto a counterpoise, inclining vnto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the first, and partly also the opinion of Casar. His friends thinking that Casars opinion was the fafest for Gicero, because therby he should deserve lesse blame for that he had not put the prisoners to death, they followed rather the second. Wherupon Syllanus also recanted that he had Ipoke, & expounded his opinio, faying, that when he spake they shold be put to death, he meant nothing so, but thought the last punishment a Senator of Rome could have, was the prison. But the first that contraried this opinion, was Catalus Luctatius, and after him Cato, who with vehement words enforced Cafars suspicion, and furthermore filled al the Senate with wrath and outrage: fo that even you the instant it was decreed by most voices, that they should suffer death. But Cafar stept vp againe, and spake against the confiscation of their goods, misliking that they should reject the gentlest part of his opinion, and that contrariwise they should sticke vnto the feuerest onely: howbeit because the greatest number prevailed against him, he called the Tribunes to aid him, to the endthey should withstand it; but they would give no eare vnto him Cicero thereupon yeelding of himfelfe, did remit the confifcation of their goods, & went with the Senate to fetch the prisoners, who were not all in one house, but every Prætor had one of them. So he went first to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy streete and the market place, accompanied with the chiefest men of the citic, who compassed him round about, and guarded his person. The people seeing that, quaked and trembled for feare, passed by, and said neuer a word: and specially the young men, who

thought it had bene some solemne mystery for the health of their country, that was so accompanied with the chiefe Magistrate, and the Noblemen of the city, with terrour and feare. So when he had passed through the market place, and was come to the prison, he deliuered Lentulus into the hands of the hang-man, and commanded him to do execution. Afterwards also Cetheous. and then all the rest, one after another, whom he brought to the prison himself, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, seeing divers of their accomplices in a troupe together in the market place, who knew nothing what he had done, and watched only till night were come, suppoling then to take away their companions by force from the place where they were, thinking they were yet aliue, he turned vnto them, and faid aloud, They liued. This is a phrase of speech a word which the ROMAINE's vie fometime, when they will finely conney the hardnesse of the speech. War ped for to say he is dead. When night was come, and that he was going homeward, as he came through the market place, the people did waite vpon him no more with filence as before, but with great cries of his praise, and clapping of hands in enery place he went, and called him sauiour, and ciceroes fecond founder of Rome. Besides all this, at enery mans doore there were linkes and torches lighted, that it was as light in the streetes as at noone dayes. The very women also did put lights out of the tops of their houses to do him honour, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with fuch along traine of the chiefest men of the city, (of the which many of them had ended great warres, for the which they had triumphed, and had obtained many famous conquests to the Empire of Rome, both by sea and land) confessing between themselves one to another, that the ROMAINES were greatly bound to many Captaines & Generals of armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches and spoiles, and increase of their power which they had wonne: howbeit that they were to thanke Cicero onely for their health and preferuation, having faued them from so great and extreme a danger. Not for that they thought it so wonderfull an act to haue stricken dead the enterprise of the conspirators, and also to haue punished the offenders by death; but because the conspiracy of Catiline, being so great and dangerous an insurrection as cuer was any, he had quenched it, & pluckt it vp by the roots, with fo finall hurt, and without vprore, trous le, or actuall feditio. For the most part of them that were gathered together about Catiline, when they heard that Leatulus and all the rest were put to death, they presently for sooke him: and Catiline himselfe also fighting a battell with them he had about him, against Antonius Catiline the other Confull with Cicero, he was flaine in the field, and all his army defeated. This not with standing there were many that spake ill of Cicero for this fact, and meant to make him repent it. hauing fortheir heads Cafar, (who was alreadie chosen Prætor for the yeare to come) Metellus and Bestia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. They so some as they were chosen Tribunes, for Prator. would not once suffer cicero to speake to the people, notwithstanding that he was yet in his office of Confull for certain daies. And furthermore, to let him that he should not speake vnto the bunes of the people, they did fet their benches vponthe pulpit for orations, which they call at Rome Roftra: people. and would neuer suffer him to set foot in it, but only to resigne his office, and that done, to come downeagaine immediatly. He granted thereunto, and went vp to the pulpit vpon that condition. So filence being made him, he made an oth, not like vnto other Confuls othes when they refigne their office in like maner, but strange, and neuer heard of before, swearing that he had saued office. the city of Rome, and preserved all his countrey and the Empire of Rome from viter ruine and destruction. All the people that were present confirmed it, and sware the like oth. Wherewithall Cafar and the other Tribunes his enemies were so offended with him, that they deuised to breed him fome new ftir and trouble: and among ft others, they made a decree, that Pompey should be fent for with his army to bridle the tyranny of Cicero. Cato (who at that time was also Tribune) did him great pleasure in the furtherance of the comonwealth, opposing himself against al their practifes, with the like authority and power that they had being a Tribune and brother with them, and of better estimation then they. So that he did not only easily breake all their deuices. but also in a goodly oration he made in a full assembly of the people, he so highly praised & extolled Ciceroes Confulfhip vnto them, and the things he did in his office, that they gave him the greatest honoursthat euer were decreed or granted unto any man lining. For by decree of the praised by people he was called, Father of the countrey, as Cato himfelfe had called him in his oration: the Given the which name was never given to any man, but onely vnto him; and also he bare greater sway in fift man Rome at that time then any man befide him. much boast of himselfe. For heneuer was in any assembly of people, Senate, or judgement, but enery mans head was full still to heare the found of Catiline and Lentulus brought in for sport, & filling the bookes and workes he compiled befides full of his owne praises: the which made his fweet and pleasant stile tedious, and troublesome to those that heard him, as though this missor. tune euer followed him to take away his excellent grace. But now, though he had this worme of ambition, and extreme couctous defire of honor in his head, yet did he not malice or enuicany others glory, but would very frankly praise excellent men, as well those that had bene before him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his writings. They have writte also certaine notable words he spake of some ancient men in old time, as of Aristotle, that he was like a golden flowing river; and of Plato, that if Iupiter himselfe would speake, he would speake like him; and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: and of Demosihenes Orations. when one asked him on a time which of them he liked best: The longest, said he. There be divers writers also, who to shew that they were great followers of Demasthenes, do follow Cicerces saying in a certaine Epistlehe wrote vnto one of his friends, wherein he said, that Demosthenes sleptin force of his Orations: but yet they forgot to tell how highly he praised him in that place; & that he calleth the Orations which he wrote against Antonius (in the which he took great paines, and fludied more then all the rest) PHILIPPIANS: to follow those which Demostheres wrote against Philip king of Macedon. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his time, either incloquence or in learning, whose same he hath not comended in writing or otherwise in honorable speech of him. For he obtained of Cafar, when he had y Empire of Rome in his hands, that Gratippus the Periparetick Philosopher was made citize of Rome, Further, he procured that by decree of the court of the Arcopagites, he was intreated to remaine at ATHENS, to teach and infiruct the youth there: for that he was a great honor & ornament vnto their city. There are extat alfo of Ciceroes Epistles vnto Herodes, & others vnto his son, willing him to follow Cratippus in his fludy and knowledge. He wrote another letter also vnto Gorgias the Rhetoritian, and forbad him his fons company; because he understood he inticed him to drunkennesse, and to other great dishonesty. Of all his Epistles he wrote in Greeke, there is but that only written in choler, and another which he wrote vnto Pelops BY ZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reafonto be offended with him, &to taunt him in his letter, because (as it seemed) he was a man of very leud life and conversation. But in contrary maner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding himfelfe grieued with him, forthat he was negliget in procuring the BYZANTINES to ordaine some publike honours in his behalfeithat, methinkes, proceeded of our much ambition, the which in many things made him too much forgetthe part of an honest man, and only because he would be commended for his eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatius cause before the Judges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his, it is reported, that he was so angry with him, that he told him, What Munatius, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine acculatio, not for thine innocency, but for a mist I cast before the Iudges eies, that made them they could not discerne the fault. Another time also, having openly praised Marcus Crassus in the pulpit, with good audience of the people, shortly after he spake to the contrary all the cuill he could of him, in the same place. Why, how now, said crass, didst thou not thy selfe highly praise me in this place, the last day? I cannot deny it, said Cicero: but indeed I tooke an ill matter in hand to shew mine cloquence. Another time Crassus chanced to say in an open assembly, that none of all the Crasi of his house had euer lined aboue threescore yeares: and afterwards againe repenting himfelfe, he called it in againe, and faid, Sure I knew not what I did, when I faid fo. Gicero answered him againe: Thou knewest well enough the people were glad to heare it, and therefore thou spakest it to please them. Another time Crassus liking the opinion of the Stoick Philosophers, that said, the wife man was ener rich, Cicero answered him, and bad him consider whether they meant northereby, that the wife man had all things. Craffus conetonfiellewas defamed of enery man. Of Crassus some of them did much resemble Actius, and there fore his mother had an ill name by him: one day this sonne of Crassus made an Oration before the Senate, which divers of them commended very much. "So, Cicero being asked how he liked it: Methinkes, faid he, it is * Attius of Crassus. About this time, Crassus being ready to take his journey into Syria, he defired to haue Cicero his friend rather then his enemy. Therefore one night making much of him, he told Cicero that he would come and suppe withhim. Cicero said, he should be welcome. Shortly after, some of his friends toldhimof

Vatinitis,

Vatinius, how he was desirous to be made friends with him, for he was his enemy. What, quoth Cicero and will be come to supper too? Thus he vsed Crassus. Now this Vatinius having a swolne necke, one day pleading before Gicero, he called him the Iwolne Orator. Another time when he heard fay that he was dead, and then that he was aliue againe: A vengeance on him, faid he, that hath lyed fo shamefully. Another time when Cafar had made a law for the deciding of the lands of CAMPANIA vnto the fouldiers, diverse of the Senate were angry with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very old man) faid, he would neuer grant it while he lived. Cicero pleafantly answered againe, Alas, tarie a litle, the good old man will not trouble you long, Another time there was one Octauius, supposed to be an * African borne: he when Cicero on a time * Record pleaded a matter, faid, that he heard him not: Cicero presently answered him againe, And yet hast thoughole bored through thine care. Another time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had ouerthrowne moe men by his witnesse then he had faued by his eloquence. I grant, said Gicero, for there are indeed I have more faith, then eloquence in me. So was there allo a young manthat was suspe- boated, cted to have poisoned his father with a tart, that boasted he would reuile Cicero: I had rather have that of thee, quoth Cicero, then thy tart. Publius Sextius also having a matter before the Judges, entertained Cicero, with other of his Counfellers: but yet he would speake all himselfe, and give none of the Oratours leave to fay any thing. In the end, when they faw plainly that the Judges would discharge him, being ready to give sentence, Cicero said vnto him, Bestirre thee hardly to day, for to morrow Sexious thou shalt be a private man. Another, one Publius Cotta, who would faine hauebene thought a wife Lawyer, and yet had little wit and viderstanding, Cicero appealed to him as a witnesse in a matter; and being examined, he answered he knew nothing of it. Cicero replied to him againe: Thou thinkeft peraduenture they aske thee touching the law. Againe, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine disputation he had with Cicero, did many times repeate. Who is thy father: Cicero answered him againe: Thy mother hath made this question harder for thee to answer. This Nepos mother was reported to be a light housewife, and he as subtill witted and vnconstant. For he being Tribune left in a geere the exercise of his office, and went into Sy-RIA to Pompey vponno occasion: and as fondly againe he returned thence vpon a sodaine. His schoolemaster Philager also being dead, he buried him very honestly, and fer a crow of stone voponthe top of histombe. Cicero feeing it, told him, Thou haft done very wifely: for thy Mafter hath taught thee rather to flie, then to speake. Another time Appius Clodius pleading a matter, faid in his preamble, that his friend had earneftly requested him to imploy al his knowledge, diligence, and faith upon this matter. O gods, faid Gicero, and haft thou shewed thy felfe so hard hearted to thy friend, as to performe nothing of all that he requested thee? Now to yie these fine taunts and girds to his enemies, it was a part of a good Oratour: but so commonly to gird enery man to make the people laugh, that wanne him great ill-will of many, as shall appeare by some examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two sonnes in law, who were both banished: Gicerotherfore called him Adrastus-Lucius Cotta by chance also was Cenfor at that time, when Cicero fued to be Conful: and following his fuite at the day of election, he was athirft. and was driven to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friends stood about him, and after he had drunke, he faid vnto them: It is well done of ye (faid he) to be affrayd left the Cenfor should be angrie with me because I drinke water: for it was reported the Censor loued wine well. Anothertime Cicero meeting one Vocanius, with three fowle daughters of his with him, he cryed out aloud:

This man hath gotten children in despite of Phabus. It was thought in Rome that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free parents by father and mother, who reading certaine letters one day in the Senate very loude: Cicero faid vnto them that were about him, Wonder not at him, quoth he, for this man hath bene a Cryer in his daies. Faufus, the fonne of Sylla Dictator at Rome, which fet up billes outlawing diverse Romaines, making it lawfull for any man to kill them without danger where they found them, this man after he had spent the most part of his fathers goods, was so sore in debt, that he was driven to fell his houshold stuffe, by billes fet up on energy post. Cicero when he saw them, Yea marrie, faid he, these billes please me better, then those which his father set vp. These taunts and common quippes without purpose, made diverse men to malice him. The great ill-will that The malice Clodius bare him, beganne vpon this occasion. Clodius was of a noble house, a young man, betwist Cicero and and very wild and infolent; he being in loue with Pompeia Cafars wife, found the meanes clothin. Écec 4 fecretly to get into Cafars house, apparelled like a young finging wench, because on that day the Ladies of Rome did folemnly celebrate a secret sacrifice in Casars house, which is not lawfull for men to be present at. So there was no man there but Cledius, who thought be should not have bene knowne, because he was but a young man, without any haire on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongst the other women. He being gotten into this great houseby night, not knowing the roomes and chambers in it, there was one of Casars mothers maides of her chamber, called Aurelia, who feeing him wandring vp and downethe house in this fort, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to answer, he faid he fought for Aura, one of Pompeiaes maides. The maide perceived straight it was no womans voice, and therewithall gaue agreat shrich, and called the other women, the which did fee the gates fast shut, and then fought every corner vp and downe, so that at length they found him in the maides chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was straight blowne abroad in the city, whereupon Cefar put his wife away: and one of the Tribunes also accused Clodins, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy ceremonies of the facrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, being one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had euer accompanied him to guard him, if any man would have offered him injurie in the bufic time of the conspiracie of Catiline. Clodius stoutly denied the matter he was burdened with, and said that he was not in Rome at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gaue enidence against him, and deposed, that the selfe same day he came home to his house vnto him, to speake with him about certaine matters. This indeed was true, though it feemeth Cicero gaue not this euidence so much for the truthes sake, as to please his wife Terentia : for she hated Clodius to the death, because of his fifter Clodia that would have maried Cicero, and did secretly practise the mariage by one Tullius, who was Ciceroes very friend; and because he repaired very often to this Cloaia that dwelt hard by Cicero, Terentia began to suspect him. Terentia being a cruell woman, and wearing her husbands breeches, allured Cicero to fer vpon Clodius in his aduersity, and to wirnesse against him, as many other honest men of the city also did: Some that he was periured, others that he committed a thousand lewdparts, that he bribed the people with money, that he had enticed and deflowred many women. Lucullus also brought forth certaine maidens, which deposed that Clodius had deflowed the youngest of his owne fisters, she being in the house with him, and maried. And there went a great rumour also, that he knew his two other fifters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and maried vnto king Martius: and the other Glodia, whom Metellus Celer had maried, and whom they commonly called Quadrantaria: because one of her paramours sent her a purse full of Quadrines (which are little peeces of copper money) in ftead of filier. Clodius was flandered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithstanding, the people were very much offended with them that gaue enidence against him, and accused him. The Judges being affraid of it, got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his indgement, for the fafety of their persons and in the tables where they wrote their fentences, their letters for the most part were confusedly set downe. This not with standing, it was found that he was quit by the greatest number: and it was reported also that some of them were close fisted. Catalus therfore meeting with some of them going home, after they had given their fentence, told them: Surely ye had good reason to be well guarded for your safety, for you were afraid your mony should have bintaken from you, which you tooke for bribes. And Cicero said vnto Clodius, who reproued him that his witnesse was not true he gaue against him : Cleane contrary, quoth Cicero, for fine and twenty of the Indges have believed me, being fo many that have condemned thee, and the thirty would not beleeue thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingred mony. Notwithstanding in this iudgement Cafar neuer gaue euidence against Cledius: and faid moreouer, that he did not thinke his wife had committed any adultery: howbeit that he had put her away, because he would that Casars wife should not only be cleane from any dishonestie, but also void of all suspition. Clodius being quit of this accusation and trouble, and hauing also found meanes to be chosen Tribune, he began straight to persecute Cicero, changing all things, and stirring vp all manner of people against him. First he wanne the goodwill of the common people by denifing of new lawes which he preferred for their benefit and commodity:to both the Confuls he granted great & large provinces: vnto Pifo, MACEDON, and to Gabinius, Syria. He made also many pooremen free Citizens, and had alwaies about him a great number of slaves armed. At that present time there were three notable men in Rome, which carried all the sway: Crassus that shewed himselfe an open enemy vnto Cicero. Pompey the other, Pompey, made much both of the one and the other: the third was Cafar, who was prepared for his journy & Cafar into GAVLE with an army. Cicero did leane vnto him, (though he knew him no fast friend of his, three of the and that he mistrusted him for matters past in Catilines conspiracy) & prayed him that he might in Ryms. goto the wars with him, as one of his Lieutenants. C. efar granted him. Thereupon Clodius perceiuing that by thismeanes he got him out of the danger of his office of Tribuneship for that with clodiveare, he made faire weather with him (as though he meant to reconcile himselfe vnto him) and Giero. told him that he had cause rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done against him, then of himselfe; and alwaies spake very courteously of him as occasion fell out, and said, he did think nothing in him, neither had any malice to him, howbeit it did a little griene him, that being a friend, he was offered vnkindnesse by a friend. These sweet words made Cicero no more afraid. fo that he gaue vp his Lieutenancie vnto Cafar, & began againe to plead as he did before. Cafar took this in such disdain, that he hartened Clodius the more against him, and besides, made Pomper his enemy. And Cafar himselfe also said before all the people, that he thought Cicero had put Lentulus, Cethegus, and the rest vniustly to death, and contrary to law, without lawfull triall and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accused. Therupon Cicerolleging himicife accused for this sact, he changed his viuall gowne he wore, and put on a mourning gowne: and fo fuffering his beard and haire of his head to grow without any combing he went in this humble manner, and fued to the people. But clodius was euer about him in euerv place and street he went, having a fight of rascals and knaues with him, that shamefully mocked him for that he had changed his gowne and countenance in that fort, and oftentimes they cast dirt and ftones at him, breaking his talke and requests he made vnto the people. This not withstanding, all the Knights of Rome did in manner change their gownes with him for company, Theknights & of them there were commonly 20 thousand yong gentlement of noble house which followed of Rome of him with their haire about their cares, and were fuiters to the people for him. Furthermore, the Senate affembled to decree that the people should mourne in blacks, as in a common calamitie: for Citerous but the Confuls were against it. And Clodius on the other side was with a band of armed men a- fake. bout the Senate, fo that many of the Senatours ranne out of the Senate, crying and tearing their clothes for forrow. Howbeit, these men seeing all that, were nothing the more moued with pitie and shame, but either Cicero must needs absent himselfe, or else determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Gicero to intreat Pompey to aide him, but he absented himselfe of purpose out of the city, because he would not be intreated, and lay at one of his houses in the country, neare ynto the city of ALEA. So he first of all sent Piso his sonne in law vnto him to intreate him, and afterwards went himselfe in person to him. But Pompey being told that he was come, had not the pompey would not heart to suffer him to come to him, to look him in the face: for he had benepast all shame to have fee ciero refused the request of so worthy a man, who had before shewed him such pleasure, & also done being accesand faid fo many things in his fauour. Howbeit Pompey being the fonne in law to C.e.far, did vnfortunally (at his request) for sake him at his need, vnto whom he was bound for so many infinite pleafures, as he had received of him afore and therefore when he heard fay he came to him, he went out at his back-gate, and would not speake with him. So Cicero seeing himselfe betraied of him, and now having no other refugeto whom he might repaire vnto, he put himfelfe into the hands of the two Confuls. Of them two, Gabinius was ever cruell and churlish vnto him, but Pife on the other fide spake alwaies very courteously vnto him, and prayed him to absent himselfe for a time, and to give place a litle to Clodius furie, and patiently to bearethechange of the time. For in fo doing, he might come againe another time to be the preserver of his countrey, which was now for his fake in tumult and fedition. Cicero vpon this answer of the Confull, confulted with his friends; among the which Lucullus gaue him advice to tarie, and faid that he should be the stronger. But all the rest were of contrarie opinion, and would haue him to get him away with speed, for the people would shortly wish for him againe, when they had once bene beaten with Clodius furie and follie. Cicero liked best to follow this counsell. Whereupon having had a flatue of Minerua along time in his house, the which he greatly reverenced he carried her himselfe, and gaue her to the Capitoll, with this inscription: Vno Mi. nerua Protectour of Rome. So his friends having given him safe conduct, he went out of Rome Cherest about midnigh, and tooke his way through the countrey of LVKE by land, meaning to goe exite. into Sicile. When it was knowne in Rome that he was fled, Clodius did presently ba-

mish him by decree of the people, and caused billes of inhibition to be set vp, that no man should fecretly receive him within five hundred miles compasse of ITALIE. Howbeit, divers men reuerencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had vied him with all manner of courtesse possible, they did conduct him besides at his departure, saving one city on ly in Lyke, called at that time Hipponium, and now Vibone: where a Sicilian called Vibins (vnto whom Gicero before had done many pleafures, and specially among others, had made him Master of the workes in the yeare that he was Confull) would not once receive him into his house, but promised him he would appoint him a place in the countrey that he might go vnto. And Cains Virgilius alfo, at that time Prator and Gouernour of Sicile, who before had shewed himselfe his very great friend, wrote then vnto him, that he should not come neare vnto Sigile. This gricued him to the heart. Thereupon he went directly vnto the city of BRVN-DVSIVM, and there imbarked to passe ouer the sea vnto DYRRACHIVM, & at the first had wind at will, but when he was in the maine sea, the wind turned, and brought him backe againeto the place from whence he came. But after that, he hoiffed faile againe, and the report went, that at his arrivall at Dyreachivm when he tooke land, the earth shooke under him, and the sea gaue backetogether: whereby the Soothfayers interpreted, that his exile should not belong because both the one and the other was a token of change. Yet Cicero, notwithstanding that many men came to fee him for the good will they bare him, and that the cities of GRECE contended who should most honour him, he was alwaies sadde, and could not be merry, but cast his eyes still towards ITALY, as passionate louers do towards the women they loue: shewing himielfe faint hearted, and tooke this adversity more basely then was looked for of one so well studied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes prayed his friends, not to call him Oratour, but rather Philosopher: saying, that Philosophie was his chiefest profession, and that for his cloquence he did not vseit, but as a necessary instrument to one that pleadeth in the Commonwealth. But glory and opinion hath great power to take mans reason from him, cuen like acolour, from the minds of them that are common pleaders in matters of state, and to make them feele the felfe fame paffions that common people do, by daily frequenting their company: vnleffe they take great heed of them, and that they come to practife in the Commonwealth with this resolute mind, to haue to do with the like matters that the common people haue, but notto entangle themselues with the like passions and moodes, by the which their matters do rise. Now Clodins was not contented that he had banished Cicero out of ITALIE, but further, he burntall his houses in the country, and his house also in Rome standing in the market place, of the which he built a Temple of Liberty, and caused his goods to be fold by the Cryer: so that the Cryer was occupied all day long crying the goods to be fold, and no man offered to buy any of them. The chiefest men of the city beginning to bee affraid of these violent parts, and having the common people at his commandement, whom he had made very bold and infolent, he began to inueigh against Pompey, and spake ill of his doings in the time of his warres, the which every man else but himselse did commend. Pompey then was very angry with himselse that he had so forfaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friends procured all the meanes he could to call him home againe from his banishment. Clodius was against it all he could. The Senate notwithflanding with one full confent ordained, that nothing should be established for the Commonwealth, before Ciceroes banishment were first repealed. Lentulus was at that time Consull, and there grew such an vprore and stir vpon it, that some of the Tribunes were hurt in the market place, and Quintus Cicero (the brother of Cicero) was beaten down and hidden under the dead bodies. Then the people began to change their mindes. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the first man that durst venture vpon clodius, and bring him by force to be tryed before the Judges. Pompey himselfe also having gotten a great number of men about him, aswell of the city of Rome as of other townes adiovning to it, being strongly guarded with them, he came out of his house, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the market place, and then called the people to give their voices for the calling home againe of Cicero. It is reported that the people neuer passed thing with so great goodwill, nor so wholly together, as the returne of Gicero, And the Senate for their parts also, in the behalfe of Cicero, ordained, that the cities which had honoured and received Cicero in his exile, should be greatly commended : and that his houfes which clodius had ouerthrowne and razed, should be reedified at the charge of the commonwealth. So Gicero returned the fixteenth moneth after his banishment, and the townes and cities became by, shewed themselues so ioy full of his returne, that all manner of men went to meete and honour him, with fo great loue and affection, that Ciceroes report thereof afterwards came indeed short of the very truth as it was. For he said, that I TALIE brought him into Rome vpon their floulders. Infomuch as Graffus himfelfe, who before his banishment was his enemie, went then with very goodwill vnto him, and became his friend, faying: That he did it for the loue of his fonne, who loued Cicero with all his heart. Now Cicero being returned, he found a time when Clodius was out of the city, and went with a good company of his friends vnto the Capi- ciero tatoll, and there took away the tables, and brake them, in the which Clodius had written all his acts that he had passed & done in the time of his Tribuneship. Clodius would afterwards have accufed Cicero for it, But Cicero answered him, that he was not lawfully created Tribune, because out of the he was of the PATRICIANS, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribuncship was voide, Capitell. and of none effect. Therewith Cato was offended, and spake against him, not for that he liked of clodius doings, (buttothe contrarie, vtterly misliked all that he did) but because he thought it out of all reason, that the Senate should cancell all those things which he had done and passed inhis Tribuneship, and specially, because amongst the rest, that was there which he himselfe had done in the Isle of CYPRVs, and in the city of BYZANTIVM. Hereupon there grew some strangenesse betwixt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithstanding brake not out to open enmitic: but onely to an abstinence of their wonted familiarity, and accesse one to another. Shortly after, Milo flue Clodius, Milo being accused of murther, prayed Cicero to pleade his cause. The Senate gaine by fearing that this accusation of Mile, (who was a hardie man, and of quality besides) would Mile. mone fome fedition and vprore in the city, they gave commission to Pompey to see instice executed as well in this cause as in other offences, that the city might be quiet, and judgement also executed with fafetie. Thereupon Pompey the night before tooke the highest places of the market place, by his fouldiers that were armed, whom he placed thereabout. Mile fearing that Cicero would be affraid to fee fuch a number of harneffed men about him, being no vfuall matter. and that it might peraduenture hinder him to pleade his cause well, he prayed him he would come betimes in the morning in his Litter into the market place, and there to ftay the coming of the Iudges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearefull in warres, but timo- ciero rous also in pleading. For indeed he neuer beganne to speake, but it was in searc: and when his fearesfull its eloquence was come to the best proofe and perfection, he never lest his trembling and timo-timerous in rousnesse. Infomuch that pleading a case for Mutius Murana (accused by Cato) striuing to pleading. excell Hortenfing, whose pleading was very well thought of, he tooke no rest all night, and what through watching and the trouble of his mind, he was not very well, fo that he was not fo well liked for his pleading as Hortenfius. So, going to defend Miloes cause, when he came out of his delt Miloes Litter, and faw Pompey fet aloft as it had bene in a campe, and the market place compatied esfe. about with armed men, gliftering in every corner, it fo amated him, that he could feant fashion himselfe to speake; all the parts of him did so quake and tremble, and his voice could not come to him. But Milo on the other fide flood boldly by him himselfe, without any feare at all of theiudgement of his cause, neither did he let his haire grow, as other men accused did: neither did he weare any mourning gowne, the which was (as it feemed) one of the chiefest causes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timorousnesse of Cicero camerather of the good will he bare vnto his friends, then of any cowardly mind of himfelfe. He was also chofen one of the Priests of the Soothsayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of Public Cheero cho-Craffus the younger, who was flaine in the Realme of PARTHIA. Afterwards, the Province of Givens From Silicia being appointed to him, with an army of twelve thousand footmen, and two thouseful for the footment of landand fine hundred horsemen, he took the sea to go thither. So when he was arrived there, he Cilicia. brought CAPPADOCIA againe into the fubication and obedience of king Ariobar anes, according to his commission and commandement given by the Senate: moreover, both there and elswhere he tooke as excellent good order as could be deuifed, in reducing of things to quietneffe without wars. Furthermore, finding that the CILICIAN'S were growne fomewhat frout and vnruly, by the ouerthrow the Romaine's had of the Parthians, and by reason of the rising and rebellion in Syria, he brought them vnto reason by gentle perswasions: and neuer receiued gifts that were fent him, no not from Kings and Princes. Furthermore, he did disburden reginfor the Provinces of the feaftes and banquets they were wont to make other Gouernours before the gournhim. On the other fide also, he would cuer haue the company of good and learned men at his promines.

table and would vsethem well, without curiosity and excesse. He had never porter to his safe. nor was feene by any man in his bed; for he would alwaies rife at the breake of day, and would walke or stand before his doore. He would courteously receive all them that came to salute and visit him. Further they report of him, that he neuer caused man to be beaten with roddes, nor to teare his owne garments. In his anger he neuer reviled any man, neither did despitefully set fine vpon any mans head. Finding many things also belonging to the Commonwealth, which private men had stolne and imbezeled to their own vse, he restored again vnto the cities, where by they grew very rich and wealthie: and yet did faue their honourand credite that had taken them away, and did them no other hurt, but onely constrained them to restore that which was the Commonwealths. He made a little warre also, and draue away the theeues that kept about the mountaine Amanus, for the which exploit his fouldiers called him Imperator, to fay, chiefe Captain. About that time there was an orator called Cacilius, who wrote vnto him from Rome. to pray him to fend him fome Leopards or Panthers out of SILICIA, because he would shew the people some pastime with them. Cicero boasting of his doings, wrote to him again, that there were no more Leopards in SILICIA, but that they were all fled into CARIA for anger, that feeing all things quiet in Silicia, they had ley fure now to huntthem. So when he returned towards Rome, from the charge of his government, he came by Rhodes, & stayed a few dairs at ATHEN'S with great delight, to remember how pleasantly he lived there before, at what time he studied there. This her came to him the chiefest learned men of the city, and his friends also with whom he was acquainted at his first being there. In fine, having received all the honours ble intertainment in GRECE' that could be, he returned vnto ROME, where at his ariual he found great factions kindled, the which men faw plainly would grow in the end to civill war. Thereupon the Senate having decreed that he should enter in triumph into the city, he answered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cafars coach in triumph. So he trauelled very earneftly betweene Pompey and Cafar, eftfoones writing vnto Cafar, and also speaking vnto Pompey that was prefent, feeking all the meanes be could, to take vp the quarrell and misliking betwixt them two. But it was so impossible a matter, that there was no speech of agreement would take place. So Pompey hearing that Cafar was not farre from Rome, he durft no longer abide in Rome, but fled with divers of the greatest men in Rome. Cicero would not follow him whenhe fled, and therfore menthought he would take part with Cafar: but this is certaine, that he was in a maruellous perplexity, and could not eafily determine what way to take. Wherupon he wrote in his Epistles: What way should I take? Pompey hath the inster and honester cause of warre, but Cafar can better execute, and prouide for himselfe and his friends with better safetie: so that I haue meanes enough to flie, but none to whom I might repaire. In all this stirre, there was one of Cafars friends called Trebatius, which wrote a letter vnto Cicero, and told him that Cafar wished him in any case to come to him, and to run with him the hope & fortune he vndertooke: but if he excused himselfe by his age, that then he should get him into GRECE, and there to be quiet from them both. Cicero maruelling that Cafar wrote not to him himselfe, answered in anger, that he would do nothing vnworthy of his acts all the daies of his life thitherto: and to this effect he Wrote in his letters. Now Cafar being gon into Spain E, Cicero imbarked presently to go to Pompey. So when he came vnto him, euery man was very glad of his comming, but Cate. Howbeit Cato secretly reproued him for coming vnto Pompey, saying: that for himselfe he had bene without all honesty at that time to have forsaken that part the which he had alwaics taken and sollowed from the beginning of his first practise in the commonwealth; but for him, on the other fide, that it had bene better for the fafety of his country, & chiefly for all his friends, that he had bene a newterto both, and so to hauetaken things as they had fallen out: and that he had no maner of reason nor instant cause to make him to become Casars enemy, and by comming thither to put himselfinto so great perill. These perswasions of Cate ouerthrew all Ciceroes purpose and determination, besides that Pompey himselfe did notemploy him in any matter of service orimportance. But hereof himselse was more in fault then Pompey, because he confessed openly that it did repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he scorned and disdained all Pompeys preparations and counsels, the which indeed made him to be had in icalousie and suspition. Also he would euer be fleering and gibing at those that tooke Pompeys part, though he had no list himselfeto be merrie. He would also go vp and downe the campe very sad and heavie, but yet he would euer haue one least or other to make men laugh, although they had as little luft to be merie as he: and furely, it shall do no hurt to call some of them to mind in this place. Domitius being very defirous to preferre a Gentleman to haue charge of men, to recommend him, he faid, he was an honest, wife, and sober man, Whereto Ciecro presently answered: Why doest thou not keepe him then to bring up thy children. Another time when they commended Theophanes LESBIAN, (that was mafter of all the artificers of the campe) because he had notably comforted the Rhodians when they had received a great loffe of their nauie: Sec, faid Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to have a GRECIAN, mafter of artificers in the campe? When both battels came to ioyne together, and that c. fur had in manner all the aduantage, and kept them as good as befreged, Lentulus told him on a time, that he heard fay, all Cefars friends were mad, and melancholy men. Why quoth Ciceroto himagaine: docft thou fay that they do enuie Cefari Another called Martins, coming lately out of ITALY, faid, that there ran a rumour in Rome, that Pompey was besieged. What quoth Ciceroto him againe: and didst thou take ship to come and fee him thy selfe, because thou mightest beleeve it when thou hadst seene it? Pompey being ouerthrowne, one Nonius said, there was yet good hope left, because they had taken scuen Eagles within Pompeys campe. Thy persuasion were not ill, quoth Cicero, so we were to fight but with pies and dawes. Labienus reposed all his trust in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of necessity must haue the vpper hand. Yea faid Cicero, but for all this goodly stratageme of war, we have not long fince lost our whole campe. After the battell of Pharsalia, where Cicero was not by reason of his sicknesse: Pompey being sted, and Catoat that time at DYRRACHIVM, where he had gathered a Catogana great number of inen of war, and had also prepared a great nauie, he praied Cicero to take charge of all this armie, as it pertained vnto him, having bene Confull. Gieero did not onely refuse it, but also told them, he would meddle no more with this war. But this was inough to have made him bin flaine: for the yonger Pempey and his friends called him traitor, and drew their fwords upon himto kill him, which they had done, had not Cato stepped between them and him; and yet had radium. he much adoto faue him, & to conuey him fafely out of the camp. When Gicero came to Bayn-DVSIVE, he flayed there a certaine time for Cafars coming, who came but flowly, by reason of histroubles he had in Asia, as also in Agypt. Howbeit newes was brought at length that Cafar was arrived at TARENTVM, & that he came by land vnto BRVNDVSIVM: Cicero departed thence to go meete him, not mistrusting that Casar would not pardon him, but rather being assumed to come to his enemie being a conquerour, before fuch a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to do or speake any thing vnscemely to his calling: for G.efar seeing him comming towards him farre before the rest that came with him, he lighted from his horseand imbraced him, and walked a great way on foot with him, still talking with him only; and ener after he did him great honour, and made much of him. Infomuch as Gicero having written a booke in praise of Caio, Cesar on the other side wrote another, and praised the cloquence and life of Cicero, matching it with the life of Pericles, and Theramines. Ciceroes booke was intituled, Cato and Cofarsbooke called Anticato, as much to fay, against Cato. They fay further, that Quintus Ligarius being accused to haue bene in the field against Casar, Cicero tooke vpon him to defend his eause: and that Cefar said vnto his friends about him, Whathurt is it for vs to heare Cicero speak, whom we have not heard of long time? for otherwise Ligarius (in my opinion) standeth alreadie a condemned man, for I know him to be a valiant man, and mine enemie. But when Cicero had begun his Oration, he moued Cafar maruellously, he had so sweete a grace, and such force Gieres in his words, that it is reported Cofur changed colour often, and shewed plainely by his countenance, that there was a maruellous alteration in all the parts of him. For, in the end when the O. havit alter rator came to touch the battel of Pharsalia, then was Cafar fo troubled, that his body shooke withall, and besides, certaine bookes he had fell out of his hands, and he was driven against his will to fet Ligarius at liberty. Afterwards, when the common-wealth of Rome came to be a kingdome, Cicero leaning to practife any more in the state, he gaue himselfe to reade Philosophy tothe yong men that came to heare him: by whose accesse vnto him (because they were the chiefest of the nobility in Rome) he came againe to be are as great sway and authority in Rome Gierres as euer he had done before. His studie and endeuour was, to write matters of Philosophic His matters o dialogue wise, and to translate out of Greeke into Latine, taking paines to bring all the Greeke words, which are proper vnto Logicke and naturall causes, into Latine. For he was the first man by report, that gaue Latine names vnto these Greeke words, which are proper vnto Philosophers, as, entruola, he termed, Visio. Katuloisti, Assensus. Emogo, Assensus cobibitio. Katuloisti

CICERO. Comprehensio. To zaques, Corpus individuum. To appen, Corpus simplex. To zeros, Vacuum, and many other fuch like words. But though he were not the first, yet was it he that most did deuise and ye them, and turned some of them by translation, others into proper termes: so that at length they came to be well taken, knowne, and vnderstood of enery man. And for his readinesse in writing of verses, he would vie them many times for his recreation: for it is reported, that when source he took in hand to make any, he would dispatch 500 of them in a night. Now al that time of his recreation and pleasure, he would commonly be at some of his houses in the country, which he had neare vnto THV SCVLVM, fro whence he would write vnto his frieds, that he led Laertes life cither spoken merily as the maner was, or else pricked forward with ambitio, desiring to returne againe to be practifer in the commonwealth, being weary with the present time & state thereof, How societ it was, he came oftentimes to Rome, only to see Cofar to keepe him his friend; and would ever be the first man to confirme any honors decreed vnto him, & was alwaies studious to vtter some new matter to praise him & his doings. As that was he said touching the statues of Pempey, the which being ouerthrowne, Cafar commanded them to be fer vp againe, and so they were. For Cicero faid, that by that courtefie in setting vp of Pompeys statues againe, he did establish his owne. So Cicero being determined to write all the Romains history, and to mingle withit many of the GRECIANS doings, adding therunto all the fables and deuices which they do write & report, he was hindred of his purpose against his will, by many open & private troubles that came vpon him at once: whereof not with standing he himself was cause of the most of them. For first of all, he did put away his wife Terentia, because she had made but small account of himin all the warres: so that he departed from Rome having no necessary thing with him to entertaine him out of his country; and yet when he came backe againe into ITALY, the neuer flewed any fparke of loue or goodwill towards him. For the neuer came to BRV NDV SIV M to him, where he remained a long time; and worse then that, his daughter having the heart to take so long a iorney in hand to go to him, the neither gaue her copany to conduct her, nor mony, nor other furniture convenient for her; but so handled the matter, that Cicero at his returne to Rome found bare wals in his house and nothing init, & yet greatly brought in debt besides. And these were the honesteft causes alledged for their diuorse. But besides that Terentia denied all these, Greero himselse gaue her a good occasion to cleare her self, because he shortly after maried a yong maide, being ried a jong fallen in fancie with her (as Terentia faid) for her beauty : or, as Tyro his servant wrote, for her riches, to the end that with her goods he might pay his debts. For the was very rich, and Cicero also was appointed her gardian, she being left sole heire. Now, because he ought a maruellous summe of mony, his parents and friends did counsell him to mary this yong maiden, notwithstanding he was too old for her, because that with her goods he might satisfie his creditors. But Antonius speaking of this mariage of Cicero, in his answers & Orations he made against y PHILIPPIANS, he doth reproue him for that he put away his wife, with whom he was growne old; being merry with him by the way, for that he had benean idle man, and neuer went from the imoke of his chimney, nor had bene abroad in the wars in any feruice of his countrey or common-wealth. Shortly after that he had maried his fecond wife, his daughter died in labour of child, in Lentulus house, whose second wife she was, being before maried vnto Piso, who was her first husband. So the Philosophers and learned men came of all sides to comfort him: but he took her death so forowfully, that he put away his second wise, because he thought she did reioyce at the death of his daughter. And thus much touching the state etroubles of his house. Now touching the cofpiracie against Cafar, he was not made priny to it, although he was one of Brutun greatest frieds, and that it grieued him to fee things in that state they were brought vnto, & albeit also he wished for the times past, as much as any other man did. But indeed the conspirators were afraid of his nature, that lacked hardinesse: and of his age, the which oftentimes maketh the stoutest & most hardicst natures faint hearted and cowardly. Notwithstanding, the conspiracie being executed by Brutus and Casius, Casars friends being gathered together, every man was affraid that the city would againe fall into civill wars. And Antonius also, who was Consult at that time, did affemble the Senate, and made some speech and motion then to draw things againe vnto quietnesse. But Cicero having vsed diners perswasions sit for the time, in the end he moued the Senate to decree (following the exaple of the Athenians) ageneral oblinio of things done against Cafar, & to affigne vnto Brutus and Cassius some governments of provinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded: for the people of themselues were sorie, when they saw Cafars body brought through the

And when Antonius also did shew them his gowne all bebloudied, cut, and thrust through with fivords, then they were like mad men for anger, and fought vp and downe the market place if they could meete with any of them that had flaine him: and taking firebrands in their hands, they ranne to their houses to set them on fire. But the conspirators having preuented this danger, faued themselves; and fearing that if they taried at Rome, they should have many fuch alarmes, they for sooke the city. Then Antonius began to looke aloft, and became fearefull to all men, as though he meant to make himselfe King: but yet most of all vnto Cicero aboue all others. For Antonius perceiuing that Cicero began againe to increase in credit and authority, and Prinate knowing that he was Brutus very friend, he did mislike to see him come neare him; and besides gruige between was at that time some real substitute have the state of the second seed of the seed of th there was at that time some icalousie betwixt them, for the diner sity and difference of their maners and dispositions. Cicero being afraid of this, was first of all in mind to go with Dolabellato his pronince of Syria, as one of his Lieutenants. But they that were appointed to be Confuls the next yeare following after Antonius, two noble Citizens, and Ciceroes great friends, Hirfius and Panfa, they intreated him not to for fake them, vndertaking that they would plucke downe this ouer-great power of Antonius, so he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleeuing nor altogether mistrusting them, for sooke Dolabella, and promised Hircius and Pansa, that he would spend the sommer at ATHENS, & that he would return eagaine to Rome so soone as they were entred into their Confulfhip. With this determination Gierro tooke the sea alone, to go in- Gierro faito GRECE. But as it chanceth oftentimes, there was fome let that kept him he could not faile, & let into newes came to him daily from Rome, (as the manner is,) that Antonius was wonderfully changed, and that now he did nothing any more without the authority and confent of the Senate, and that there lacked nothing buthis person to make all things well. Then Cicerocondemning his dastardly feare, returned forthwith to Rome, not being deceived in his first hope. For there came such a number of people out to meete him, that he could do nothing all day long buttake them by the hands, and imbrace them, who to honour him, came to meete him at the gate of the city, as also by the way to bring him to his house. The next morning Antonius assembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name, Cicero refused to go, and kept his bed, faining that he was wearie with his journy and paines he had taken the day before:but indeed the cause why he went not, was, for feare and suspition of an ambush that was laid for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his very good friends. Antonius was maruelloufly offended that they did wrongfully accuse him, for laying any ambush for him: and therfore sent souldiers to his house, & commanded them to bring him by force, or else to set his house on fire. Af- mwin beterthat time, Giaro and he were alwaies at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heed twins Giaro of another: vntill that young Cafar returning from the city of Apollonia, came as law- rand Anfull heire vnto Inlius Cafar Dictator, and had contention with Antonius for the summe of two thousand and five hundred Myriades, the which Amonius kept in his hands of his fathers goods. Thereupon Philip who had maried the mother of this young Cafar, and Marcellus who had alfo maried his fifter, went with yong Cafar vnto Cicero, and there agreed together, that Cicero should helpe yong Cafar with the fauour of his authority and eloquence, as well towards the cafaring-Senate, as also to the people: and that Cafar in recompence of his goodwill should stand by Cicero, with his money and fouldiers: for this yong Cafar had many of his fathers fouldiers about him, that had ferued vnder him. Now there was another cause that made Cicero glad to imbrace the friendship of this yong Casar, and that was this. Whilest Pompey and Iulius Casar were aliue and in good case, Cicero dreamed one night that the Senators sons were called into the Capitoll, Ciceroes because Inpiter had appointed to shew them him that one day should come to be Lord and King offaults of Rome, and that the Romaines being desirous to see who it should be, ran all vnto the temple: and that all the children likewise were waiting there in their goodly garded gownes of purple, vntil that fodainly the dores of the temple were open; and then that althe children arose one after another, and went and passed by the image of supiter, who looked vpon them all, and sent them away discontented, sauing this yong C.ejar, vnto whom he put forth his hand as he passed by, and faid: My Lords of Rome, this child is he that shall end al your civill wars, when he commeth to be Lord of Rome. Some fay, that Cicero had this vision in his dreame, and that he caried in good memory the looke of this child, how beit that he knew him not: and that the next morning he went of purpose into the field of Mars, where these young boyes did exercise themfelues, who, when he came thither, had broken vp from playing, and were going home; and that among st them he first saw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him very well, and misfing at him the more, asked him whose fon he was. The boy answered, that he was y fon of one Octavius (a man otherwise of no great calling) and of Accia, the fifter of Inline Cafar: who having no child, he made him his heire by his last will and testament, and lest him al his lands & goods. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was very glad to speake to him when he met with him and that the boy also liked Ciceroes friendship, and making of him: for by good hap the boy was borne the same yeare that Cicero was Consull. And these be the reasons alledged, why Cicero did fauour this yong Cafar. But in truth, first of all the great malice he bare vnto Antonius, & second. ly his nature that was ambitious of honour, were (in my opinion) the chiefest causes why hebecame yong Casars friend: knowing that the force and power of his fouldiers would greatly ftrengthen his aurhority and countenance in managing the affaires of the state; besides that the yong man could flatter him to well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epiftles he wrote vnto Atticus, he sharply reproueth Cicero, faying, that for feare of Antonius he flattered this yong Cafar: whereby it appeared, he did not fo much feeke for the liberty of Rome, as he did procure himselfe a louing and gentle master. This notwithstanding Brutus brought with him Ciceroes fon that studied Philosophy at ATHENS, and gaue him charge of men vnder him, and employed him in great affaires, wherein he shewed himselfe very forward and valiant. Now Ciceroes authority & power grew againe to be as great in Rome, as euer it was before. For he did what he thought good, and so vexed Antonius, that he draue him out of the city, and fent the two Confuls Hirrius and Panfa against him, to fight with him: and caufed the Senare also to decree, that young C.esar should have sergeants to carie rods & axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prætor, as a man that fighteth for his country. After that Antomius had lost the battell, and that both the Consuls were flaine, both the armies came vnto Cafar. The Senate then being afraid of this yong man that had so great good fortune, they practifed by honours and gifts to call the armies from him, which he had about him, and fo to minish the greatnesse of his power: saying, that their country now stood in no neede of force nor feare of defence, fith her enemy Antonius was fled and gone. Cafar fearing this, fent men fecretly vnto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be chosen Consuls; and that when they should be in office, he should do and appoint what he thought good, having the yong man at his commandement, who defired no more but the honour only of the name. Cafar himfelfe confesfed afterwards, that being afraid he should have bene vtterly cast away, to have bene left alone, he finely ferued his turne by Ciceroes ambition, having perswaded him to require the Consulship through the helpe and affistance that he would give him. But there was cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a yong man, when he was corented to fue for the Confulship in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreeable to it: wherfore his friends prefently reproued him for it, and shortly after he perceived he had vidone himfelfe, and together also lost the liberty of his country. For this young man Octavius Cafar being growne to be very great by his meanes and procurement, when he faw that he had the Confulship vpon him, he forsooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then ioyning his army with theirs, he deuided the Empire of Rome with them, as if it had bene lands left in common betweene them: and besides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and vpwards, whom they had appointed to be flaine. But the greatest difficulty and difference that fell out betweene them, was about the outlawing of Cicero. For Antonius would hearken to no peace betweene them, vileffe Cicero were flaine first of all: Lepidus was also in the same mind with Antonius: but Casar was against them both. Their meeting was by the city of Bolonia, where they continued three daies together, they three onely fecretly confulting in a place enuironed about with a little river. Some fay that Cafar stucke hard with Cicero the two first daies, but at the third, that he yeelded and for sooke him. The exchange they agreed vpon betweene them, was this. Cafar for sooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus: and Antonius Lucius Cafar his vncle by the mothers fide. Such placetooke wrath in them, as they regarded no kindred nor bloud and to speake more properly, they shewed that no brute or sauage beast is so cruell as man, if with his licenciousnesse he have liberty to execute his will. While these matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a house of his in the country, by the city of Thus culum, having at home with him also his brother Q.Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of these proscriptions or outlawries, appointing men to be slaine, they determined to goe to Astyra, a place by the fea fide where Cieero had another house, there to take

fea, and from thence to go into Macedon vnto Brutus. For there ran a rumour that Erutus was very strong, and had a great power. So they caused themselves to be conveyed thither in two Litters, both of them being fo weake with forow and griefe, that they could not otherwise haue gonetheir waies. As they were on their way, both the Litters going as neare to each other as they could, they bewailed their miserable estate: but Quintus chiefly, who took it most grieuously. For remembring that he tooke no money with him when he came from his house, and that Gicero his brother also had very little for himselfe, he thought it best that Gicero should hold on his journey, whileft he himfelfe made an errand home to fetch fuch things as he lacked, and fo to make hastagaine to ouertake his brother. They both thought it best so, and then tenderly embracing one another, the teares falling from their eyes, they tooke leaue of each other. Within few daies after, Quintus Cicero being betrayed by his owne feruants, vnto them that made fearch for him, he was cruelly flaine, and his fonne with him. But Marcus Tullius Cicero being flaine. called vnto Astyra, and there finding a ship ready, imbarked immediatly, and sailed along the coast vnto Mount Circe, having a good gale of wind. There the Mariners determining forthwith to make faile againe, he came a shoare, either for feare of y sea, or for that he had some hope that Cafar had not altogether for faken him: and therewithall returning towards Rome by land, he had gone about an hundred furlongs thence. But then being at a straight how to resolue, and fodainly changing his mind, he would needs be caried backe againe to the fea, where he continucd all night maruellous forowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in mind to go fecretly vnto Octavius Cafars house, and to kill himselfe by the hearth of his chimney, to make the furies of hell to reuenge his bloud: but being afraid to be intercepted by the way, and cruelly handled, he turned from that determination. Then falling into other vnaduised determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put himfelfe againe into his feruants hands, to be conceved by sea unto another place called * CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleasant somer house, * some do where the North winds, called Etchia, do giue a trimme fresh aire in the sommer scason. In that reade Caiplace also there is a little temple dedicated vnto Apollo, not farre from the sea side. From thence therecame a great shole of crowes, making a maruellous noise, that came slying towards Ciceroes ship, which rowed upon the shore. This shole of crowes came and lighted upon the yard of Awondrone their faile, iome crying, and fome pecking the cords with their billes: fo that every man judged foreshaved ftraight, that this was a figne of ill lucke at hand. Cicero not with standing this, came a shore, and by crower went into his house, and laied him downe to fee if he could fleepe. But the most part of these crowes came and lighted vpon the chamber window where he lay, making a wonderfull great noise: and some of them got vnto Ciceroes bed where he lay, the clothes being cast ouer his head. and they neuer left him, till by litle and litle they had with their billes pluckt off the clothes that couered his face. His men feeing that, and faying to themselves that they were too vile beastes. if they would tary to fee their mafter flaine before their eyes, (confidering that bruite beafts had careto faue his life, feeing him fo vn worthily intreated) and that they should not do the best they could to fauc his life: partly by intreaty, and partly by force, they put him againe into his Litter to cary him to the sea. But in the meane time came the murderers appointed to kill him. So Ciceroes gate being flut, they kill M.T. entred the house by force, and missing him, they asked them of the house what was become of him. They answered they could not tell. Howbeit, there was a yong boy in the house called Philologus, a flaue infranchised by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought vp in the Latine tongue, and had taught him the liberall sciences: he told this Herennius that his servants carried him in a Litter towards the sea, through dark narrow lanes, shadowed with wood on either side. Popilius the Colonell taking fome foldiers with him, ranne about on the outfide of the lanes to take him at his coming out of them; and Herennius on the other fide entred the lanes. Cicero hea- M.T cicero ring him coming, commanded his men to fet downe his Litter, and taking his beard in his left fiane by hand, as his manner was, he frontly looked the murtherers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face leane and wrinckled, for the extreme forrowes he had taken: diuerfe of them that were by held their hands before their eyes, whilest Herennius did cruelly murther him. So Cicero being threescore and foure yeares of age, thrust his necke out of the Litter, and had his head cut off by Antonius commandement, and his hands also, which wrote the Ora-Ffffa

tions (called the Philippians) against him. For so did Cicero call the Orations he wrote against him, for the malice he bare him and they do yet continue the same name untill this present time. When these poore dismembred members were brought to Rome, Antonius by chance was bufily occupied at that time about the election of certaine Officers: who when he heard of them and faw them, he cryed out aloud, that now all his outlawries and proferiptions were executed. and thereupon commanded his head and his hands flould straight be set vp ouer the pulpit for Orations, in the place called Rostra. This was a fearefull & horrible fight vnto the Romaines. who thought they faw not Ciceroes face, but an image of Antonius life and disposition: whoamong so many wicked deedes as he committed, yet he did one act onely that had some shewof goodnesse, which was this. He deliuered Philologus into the hands of Pomponia, the wife of Quintus Cicero: and when she had him, besides other cruell torments she made him abide, she compelled him to cut his owne flesh off by litle morsels, and to broile them, and then to cate them. Some Historiographers do thus report it: but Tyro who was a flaue infranchised by Gicero, made no mention of the treason of this Philologus. Howbeit I understand that Cafar Auguflus long time after that, went one day to secone of his Nephewes, who had a booke in his hand of Ciceroes: and he fearing left his vncle would be angry to find that booke in his hands, thought to hide it vnder his gowne. Cafar faw it, and tooke it from him, and read the most part of it standing, and then deliuered it to the young boy, and faid vnto him: He was a wife man indeed, my child, and loued his country well. After he had flaine Antonius, being Confull, he made Ciceroes fonne his colleague and fellow Confull with him, in whose time the Senate ordained that the images of Artonius should be throwne downe, and deprined his memoric of all other honours: adding further vnto this decree, that from thenceforth none of the house and familie of the Antonij should cuerafter beare the name of Marcus. So Gods instice made the extreme reuenge and punishment of Antonius to fall into the house of Cicero.

His is as much as we could gather by our knowledge touching the notable actes and deedes worthic of memorie, written of Cicero and Demosthenes. Furthermore, leaving the comparison aside of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations, me thinkes I may fay thus much of them: That Demosthenes did wholly employ all his wir and learning(naturall or artificiall) vnto the Art of Rhetoricke; and that in force and vertue of eloquence he did excell all the Oratours in his time: and for grauitic and magnificent style, all those also that onely write for shew or oftentation; and for sharpenesse and art, all the Sophisters, and masters of Rhetoricke. And that Cicero was a man generally learned in all sciences, and that had fludied diverse books, as appeareth plainely by the sundry books of Philosophy of his owne making, written after the manner of the Academicke Philosophers. Furthermore, they may fee in his Orations he wrote in certaine causes to serue him when he pleaded, that he sought Gierosi may fee in his Orations ne wrote in certaine cames to ferue infin when he pleaded, the rought occasions in his by-talke to shew men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by diverse dotheir phrases a man may discerne some sparke of their maners and conditions. For Demostheres chines. phrase hath no maner of finenesse, iests, nor grace in it, but is alrogether graue and harsh, and not orly finelleth of the lampe, as Pythias faid when he mocked him, but sheweth a great drinker of error manwater, extreme paines, and there with also a sharpe and sowre nature. But Cicero oftentimes fell ners. from pleafant taunts vnto plaine fcurrility, and turning all his pleadings of matters of importance to sport and laughter, having a grace in it, many times he did forget the comelinesse that became a man of his calling. As in his Oration for Calius, where he faith, It is no maruell if in fo greatabundance of wealth and finenesse he giue himselfe a litle to take his pleasure; and that it was a folly not to vse pleasures lawfull and tolerable, sith the samouscst Philosophers that ener were, did place the chiefe felicity of man, to be in pleasure. And it is reported also that Marcus Cato having accused Murana, Cicero being Conful, defended his cause, and in his Oration pleafantly girded all the feet of the Stoick Philosophers for Catoes fake, for the strange opinions they held, which they call Paradoxes: in fo much as he made all the people and Iudges also fall on Jaughing a good. And Cato himselfe also smiling a litle, said vnto them that sate by him: What alaughing and mocking Confull have we, my Lords: But letting that passe, it seemeth that Cicerowas of a pleasant and merry nature: for his face shewed euer great life and mirth in it. Whereas in Demostheres countenance on the other fide, they might differne a maruellous diligence and care, and a penfiue man, neuer weary with paine: infomuch that his enemies (as he reporteth himleste called him a peruerse & froward man. Furthermore, in their writings is discerned, that the one speaketh modestly in his own praise, so as no man can justly be offended with him: and yet not alwaies, but when necessity enforceth him for some matter of great importance, but otherwise very discreet and modest to speake of himselfe. Cicero in contrary maner, vsing too often repetition of one selfe thing in all his Orations, shewed an extreme ambition of glory, when taston. inceffantly he cried out:

Let speare and shield give place to gowne, And give the tongue the lawrell crowne.

Yetfurthermore, he did not only praise his own acts and deeds, but the Orations also which he had written or pleaded, as if he should have contended against I forates, or Anaximenes a master that taught Rhetoricke, and not to go about to reforme the people of Rom :

Which were both fierce and fout in armes, And fit to worke their enemies harmes.

For, as it is requifite for the gouernor of a common wealth to feeke authority by his eloquence: fo, to couet the praise of his owne glorious tongue, or as it were to begge it, that sheweth a base mind. And therefore in this point we must confesse that Demosthenes is farre grauer, and of a nobler mind, who declared himself, that al his eloquence came only but by practife, the which also required the fauor of his auditory: and further, he thought them fooles and mad men (as indeed they beno lesse) that therefore would make any boast of themselues. In this they were both alike, that both of them had great credit & authority in their Orations to the people, and for obtaining that they would propound infomuch as Captains, & they that had armes in their hands, their orastood in need of their cloquence. As Chares, Diopithes, and Leosthenes, they all were holpen of De-tions in the mosthenes: and Pompey, and Octavius Cefar the yong man, of Gicero: as Cefar himselfe confesseth in common his Commentaries he wrote vnto Agrippa and Macenas, But nothing sheweth a mans nature and condition more (asit is reported, & fo is it true) then when one is in authority for that bewraieth Authority his humor, and the affections of his mind, and layeth open also all the secret vices in him. De- showeth moss could neuer deliuer any such proofe of himselfe, because he neuer bare any office, nor tues and was called forward: for he was not Generall of the army which he himself had prepared against view. king Philip. Cicero on the other fide being sent Treasurer into Sicil E and Proconsull into Ci-LICIA and CAPPADOCIA, in such a time as couctonshelle reigned most, (in so much that the from money Captaines and governours whom they fent to governe their provinces, thinking it villanie and dastardlines to rob, did violently take things by force, at what time also to take bribes was reckoned no shame, but to handle it discreetly, he was the better thought of, and beloued for it:) Ffff4 he shewed plainly that he regarded not mony, and gaue forth many proofes of his courtesteand goodnesse. Furthermore, Cicero being created Consull by name, but Dictator in deed, having absolute power and authority ouer all things to suppresse the rebellion and conspiracie of Cast. line, he proued Platoes prophecy true, which was: That cities are fafe from danger, when the chiefe Magistrates and Gouernors (by some good divine fortune) do gouerne with wisdome & inflice. Demosthenes was reproued for his corruption, and selling of his eloquence: because se cretly he wrote one Oration for Phormio, & another in the felfe fame matter for Apollodorus, they being both aduerfaries. Further, he was defamed also for receiving mony of y king of Persia, and therewithall condemned for the mony which he had taken of Harpalus. And though some peraduenture would obiect, that the reports thereof (which are many) do lie: yet they cannot possibly denie this, that Demosthenes had no power to refraine fro looking on the presents which dinerse kings did offer him, praying him to accept them in good part for their sakes: neither was that the part of a man, that did take vfury by trafficke on the fea, the extremest yet of al other. In contrary maner (as we haue said before) it is certaine that Cicero being Treasurer, refused the gifts which the Sicilians offered him there; and the presents also which the king of the Cap. PADOCIANS offered him whilest he was Proconfullin Calicia, and those especially which his friends pressed vpon him to take of them, being a great summe of mony, when he went as a bani. fhed man out of Rome. Furthermore, the banishment of the one was infamous to him, because by judgement he was banished as a theefe. The banishment of the other was for as honourable an act as euer he did, being banished for ridding his countrey of wicked men. And therefore of Demosthenes, there was no speech after he was gone : but for Cicero, all the Senate changed their apparell into blacke, and determined that they would passeno decree by their authority, before Ciceroes banishment was renoked by the people. Indeed Cicero idly passed his time of banishmer. and did nothing all the while he was in Macedon: and one of the chiefest acts that Demostheres did, in all the time that he dealt in the affaires of the common wealth, was in his banishment, For he went into enery city, and did affift the Ambassador of the GRECIANS, and refused the Ambassadors of the Macedonians. In the which he shewed himself a better citizen, then either Themisiocles, or Alcibiades, in their like fortune and exile. So when he was called home, and returned, he fell against o his old trade which he practifed before, and was ever against Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS. Where Lalius in open Senate sharpely tooke vp Cicero, for that he fate still and said nothing, when that Octavius Cafar the yong man made perition against the law, that he might sue for the Consulship, being so young, that he had neuer a haire on his face. And Brutus himselfe also doth greatly reproue Cicero in his letters, for that he had maintained and nourished a more gricuous and greater tyrannie, then that which they had put downe. And last of all, methinketh the death of Cicero most pirifull, to see an old man caried up and downe(with tender loue of his fernants) feeking all the waies that might be to flie death, which did not long preuent his naturall course: and in the end, old as he was, to see his head so pitifully cut off. Whereas Demosthenes, though he yeelded a little, intreating him that came to take him: yet for that he had prepared the poyfon long before, that he had kept it long, and also vfed it as he did, he cannot but be maruellously commended for it. For fith the god Neptune denied him the benefit of his fanctuary, he betooke him to a greater, and that was death: whereby he faued himselfe out of the foldiers hands of the tyrant, and also scorned the bloudie cruelty of Antipater.

Demetrius.

HO first likened arts to our senses, seemeth to have respected especially How senses that one property of them both, in receiving objects of contrary quality: for, in the vie and end of their operation, there is great difference. differ. The fenses receive indifferently, without discretion and judgement, white and black, sweet and sowre, soft and hard: for their office is only to admit their seuerall obiects, and to carie and referre the judgement thereof to the common sense. But arts being the perfection of reason, receive and allow those things only which make for their operation, regarding and eschuing the contraries. The one chiefly, and for vie: the other by the way, and with intent to avoide them. So Philick dealeth with difeases, Musick with discords, to the end to remoue them, and work their contraries. And the great Ladies of al other arts, temperance, inflice, and wisdom, do not only consider honesty, vprightnes, and profit but examine withal, the nature & effects of leudnes, corruption and damage. And innocency, which vaunteth her want of experience in vidue practifes, men call fimplicity, and ignorance of things that be necessary and good to be knowne. And therfore the ancient LACED ÆMONIANS in their folemne feasts forced their ILOTEs the bondmen, to ouercharge themselues with wine; and such to make they shewed them vnto their youth, by their apparent beastlinesse of drunken men, to worke in their stances them an abhorring of so lothsome vice. Wherin although I cannot much praise them for humanity or wisdome, that corrupt and spoile one man, by example of him, to correct and reclaime another: yet (as I hope) it shall not be reprehended in me, if amongst the rest I put in one or two paire of such, as living in great place and account, have increased their same with infamy. Which in truth, I do not, to please and draw on the Reader with variety of report, but as Ismenias the THEBAN Musician shewed his scholers, both those that strake a cleane stroke, with, Do so: & such The canse of as bungled it, with Do not so; and Antigenidas thought men should like better, and with greater describing desirecontend for skill, if they heard and discerned vntunable notes: so thinke I, we shall be the the lines of forwarder in reading and following the good, if we know the lines, and fee the deformity of the wicked. wicked. This treaty cotaineth the lives of Demetrius, furnamed the Fort-gainer, & M. Anthony the Plate of Triumuir, & great examples to confirme the faying of Plato: That from great minds both great vertues and great vices do proceed. They were both given over to women & wine, both valiant vertues and great vices do proceed. and liberall, both sumptuous and high minded: fortune served them both alike, not onely in the course of their lines, in attempting great matters, somtimes with good, somtime with il successe, ingetting and lofing things of great consequence, overthrowing both when they feared not refloring both when they hoped not: but also in their end there was no great difference, the one

brought to his death by his mortall enemies, and the others fortune not fo much valike. But now to our history. Antigonus had two sonnes by his wife Stratonice, the daughter of Corraus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip after his fathers name, Thus far the most writers do agree: howbeit some hold opinion, that Demetrius was not the sonne of Antigonus, but his nephew. But because his father died leaving him achild, and that his mother was straight maried againe vnto Antigonus, thereupon came the report that he was Antigonus sonne. Howfocuer it was, Philip, that was not much yonger then Demetrius, died. Now for Demetrius, though he was a very biggeman, he was nothing so high as his father, but yet so passing and wonderfull faire, that no painter could possibly draw his picture & counterfeit to his likenesse. For they saw a sweet countenance, mixed with a kind of granity in his face, a feare with courtesse, and an incomparable princely maiefty accompanied with a liuely spirit and youth; and his wit and man. ners were such, that they were both fearefull, and pleasant vnto men that frequented him. For as he was most pleasant in company having leisure, & most given to banquetting, pleasant life, and more wantonly given to follow lust and pleasure, then any king that ever was: so was healwaies very carefull and diligent in dispatching matters of importance. And therfore he maruelloufly commended, and also endeuoured to follow Dionysius (as much to fay, as Bacchus) aboue all the other gods, as he that had bene a wife and valiant Captaine in war, and that in peace inuented and vsed all the pleasure that might be. He maruellously loued & reuerenced his father, and it scemeth that the dutifulnesse he shewed vnto his mother, was more to discharge the due obedience and duty of a son, then otherwise to entertaine his father, for feare of his power, or hope to be his heire. And for proofe hereof we reade, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went vnto his father Antigonus, giving audience to certaine Ambassadors; and after he had done his duty to him, and kiffed him, he fate downe by him cuen as he came from hunting, hauing his darts in his hand, which he caried out a hunting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambaffadors aloud as they went their way, having received their answer: My Lords, said he, you shall carie home this report of my sonne and me, be witnesses I pray you, how we line one with another. As meaning to shew therby that the agreement betwixt the father and the sonne together, is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest proofe of his greatnesses is a great safety to the affaires of a king, as a great safe is a king to haue a companion, befides the hate and mistrust it should breed. So that the greatest Prince and most ancientest of all the successiours of Alexander, boasted, that he stood not in search of his sonne, but did suffer him to sit by him, having a dart in his band. So was this house onely of all other the MACEDONIAN kings, least defiled with such villany, many successions after; and to confesse a troth, in all Antigonus race there was not one but Philip onely, that slue his owne fonne. But we have many examples of diverse other houses of kings, that have put their sonnes, wines, and mothers to death: and for their brethren, it was an ordinary thing with them to kil them, and neuer sticke at it. For like as Geometricians would have men grant them certaine propositions which they suppose, without proofe: eucn so was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the fafety of their estate. But further, to shew you more plainly that Demetrius was of a noble and courteous nature, and that he dearely loued his friends, we may alledge this example. Mithridates the sonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar friend and companion (for they were both in manner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonus court, and neuer practifed any villany or treason to him, neither was he thought such a man; yet Antigonus did somewhat suspect him, because of a dreame he had. He thought that being in a goodly great field, he fowed of the ferapings of gold, and that of that feede, first of all came up goodly wheate which had eares of gold: howbeit that shortly after returning that way againe, he found nothing but the straw, and the cares of the wheate cut off, and that he being very angry and sory for it, some told him, that Mithridates had cut offthese golden eares, and had caried themwith him into the Realine of Pont. Antigonus being maruelloufly troubled with this dreame, after he had made his sonne sweare vnto him that he would make no man aliue privie to that he would tell him, he told him all his dreame what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this yong man Mithridates to death. Demetrius was maruellous forie for it, and therfore the next morning, this yong noble Prince going as he was wont, to passe the time away with Mithridates, he durst not by word of mouth vtter that he knew, because of his oath: howbeit, taking him aside from his other familiars when they were both together by themselues, he wrote on the ground with the end of his dart, Mithridates looking on him: Flic Mithridates. Mithridates

Mithridates found fraight what he meant, and fled thevery fame night into CAPPADOCIA: Demetrius and shortly after it was his destinie to fulfill Antigonus dreame. For he conquered many goodly thridates countries, and it was he onely that established the house of the kingdome of Pont, the which the ROMAINES afterwards ouerthrew, about the eight fuccession. By these examples we may easily conjecture the good nature and curtefic of Demetrius. For like as the elements (according to Emnedocles opinion) are ener at trife together, but specially those that are nearest each to other: emenfo, though all the fucceffors of Alexander were at continuall warres together, yet was it foonestkindled, and most cruel betweene them which bordered nearest vnto each other, & that by discord being neare neighbors had alwaies occasion of brawle together, as fel out at that time betweene Antigonus and Ptolomie. This Antigonus lay most commonly in the countrie of Phrygia: who having intelligence that Ptolomie was gone into Cyprvs, and that he ouerranne all Syria, winning by force, or faire meanes, all the townes and cities subject vnto him, he sent his sonne Demetrius thither, being at that time but two and twenty years of age; and it was the first time that euer he took charge, as generall to his father, in matters of great importance. But he being a yong man, and that had no skill of warres, fighting a battel with an old fouldier (trained vp in the difeipline of warres vnder Alexander the great, & that through him, and in his name, had fought many greatbattels) was soone ouerthrowne, and his army put to flight, by the city of GAZA. At which ouerthrow were flaine flue thousand men, and almost eight thousand taken; and besides, Demetrius lost his tents and pauilions, his gold and filuer, and to be short, all his whole cariage. But Prolomy fent him all his things againe, and his friends also that were taken after the battell, Demetries with great courteous words: that he would not fight with them for all things together, but only outsthown for honor and Empire, Demetrius receiving them at his hands, befought the gods that he might in batted by Pelalam not long live a debter vnto Ptolomie for this great courtefie, but that he might quickly require it The bear with the like againe. Now Demetrius tooke not this overthrow like a yong man, thoughit was tifulnes of his first souldier-fare: but like an old & wise Captaine that had abidden many overthrowes, he enqueror, vied great diligence to gather men againe, to make new armors, & to keepe the cities and countries in his hands vnder obedience, and did traine and exercise his souldiers in armes, whom he had gathered together. Antigonus having newes of the overthrow of his fon Demetrius, faid no more, but that Ptolomic had ouercome beardlesse men: and that afterwards he should fight with bearded men. But now, because he would not discourage his sonnealtogether, who craued leave once againe to fight a battell with Ptolomie, he granted him. So, shortly after came Cilles Ptolomies Generall, with a great puissant army, to drive him altogether out of Syria: for they made no great account of Demetrius, because he had bene once ouerthrowne before, Howbeit Demetrius ftole vpon him, gaue him charge on the fodaine, and made him fo afraid, that he tooke both the Demetring campeand the Generall, with scuenthousand prisoners besides, and wanne a maruellous treafure of money: which made him a glad man, not so much for the gaine he should have by it, as for the oportunity he had thereby to come out of Ptolomies debt; nothing regarding the treasure nor the honour he had gotten by this victory, but onely the benefit of his requitall of Prolomies courtefie towards him. But yet he did nothing of his own head, before he had written to his father; and then receiving full grant and commission from him to dispose of all things as he thought good, he fent backe Cilles vnto Ptolomie, and all his other friends besides, with great and rich gifts which he bountifully bestowed on them. This misfortune and ouerthrow did vt- Demotring terly put Ptolomie out of all Syria, and brought Antigonus also from the city of CELENES, for thankfulnes the exceeding joy he had of this victory, as also for the great desire he had to see his son. After lomic. that, he fent Demetrius into ARABIA, against a people called y NABATH ÆNIANS, to coquer the: but there he was in great danger and diffresse in the deserts for lacke of water, how beit be never shewed any figne that he was afraid. Therby he so assonied & barbarous people, that he had leifure inough to retire with fafetie, & with a great booty of a thousand camels, which he brought away with him. About that time Seleucus (whom Antigonus had driven from BABYLON) retur- Demetrius ning thither againe, he came and conquered it without other aid then of himselfe: & went with a great army against the people and nations confining upon the INDIEs, and the prouinces adioyning vnto mount Caucasus, to conquer them. to keepethem, he commanded the rest of his men to get what they could, and to bring it away with them. After that he marched towards the sea to returne home, leaning thereby the Realme and kingdome of Sclenens in better flate and fafetie, then it was when he inuaded it. For it appeared that he had taken al the country from Selences, leaving him nothing in it, by fpoiling and forraging all that was there. At this returne home, newes was brought him that Ptolomie lay at the fiege of the citie of HALICARNASSVS: wherepon he drew thither with speed to make him rife the fiege, & therby faued the city from him. Now because by this exploit they wan great fame. both of them (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a maruellous defire to fet all GRECE at liberty. the which Ptolomie and Cassander kept in servirude and bondage. Neuer King tooke in hand a more honourable nor infect warre and enterprife, then that was. For, what power or richeshe could gather together, in oppressing of the barbarous people, he bestowed it all in restoring the GRECIANS to their liberty; and onely to winne fame and honor by it. So, they being in confidtation what way to take, to bring their purpose and desire to passe, and having taken order to begin first at ATHENS, one of Antigones chiefest friends about him, told him, that he should take the city, and place a good garrifon there for themselves, if they could once win it : for (faid he)it will be a good bridge to palle further into all GRECE. Antigones would not hearken to that but faid, that the love and good will of men was a ferer bridge, and that the city of ATHENS Was as a beacon to all the land, the which would immediatly make his doings shine through the world. as a creffet light, vpon the top of a keepe or watch tower. Thus Demetrius hoifed faile, having fine thousand filter talents, and a ficete of two hundred and fiftie faile, and failed towards the city of ATHER SI in the which Demerries PHALERIAN was Gouernour in the behalfe of Caffander, and kept a strong garrison there within the hauen & castle of Mynichia. He had an excellent good wind to further his journey, so that with this good forefight and speed he made, he arrived in the hauen of Perzea, the fine & twentieth day of the moneth Thargelion (now called May) before any man knew of his coming. Now when this fleete was within a kenning of the city, and leste, that they might eafily fee them from thence, enery man prepared himfelfe to receive them, taking them to be Ptolomies ships. But in fine, the Captaines and Gouernours understanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe themselves but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keepe their enemics from landing, and to repulse them, coming fo fodainly vpon them. Demetrius having found the barre of the hauen open, launched in presently. Then being come to the view of them all, and standing upon the harches of his galley, he made fignes with his hand that he prayed filence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaimedaloud by one of his Heraulds, that his father had fent him in a happy houre to deliuer the ATHENIANS from all their garrifons, and to restore them againe to their ancient liberty and freedome, ro enioy their lawes and ancient gouernment of their forefathers. After the proclamation made, all the common people straight threw downe their weapon's and targets at their feete, to clap their hands with greatshours of ioy: praying him to land, and calling him aloud, their Sauiour, and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the stronger in, although he performed not that he promised, and also sem Ambaffadours vnto him to treate of peace. Demetrius received them very courteoufly, and fent with them for pledge, one of the dearest friends his father had, Aristodemus MILESIAN. Furthermore, he was not carelesse of the health and safety of Demetrius PHALERIAN, who by reason of the change and alteration of the gouernment of the common-wealth of ATHERS, flood more in fcare of the people of Athens, then of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, caused him to be conueyed (according to his defire) vinto THEBES, With good and sufficient safeconduct. And for Demetrius himselfe, although he was very desirous to see the city, he said he would not come into it, before he had first restored it vnto her ancient liberty and freedome, and also driven away the garrison thence; and thereupon he cast trenches round about ŷ castle of Munychta. In the meane season because he would not be idle, he hoifed faile, and coafted towards the city of MEGARA, within the which Caffander also kept a ftrong garrison. Demetrius bufily following these matters, was aduertised that Cratesipolis, furnamed Polyporchon, (who had bene Alexanders wife) a Ladie of paffing fame and beautic, and lay arthat time in the city of PATRAS, would be gladto fee him, he leaving his army within the territorie of y ME GAR IANS, took his journy prefently vnto her, with a few of his lightest armed men; and yet he stole fro them, and made his tent to be set vpagoca way fro them, because this Ladie

Ladie might not be seene when she came vnto him. Some of his enemies having present intelligence thereof, came and set vpon him before he knew it. Demetrius was so scared, that he had no further leyfure, but to cast an ill-fauoured cloke about him, the first that came to hand, and difguifing himself to flie for life, and scaped very hardly, that he was not shamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie. But though they missed him, they tooke his tent and all his mony init. After that, the city of MEGARA was taken and won from Cassanders men, where Demetrius fouldiers would have facked all: howbeit the ATHENIANS made humble intercession for them, that they might not be spoiled. Demetrius thereupon, after that he had driven out Cassander garrison, he restored it agains to her former liberty. Indoing that, he called to mind the Philosopher Stilpo, a famous man in ME GARA, though he lived a quiet and contemplative life. He Stilpo, a fafent for him, and asked him if any of his men had taken any thing of his. Stilpo answered him, they had not : for (quoth he) I saw no manthat tooke my learning from me. This not with standing, all the slaues of the city were in manner caried away. Another time, Demetrius making much of him, as he was going his way, faid vnto him. Well, Stilpo, I leaue you your city free. It to Demeistrue, ô King (quoth he) for thou hast left vs neuer a slaue. Shortly after, he returned againe vnto ATHENS, and laid fiege to the castell of Munychia, the which he took, and draue out the garrison, and afterwards razed it to the ground. After that, through the intreatie and earnest desire of the Athenians, who prayed him to come and refresh himselfe in their city, he made his entrie into it, and caused all the people to assemble, & then restored vnto them their ancient lawes the Abbeand liberty of their countrey; promifing them besides, that he would procure his father to send them an hundred and fiftiethousand bulhels of wheat, and as much wood and timber as should ferueto make them an hundred and fiftie galleys. Thus the Athenians, through Demetrius Demetrius meanes, recouered the Democratia againe, (to wit, their popular gouernment) fifteene yeares after they had lost it; and lived all the time betweene their losse and restitution from the warre called Lamiacus warre, and the battell that was fought by the city of CRANON, in the state of Oligarchia, to wit, vnder the gouernment of a few gouernours in fight, but intruth a Monar oligarchia, chicor kingdome, because they were under the gouernment of one man Demetrius PHALERI-An that had absolute authority ouer them. But by this meanes they made their sauiour & preseruerof their country, Demetrius (who feemed to have obtained such honour and glory through Too much his goodnes & liberaltiy) hatefull and odious to al men, for the ouergreat and vnmcafurable honors which they gaue him. For first of all, they called Antigonus & Demetrius kings, who before Demetrius that time had alwaies refused the name, and the which (among all other princely honors & prc- by the Arogatiues granted) they that had deuided betweene them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durst neuer once presume to chalenge nor to take vpon them. So vnto them onely they gaue the stile and names of the gods sauiours, and took away their yearely Maior, whom they called Fponymos, because they did shew the yeares of old time by the names of them that had bene Maiors. Furthermore, in stead thereof they ordained in the councel of the city, that there should yearely bechosen one by voices of the people, whom they should name y Priest of their sauiors, whose namethey should write and subscribe in al publike grants and couenants, to shew the yeare; and besides all this, that they should cause their pictures to be drawne in the veile or holy banner, in the which were fet out the images of their gods, the patrons & protectors of their city. And furthermore they did confecrate the place where Demetrius first came out of his coach, & there did fet vpanaltar, & called it Demetrius altar coming out of his coach: and vnto their tribes they added two other, y Antigonides & the Demetriades. Their great councell at large, which they created yearely of 500 men, was then first of al brought vnto 600, because enery tribe must needs furnish of themselves fiftie Counsellers. But yet the strangest act, and most new-found inuention of flattery, was that of Stratocles, (being the common flatterer and people-pleafer) who 7he boldput foorth this decree, by the which it was ordained: That those whom the Common-wealth nesse of should send vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, should in stead of ambassadors becalled Theori, as Stratisles much to fay, as, Ministers of § facrifices. For fo were they called, whom they sent to Delphes to Apollo Pythias, or vnto ELIDE to Iupiter Olympias, at the common and solemne feasts of all GRECE, to do the ordinary facrifices and oblations for the health and prefernation of the ciries. This Stratocles in all things else was a desperate man, and one that had alwaics led a wicked and diffolute life: and for his shamelesse boldnesse, he seemed wholly to defend the steps of Cleans foole hardines and old infolencie, which (when he lived) he shewed vnto the people. kept a harlot in his house, called Phylacion. One day she having bought for his supper, beasts heads and neckes commonly eaten, he faid vnto her: Why, how now? thou hast bought me acates which we toffe like bals, that have to do in the commonwealth. Another time when the armie of the Athenians was ouerthrowneby sea, by the He of Amor Gos, he would needs preuent the newes of this ouerthrow, and came through the street of Ceranicus crowned with garlands of flowers, as if the Athenians had won the battell: and was also the author of a decree whereby they did facrifice vnto the gods, to give them thankes for the victory; and meate was giuen amongst euery tribe, in token of common ioy. But shortly after the messengers arrived which brought report of the shipwracke and ouerthrow. The people were in an vprore withall and sent for Stratocles in a maruellous rage. But he with a face of brasse came vnto them, and ar. rogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them: Well, and what hurt have I done you, if I haue made you merrie these two daies? Such was Stratocles impudencie and rashnesse. But, as the Poet Aristophanes faith:

Then fire that wasteth both by sea and land.

For there was another that passed Stratocles in knauerie, who procured a decree, that as often as Demetrius came into the city of Athens, he should be received with all ceremonies and like solemnitie, as they vse in the feasts of Ceres and Bacchus: and further, that they should give vnto him that did excell all the rest in sumptuousnesse and riches at such time as Demetrius made his entry into the city, so much mony out of the common treasure as should serve to make an image or other offering, which should be consecrated to the temples in memorie of his liberalitie. And last of all, they changed the name of the moneth Munichion, (to wit, the moneth of Ianuarie) and called it Demetrion: and the last day of the moneth, which they called before Thenew and old Moone, they then called it the Demetriade: and the feasts of Bacchus also, called then Dionysia, red, or calthey presently named Demetria. But the gods by divers figures and tokens shewed plainly, that they were offended with these changes and alterations. For the holy banner, in the which (according to the order set downe) they had painted the images of Antigonus and Demetrius, with the pictures of Iupiter and Minerua, as they caried it a proceffion through the street Ceranicus, it was torne asunder in the middest by a tempest of wind. And furthermore, about y altars which were set vp in the honor of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deale of Hemlocke, the which otherwise was unpossible to grow there. On the feast day also of Bacchus, they were compelled to leaue the pompe or procession for that day, it was such an extreme hard frost out of all feason: and besides, there fell such a mil-dew and great frost vpon it, that not only their vines and oliues were killed with it, but also the most part of the wheate blades which were newly sprung vp. And therefore the Poet Philippides (an enemie of the foresaid Stratecles) in one of his Comedies writeth certaine verses against him to this effect:

The partie for whose wickednesse the veile was rent intwaine, Which with the bonor due to God did worship men most vaine, Is he for whom our budding vines were blafted with the froft, Those things and not our Comedies have us so dearely cost.

This Philippides was very well beloued of king Lysimachus, insomuch that for his sake the king had done many pleasures to the Commonwealth of Athens. For he loued him so dearely, that as often as he taw him, or met with him at the beginning of any warre, or matter of great importance, he was of opinion that he brought him good lucke. For indeed he did not so much esteeme him for the excellencie of his art, but he was much more to be beloued and esteemed for his vertuous and honest conditions. He was no troublesome man, neither was he infected with the finenesse of courts, as he shewed one day when the king made much of him, and giving him good countenance, said vnto him: What wilt thou have me give thee of my things Philippides? Euen what it shall please thee, ô king, so it be none of thy secrets. Thus much we thought good to speake of him in by-talke, because an honest player of Comedies should match with a shamelesse and impudent Oratour of the people. But yet there was another Democlides, of the village of Spherrys, that dreamed out a more strange kind of honour, touching the consecration of their targets, which they dedicated to the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, that is to fay, that they should go and aske the oracle of Demetrius. But I will shew you the very effect and forme of the law, as it was fet downe. In good houre, the people ordaine that he should be chosen one of the Citizens of ATHENS, which shall go vnto our fauiour: and after that he hath done due sacrifice vnto him, he shall aske Demetrius our fauiour, after what fort the people shall with greatest holinesse and denotion, without delay, make consecration of their holiest gifts and offerings; and according to the Oracle it shall please him to give them, the people shall duly execute it. Thus laying you Demetrius all these foolish mockeries, who besides was no great wife man, they made him avery foole. Demetrius being at that time at ley fure in ATHENS, he maried a widow called Demetrius Eurydice, which came of that noble and ancient house of Militades, and had bene maried before maried ruvnto one Opheltas Prince of the Cyrenians, and after his death returned againe to Athens. The ATHENIANS were very glad of this mariage, and thought it the greatest honour that came to their city, supposing he had done it for their sakes. Howbeit he was soone won to be maried, Demetrius for he had many wives, but amongst them all he loued Phila best, and gave her most honor and preheminence aboue them all, partly for the respect of her father Antipater; and partly also for gether. that she had bene first maried vnto Craterus, whom the MACEDONIANS loued best when he liued, and most lamented after his death aboue all the other successors of Alexander. His father, I fuppose, made him to marrie her by force, although indeed her yeares was not meete for him: for paters he was maruellous young, and she very old. And when Demetrius seemed not to be contented withall, his father rounded him foftly in the eare with this faying:

Refuseno woman nere fo old, Whole mariage bringeth flore of gold. Wherein he cunningly alluded to these verses of Europides:

Refuse not to become a thrall, Where lucre may enfue withall. daughter, and Craterus widew The indge. ment of mariage, and obedi .

But so much did Demetrius honour his wife Phila, and all his other wives he maried, that he was not ashamed to keepea number of Curtizans, and other mens wines besides: so that he only of all other Kings in his time, was most detected with this vice of lecherie. While these things passed on in this fort, he was commanded by his father to fight with Ptolomie for the Realme of CYPRYS. So there was no remedy but he must needs obey him, although otherwise he was very fory to leaue the warre he had begun, to fet the GRECIANS at liberty, the which had bene far more honorable and famous. Howbeir, before he departed from ATHENS, he fent vnto Cleonides Ptolomies Generall, that kept thecities of Corinth and Sicyone, to offer him money if he would fet their cities at liberty. But Cleonides would not be dealt with all that way. Thereupon Demetrius straightway tooke sea, and sayled with all his army towards Cyprvs, where at his first comming he overcame Menelaus Ptolomies brother. But shortly after, Ptolomie went thither in person with a great army both by sea and land, and there passed betwixt them sicrce threatnings and proud words to each other. For Ptolomic fent to Demotrius to bid him depart if he were wife, beforeall his armie came together: which would tread him vnder their feer, and march vpo his belly if he taried their comming. Demetrius on the other fide fent him word, that he would do him this fauor to let him escape, if he would sweare and promise vnto him to withdraw his garrifons which he had in the cities of Corinth and Sycione. So the expectation of this battel made these two Princes not only very pensine to fight one with the other, but also al the other Lords, Princes, & kings: because the successe thereof was vncertain, which of them two should prenaile. But every man judged this, that which of them obtained the victory, he should not only be Lord of the realme of Cypro & Syria, but therewith also of greater power then all the rest. Ptolomy in person with fiftie saile began to row against his enemy Demetrius, & com- Battell by manded his brother Menelaus, that when he faw them fast grapled in fight together, he should Heofey. launch out of the hauen of SALAMINA, and give charge vpon the rereward of Demetrius ships, prus beto breake their order, with the threescore galleyshe had in charge. Who when he faw his army broken, fled as speedily as he Demetrius could with eight galleys onely: for all the rest were either broken or sunke in fight, and those victory of eight only escaped, besides threescore and ten which were taken, and all their souldiers in them. his gold and filter, his armour, engines of battery, and all fuch other warlike furniture & munition as was conveyed aboord hs cariets & great ships riding at ankers of all these things nothing escaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his campe. Among those spoiles also wastaken that famous curtizan Lamia, who at the first had her name only for her passing playing vpon the flute: but after she fell to curtizan trade, her countenance and credit increased the more. So that even then when her beauty through years fell to decay, and that she found Demetrius much younger then her felfe, yet she so wan him with her sweet conversation and good grace, that he onely liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victory by fea, Menelaus made no more refistance, but yeelded vp SALAMINA and his ships vnto Demetrius and put into his hands also twelve hundred horsemen, and 12 thousand footmen well armed. This so famous & trium. phant victory was yet much more beautified by Demetrius great bounty and goodnes, which he shewed in giving his enemies slaine in battell honorable funerals, setting the prisoners at libertie without ransome paying, & giving moreover twelve hundred complete armors vnto the ATHE NIANS. After this Demetrius fent Aristodemus MILESIAN Unto his father Antigorus, to tellhim by word of mouth the newes of this victory . Aristodemus was the greatest flatterer in al Antigonus court, who deuised then (as it seemeth to me) to adde vnto this exploit the greatest slattery possible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of § Ile of Cyprvs, he would in no wife haue the ship he came in to come neare the shore, but commanded them to ride at anker, and no man so hardy to leave the ship:but he himselfgot into a litle boat, and went vnto Antigonus, who all this while was in a maruellous feare and perplexity for the successe of this battel, as men may eafily judge they are which hope after fo great vncertainties. Now when word was brought him that Aristodemus was coming to him all alone, then was he worsetroubled then afore, insomuch that he could scant keepe within doores himselfe, but sent his servants and friends one after another to meet Aristodemus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him word presently againshow the world went. But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on ftill faire and foftly with a fad countenance, and very demurely, speaking neuer a word. Wherefore Antigonus heart being cold in his belly, he could flay no longer, but would himself go and meet with Aristodemus at the gate, who had a maruellous preasse of people following of him, besides those of the court which ranne out to heare his answer. At length when he came neare vnto Antiegmis, holding out his right hand vnto him, he cried out aloud: God faue thee, ô King Antiquous: we have overcomeking Ptolomy in battel by sea, and have won the realme of Cyprvs, with sixteene thousand and eight hundred prisoners. Then answered Antigonus: And God saue theetoo. Truly Aristodemus thou hast kept vs in atrance a good while, but to punish thee for the paine thou hast put vs to, thou shalt the later receive the reward of thy good newes. Then was the sirst time that the people with a loud voice called Antigonus and Demetrius kings. Now for Antigonus, his friends and familiars did at that instant put on the royall band or Diademe vpon his head; but for Demetrius, his father sent it vnto him, and by his letters called him King. They also that were in ÆGYPT with Ptolomy, vnderstanding that, did call and salute him by the name of King: because it shold not seeme that for one overthrow received, their harts were dead. Thus this ambition by icalousie & emulation went from manto man to all Alexanders successors. For Lysima. chus then also began to weare the Diademe, and likewise Seleucus, as often as he spake with the GRECIANS: for before that time, he dealt in matters with § barbarous people as a king. But Caffander, though others wrote themselues kings, he only subscribed after his wonted maner. Now this was not only an increase of a new name, or changing of apparell, but it was such an honor, as it lift vp their hearts, and made them stand vpon themselves: and besides, it so framed their maner of life and conuer fation with men, that they grew more proud and stately then ener they were before: like vnto common players of Tragedies, who apparelling themselues to play their parts vpon the stage, do change their gate, their countenance, their voice, their manner of sitting at the table, and their talke also. So that afterwards they grew more cruell in commanding their subiects, when they had once taken away the vizer and diffimulation of their absolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters vnto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought fuch a wonderfull change in the world. Antigonus therefore puffed vp with the glory of the victory of his sonne Demetrius, for the conquest of Cyprvs, he determined forthwith to set vpon Ptolomy. Himselfe led the army by land, hauing his sonne Demetrius still rowing by the shore side with a great sleete of ships. But one of his familiars called Medius, being affeepe, had a vision one night that told him, what should be Medius the end and successe of this journey. He thought he saw Antigonus runne with all his armie, who should have the vpperhand; and that at the first he ranne with great force and swiftnesse, but that afterwards his strength and breath failed him so much, that when he should returne, he had feant any pulse or breath, and with much ado retired againe. And even so it chanced vnto him. For Antigonus by land was eftioones in great danger; and Demetrius also by sea was often in hazard to leaue the coast, and by storme and weather to be cast into places where was neither hauen, creekes, nor harborough for shippes. And at length hauing lost a great number of his shippes, he was driven to returne without any attempt given. Now Antigonus was at that time litle lesse then fourescore yeares old, but yet his fat and corpulent body was more combersome to him then his yeares: therefore being growne vnmeet for wars, he vled his sonne in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as also skilfull through the experience he had gotten, did wisely gouerne the weightiest matters. His father besides did not passe for his youthfull parts, lauish expences and common drunkennesse he gaue himselfe vnto. For in time of peace, he was given ouer to all these vices: but in time of warre, he was as sober and continent as any man so borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia being manifestly knowne to be mistresse ouer him, one day when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kiffe his father: and that Antigonus smiling youn him, said: What, how now some, doest thou thinke thou art Antigonus kissing of Lamia? Another time Demetrius was many dayes together drinking and ryoting, and ninh with faw not his father: and then to excuse himselfe vnto him, he told him he had gotten a rheume Demetrius that made him keepe his chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard, faid Antigonus: but was it of Thas os or Chios that rheume? He spake it, because that in either of those two Ilands, there were excellent good wines. Another time Demetrius fent his father word, that he was not well: thereupon Antigonus went to fee him, and comming thither, he met a faire young boy at his doore. So he went up to his chamber, and fitting downe by his beds fide, he tooke him by the hand to feele his pulfe. Demetrius cold him that his feauer had left him but a litle before. I know it well, (faid Antigonus) for I met the young boy euen at the doore as I come in So Antigonus did gently beare with his fonnes faults, in respect of the many other vertues he had. The voice goeth, that the Scythians, when they are disposed to drinke drunketogether, do di- Afrange uerstimes twang the strings of their bowes, as though that would serue to keepe the strength of the Scythitheir courage and hardinesse, which otherwise the pleasantnesse of the wine wold take fro them. and in their But Demetrius gauchimselfe to one thing onely at one selfe time: sometime to take his pleasure, fometime to deale in matters of weight; & in all extremity he cuer vsed but one of them, & wold neuer mingle the one with the other; and yet this notwithstanding, he was no lesse politicke and circumspect to prepare all maner of munition for wars. For as he was a wife Captain to leade an Demetrius armie, so was he also very carefull to prouide all things meet for their furniture, & would rather askilfull capitains hauctoo much then too litle. But about all, he exceeded in sumptuous building of ships, and framing of all forts of engines of battery, and specially for the delight he tooke to inuent and deuise sellent ships them. For he had an excellent naturall wit to deuise such works as are made by wit & hand, and did not bestow his wit and inuention in handi-crafts, intriffing toyes and bables: as many other kings that have given themselves to play on flutes, others to paint and draw, and others also to sundrieder Turners craft. As Aropus king of Macedon, who delighted to make fine tables & prety lamps. And Attalus, firnamed Philometer (to fay, louer of his mother) that would plant and fet Physicall herbes, as Helleborum, Lingwort, or Beares foote, Hoscynamum, Henbane, Cicuta, Hemlocke, Aconitum, Libardbaine or Wolfebaine, and Doryenium: for the which we have no English word: all these would be set himself with his owne hands in the gardens of his owne pallace, and also gather them in time of the yeare, to know the vertue and power of them. Or as Arfaces the kings of PARTHIA, that boasted they could themselves make their arrowes heads, and sharpen them. But the Artificers workes which Demetrius practifed, shewed that they came from a King. For his manner of workmanship had a certaine greatnesse in it, the which euen Demetrine with the fubrilitie and finencile of his workes, shewed the trimine handling of the workman: workes. fo that they appeared not only worthy the viderstanding and riches of a King, but also the forging and making by the hands of a great King. For his friends did not onely wonder at their greatnesse, but his very enemies also were delighted with the beautie of them. And this is more true then meete to be spoken: the enemies could not but maruell when they saw his

whose beauty Demetrius being informed by the sirname he had, as comonly called through the city. Democles the faire, he fought diverse waies to intice him, both by faire meanes, large promises and gifts, and also with threats besides. But when he saw no man could bring him to the bent of his bow, and that the yong boy in the end feeing him fo importunate vpon him, came no more to the common places of exercife, where other children yield to recreate themselves, and that to avoid the common flowers, he went to wash himselfe in another secret flow: Demetrius watching his time and howre of going thither, followed him, and got into him being alone. The boy seeing himselfe alone, and that he could not resist Demetrius, took e off the couer of the kettle or cauldron where the water was boiling & leaping into it drowned himfelfe. Truly he was vnworthy of fo lamentable an end, but yet shewed anoble heart, worthy of his beauty and country. But he did not as another called Cleanetus, the fonne of Cleanedon, who brought fetters from Demetrius directed to the people, whereby through Demetrius intercession and request, his fathers fine of fifty talents in the which he was condemned (and for nonpayment remained pri-foner) was clearly remitted and forgiuen. But by this act, he not onely shamed and dishonoured himfelfe, but also troubled all the city. For the people thereupon released Cleemedon of his fine, but therwith they made a decree that no citizen should thence forth bring any more letters from

Demetrius. But afterwards understanding that Demetrius was maruellously offended with this decree, they did not only reaoke their first decree, but they did also put some of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others also they banished. And further they made a law, that the people of ATHEN'S should account all religious to the gods, & inst vn-chiefest men of the city, that faid Stratocles was a madde man to preferre fuch matters. Indeed quoth Demochares firnamed LACONIAN, he were a mad man if he were otherwise; and he spake it, because this Stratoiles had many great pleasures at Demetrius hands for this slattery. Howbeit, Demochares being accused and condemned upon these words, he was banished Athens. See galleys rowing along the coast, with fifteene or fixteene banks of oares; and his engines of batterie which they called Elepolis, (as much to fay, engines to take cities) were a spectacle of great admiration vnto those whom he befieged, as the euents following did throughly witnesse. For Lysimachus, who of all other kings did malice Demetrius most, coming to raise the siege from the citie of Solli in Cilicia, the which Demetrius besieged, he sent vnto him to pray him tolet him see his engines of batterie, and his galleys rowing vpon the sea. Demetrius granting him, Lysimachus returning with wonderful admiration. The Rhodians also having long time defen. ded his fiege, at the last made peace with him, and prayed him to leave some one of his engines with them, for a perpetual testimony & remembrance both of his power, and also of their conrage and valiantheffe. The cause why Demetrius made warre with the Rhodian's was because they were confederates with king Piolomie: he brought against their wals the greatest engine he had, the foote whereof was like atile, more long then broad, and at the base on either side it was eight and for ie cubits long, and threescore and fixe high, rifing stil narrow cuen to the very top. fo that the vpper parts were narrower then the nether, and within it were many prety rooms and places conneyed for fouldiers. The forepart of it was open towards the enemy, & cuery roome or partition had windowes out of which they bestowed all kind of shot, because they were full of armed men fighting with all forts of weapons. But now, because it was so well framed and counterpoifed, that it gaue no way, nor reeled on either fide, which way focuer they remoued it. but that it flood fast and vpright vpon her foundation, making a terrible noise and sound, that made the worke as wonderful to behold, as it was a maruellous pleasure for men to see it. In this war were brought vnto Demetrius two notable armors weighing fortie pounds a peeces made by one Zorlas an armorer, who to shew the hardnes and goodnes of the temper, suffered the to be proudd and fhor at at fixefcore paces, with the engines of their batterie; and albeit the armors were shot at and hit, yet were they neuer pierced, and but only a litle race or scratch seene, as it were of a bodkin or penknife, and had no more hort. Demetrius alwayes wore one of them in these warres, and Aleimus Albanian the other, the strongest & valiantes man he had in all his hoaft, and that only caried a complete armour weighing fix fcore pounds, where all other fouldiers were none about threefcore. This Alcimis was flaine at RHODES, valiantly fighting by the Theater, In this fiege the RHODIANS did valiatly defend themselves, that Demetrius could do no act worthy memory. This not with standing, although he saw he could not prenaile, but lose his time, yet was hethe more obstinatly bent against them, to be euen with them, because they had taken a ship of his, in the which his wife Phila had sent vnto him certain hangings of tapestry, linnen, apparel, and letters, and because they had sent them all vnto Ptolomie as soone as they had taken the. But therein they did not follow the honest curtesie of the ATHENIANS, who having intercepted certain currers of king Philips that made war against them, they opened all the letters they caried, & read them, fauing only his wife Olympiaes letters she fent him, the which they sent vnto king Philip fealed, as they were when they received them. Now though this part did much grieue and offend him, yet he could not find in his hart to serue them in that fort, when he might haue done it not long after. For by chance at that time Protogenes an excellent Painter, borne in Cavnvs, did paint the the draught of the city of Ialys vs. Demetrius found this table in a house in the suburbes of the city, being almost ended. The RHODIAN's theruposending an herald vnto him, to befeech him to spare the defacing of lo goodly a work, he returned them answer, that he would rather fuffer his fathers images to be burnt, the foexcellent & paffing a work as that to be lost, & brought to nothing. For it is reported, that Protogenes was 7 yeares drawing of the same: table of the and it is faid also that Apelles himselfe when he saw it, did so wonder at it, that his speech failed him, and he stood mute a long time, and at last said: Surely this is a wonderfull peece of worke, and of great labour, yet doth it want those graces and ornaments whereby those that I paint do reach unto heauen. This table afterwards being brought to Rome, and hanged vp with others, was in the end burnt by fire. Now as the Rhodians were desirous to be rid of this warre, and that Demetrius also was willing to take an honest occasion to do it, the Ambassadours of the Athenians came happily to serue both their desires, who made peace between them with these conditions: that the RHODIAN's should be confederates with Antigonus and Demetrius against all men, but Ptolomy only. The Athenians sent for Demetrius, vpon Cassanders comming to lay siege to their city: whereupon Demetrius immediatly hoised fayle towards ATHEMS, with three hundred and thirty galleys, and a great number of aren of warre besides:

HERACLEA, which willingly yeelded vnto him, and 6000 MACEBONIANS that came vnto him totake his part. So in his returne back, he fet all the GRECIANS at liberty on this fide y straight: ristories be made league with the Bosofians, & tooke the city of Ceneres, & the castles of Phyle in Greek

Therefore Demetrius, to honour this feast with the GRECIANS. maried Deidamia (the daughter of Eacides, king of the Molossians, and lifter of Pyrrhus) and perswaded the Sicyonians, to leauetheircity, and to come and build in another goodly place neare vnto it, where they now do dwell: and so with the place and situation, he changed also the name of the city. For in stead of STCYONE, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then atage. neral affembly of the states of GRECE, which was kept in the straight of PELOPONNESVS, called Is THMOS. Demetrius was chosen Lieutenant generall of all the GRECIANS, as Philip and A. lexander (both kings of MACEDON) had bene before him, vnto whom he did not only compare himselse, but thought himselse greater then they, because fortune smiled on him, and for thathe had so good successe in al his affaires. Whereas Alexander did neuer take away the title and name of king from any other kings, neither did euer call himselfe king of kings, although he had given vnto diuerse of them the name and power of a king: & in contrary maneralso, Demetrius laughed them to scorne which called any other Princes kings but his father and himselfe. Moreour he tooke great pleasure to heare his flatterers, who being at banquets called for wine to drinketo king Demetrius, and then to Seleucus master of the Elephants, to Piolomy Admirall, to Lysimachus keeper of the treasure, & to Agathocles SILICIAN, gouernor of the Iles. Althe kings, but Lylima. chus, laughed at these toyes when they were reported to them: but Lysimachus was very angry. & thought great scorne that Demetrius should reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old custome commonly to give an Eunuchthe charge of keeping the treasure. So Lysimachus of al other Princes did beare him most malice; and because he would finely taunt him for that he euer kept L4mia his curtifan with him: Vntill this present time, said he, I neuer saw harlot play in a Tragedy before. Demetrius answered him againe, that his harlot was chafter the Penelope his wife. So De. metrius departing for that time out of PELOPONNESVS, tooke his journey towards ATHENS, and wrote before to the ATHENIANS, that when he came thither he would be received into the fraternity of the holy mysteries, and that he meant they should shew him at one selfe time, althat was to be seene, euen from the least to the highest secrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, because they made the brethren of the fraternity see them long time after that they had benefiss received into the leffer ceremonies: the which was not lawfull then, neither was cuer heard of before. For these smaller mysteries, in old time were relebrated in the moneth of November, and the greater in the moneth of August: and besides it was not lawfull to celebrate or vse these ceremonies within the space of a yeare one of the other. When these letters were opely read, no. mandurst speake against them, but Pythodorus the Priest, who carried the torch lighted when they shewed thele mysteries. Howbeit his words prenailed not, for by the deuice of Stratocles it was enacted at an affembly of the city, that the moneth of March in the which they were at that time, should becalled and reputed November. And so as they could best helpe it, by their ordinances of the city they did receiue Demetrius into the fraternity of the mysteries: & afterwards again, this selse moneth of March which they had translated into Nouember, became suddenly August: and in the selfe same yeare was celebrated the other ceremony of these great mysteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to feethe most straight and secret ceremonies. Therfore Philippides the Poet inueighing against the facriledge and impiety of religion prophaned by Stratocles, made these verses of him: Into one moneth his coming hither,

And afterwards because Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the temple of Minerna within the castell:

Of chast Mineruaes holy Church he makes a filthy stewes. And in that virgins very fight his harlor's doth abuse.

But yet of al the infolent parts done at that time in ATHENS (although many were committed) none of all the rest griened the Athenians more, then this did: that Demetrius commanded them they should presently furnish him with two hundred and fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very hard vnto them, both for the shortnesse of the time appointed them, as also for the impossibility of abating any part of it. When he had seene all this masse of money laide on a heape before him, he commanded it should be given to Lamia, & among his other curtifans, of an hundred talents given amongst them, he delivered the cities of Argos, Sicrone, and of Hath thrust up all the yeare together.

to buy them fope. The shame the ATHENIANS received by this gift, grieved them more then the loffe of their mony and the words he spake to the great contempt of them and their city, did more trouble them then the payment they made. Some fay notwith standing, that Demetrius did not alone vie the Athenians thus shamefully but the Thessalians also in the same maner. But passing this ouer, Lamia of her selfe and through her owne countenance did get a great sum of money together of diverse persons for one supper she made vnto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of such exceeding charge, that Lycans borne in the Ile of Samos, did set downe the metrica order thereof in writing. And therfore a certaine Poet no lesse pleasantly, then truly, called this furper of her owner Lamia, Elepolis: to wit, an engine to take cities. And Demochares also borne in the city of Solis, con. called Demetrius a fable, because he had Lamia ever with him : as in the fables which old wo- Lamia Eles mentell litle children, there is ever lightly a Lamia, as much to fay, as a witch, or forcereffe, So that the great credit and authority this Lamia had, and the loue which Demetrius bare her. did not onely cause his wives to suspect and enuy him, but made him hated also of all his friends and familiars. And therefore certaine gentlemen, whom Demetrius fent in Ambassade vnto king Lyfimachus, he talking familiarly with them, and passing the time away, shewed them great wounds of the clawes of a Lyon vpon his armes and legges, telling them also how he was forced to fight with a Lyon, when through king Alexanders fury he was shur vp in his den with him: they smiling to heare him, told him that the king their master had also certaine markes and bitings on his necke, of a wild beaft called Lamia. And to fay truly, it was a wonderfull thing, that marying (as he did) his wife Phila fo much against his will, because she was too old for him, how he was fo rauished with Lamia, and did so constantly loue her so long together, confidering also that she was very old, and past the best. Therefore Demo, sirnamed Mama (as Tin faying much to fay, the madde woman) pleasantly answered Demetrius, asking her one night when of Demotion, asking her one night when Lamia had played on the flute all support ime, what she thought of Lamia? An old woman, O testing king, quoth she. Another time when fruite was serued in after the boord was taken vp: Do you see said Demetrius, how many prety fine knackes Lamia sendeth me : My mother, answered Demo againe, will send you more then these, if you please to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that she ouerthrew Bocchoris indgement in a matter. In AGYFT there was a young manthat had a maruellous fancie vnto a famous curtifan called Thonis: who did aske him such a greatsumme of money to lye with her, that it was vnpossible for him to giue it her. At length, and the this amorous youth being so deepe in soue with her, dreamed one night he lay with her, and enioyedher: for that for the pleasure he tooke by his conceipt and imagination, when he awaked, reserved by his earnest loue was fatisfied. This curtifan whom he had cast fancy to hearing of this his dream, curtifan. didputhim in suite before the Iudges, to be payed her hire for the pleasure the yong man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the fumme of her complaint, commanded the young man to bring before him in some vessell, at a certaine day appointed, as much monv as shedidaske him fortolye with her. Then he bad him to tosse it too & fro in his hand before the curtifan, that she might onely have the shadow and sight of it: for quoth he, imagination The sabelites and opinion is but a shadow of truth. Lamia said, this was no equal indgement: for said she, of Lamia, the shadow onely or the fight of money, did not satisfie the couetousnelle of the curtisan, as renerging the young mans lust was quenched by his dreame. Thus inough spoken of Lamia. But now the misfortunes and gests of him we presently write of, do transport the historie, as from a comicallinto a tragicall theater, that is to fay, from pleafant and light matter, into lamentable and bitter teares. For all the Princes and Kings conspired generally against Antigonus, and ioyned The constiall their force and armies together. Therefore Demetrius departed forthwith out of GRECE, racy of the

did lift up his heart the more. And yet it seemeth to me, that if Antigonus would but have yeelded vp a few trifling things, or that either he could or would have bridled his over immoderate couetous desire to reigne, he had both kept for himselfe all the time of his life, and also lest after his death vnto his fonne, the supremest dignity and power, aboue all the other kings and fuccessours of Alexander. But he was so cruell and so rash of nature, and as infolent and brane in his doings, as in his words: that thereby he stirred vp and brought vpon him as his enemics, many great and mighty Princes. For even at that prefent time he faid, that he would

birds coming to pecke vp the corne newly fowne, are eafily feared away with a stone or ma king any little noise. So he caried to the field with him, about threescore and ten thousand foot. men, ten thousand horsemen, and threescore and fifteene Elephants. His enemies had three score and foure thousand footmen, and fine hundred horsemen more then he, with foure hun dred Elephants, and fix score carts of war. When the two armies were one neare vnto the other. me thinkes he had some imagination in his head that changed his hope, but not his courage. For in all other battels & conflicts, having comonly vsed to looke big on the matter, to have a lowd high voice, and to vie braue words, and sometime also even in the chiefest of all the battel to give fome pleafant mocke or other, shewing a certaine trust he had in himselfe, and contempt of his c. nemy; then they faw him oftentimes alone and very penfine, without ener a word to any man One day he called all his army together, and prefented his fonne vnto the fouldiers, recommen ding him vnto them, as his heire and fucceffour, and talked with him alone in his tens. Whereat men maruelled the more, because that he never ysed before to impart to any man the secrets of his counfell and determination, no not to his owne fon, but did all things of himfelfe; and then commanded that thing openly to be done which he had fecretly purposed. For proofe hereofit is faid. Demetrius being but a yong man, asked him on a time when the campe should remoue: and that Antigonus in anger answered him, art thou affraid thou shalt not heare the sound of the trumpet: Furthermore, there fell out many ill fignes & tokens that killed their harts. For Dem. trius dreamed that Alexander the Great appeared armed vnto him at all peeces, and that he asked him what word or fignall of battel they were determined to give at the day of battel; he answer red that they were determined to give Iupiter and Victorie. Then faid Alexander, I will go to thine enemies that shall receive me : and afterwards at the very day of the overthrow, when all their army were fet in battell ray, Antigones coming out of his tent, had fuch a great fall, that he fell flat on his face to the ground, and hurt himfelfevery forely. So when he was taken up, then life ting vp his hands to heaven, he made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would pleafe them to grant him victory, or fudden death without great paine, before he should fee himselfe vanquished and his army overthrowne. When both armies came to joyne, and that they fought hand to hand Demetrius that had the most part of the horsemen with him, went & gaue charge vpon Antiochus the fonne of Seleucus, and fought it out fo valiantly on his fide, that he ouerthrew his enemies, and put them to flight. Buttoo fondly following the chase of them that fled, and out of time, he marred al, and was the occasion of the losse of his victory. For when he returned from the chase, he could not joyne againe with their footmen, because the Elephants were betweene both. Then Selencus perceiving Antigonus battel was naked of horfemen, he did not presently set upon them, but turned at one fide as though he would enuirone them behind, and made them affraid; yet making head as he would charge them, onely to give them leifure to come on their fide, as they did. For the most part of Antigonus hoast did for sake him and yeelded vnto his enemies: the rest of them fled every man. And when a great troupe of me together went with a great fury to give charge on that fide where Antigonus was, one of them that were about him faid vnto him: Your grace had need to take heed, for these men come to charge vs. He answered agains: but how fhould they know me? and if they did, my fon Demetrius will come and helpe me. This was his last hope, and still he looked enery way, if he could see his sonne coming towards him: till at length he was flaine with arrowes, darts and pikes. For of all his friends & fouldiers, there taried not one man by his body, but Thorax of the city of LARISSA in THE SSALY. Now & battel hauing fuch successed as you have heard, the Kings and Princes that had won so noble a victory, as if they had cut a great body into fundry peeces, they deuided Antigonus kingdom among them, and every man had his part of all the provinces and countries which Antigonus kept, adding that vnto their other dominions which they possessed before. Now Demetrius slying with al possible speed that might be, with five thousand footmen, and foure thousand horsemen, he got to the city of Eph B sv s: where every man mistrusted, that being needy of money as he was, he would not sparethe temple of Diana in Ephesys, but would rife all the gold and filter in it. And in contrary manneral fo Demetrius being afraid of his fouldiers, lest they would spoile it against his will, he fuddenly departed thence, and failed towards GRECE, putting his greatest confidence and affiance in the Athenians, because he had left his wife Deidamia at Athens, with ships and fome money; supposing he could go no whither with better safety in his aduersity, then to

the Athenian's came vitto him, and found him not far from the He of Cyclades, ashe failed with great speed towards ATTICA, & that they had declared vnto him, he shold for bear to come who their city, because the people had made an ordinance to suffer no mockings to come into The was ATHENS, and that they had fent Deidamia his wife honourably accompained vnto the city of faithfulter MEGARA: then was Demetrius for very anger and passion of mind, cleane out of countenance, although vntill that time he had patiently borne his advertitie, and his heart had never failed ward Dehim. But this nipped him to the heart, when he faw (that contrary to expectation) the ATHE-NIANS had deceived and failed him in his greatest need, and that in his adversitie he found their former friendship counterfeit, and altogether dissembled. Whereby most plainely appeareth, that the most vicertaine and deceiveable proofe of peoples good-wils and cities towards over great Kings and Princes, are the immeasurable and extreme honours they do vnto them. For fith it is fo. that the truth and certaintie of honour proceedeth from the good-will of those that give it, meonstant the feare which the common people commonly stand in of the power of kings, is sufficient cause friendship. for them to mistrust that the people do it not with good will and from their hearts, considering that for feare they do the felfe same things, which they will also do for loue. Therefore graue and wise Princes should not passe so much for the images and statues they set up for them, or the tables or divine honours they do decree vnto them, as to regard their owne workes and deeds. and weighing them truly, fo to beleeue and receive their honours for true, or otherwife to reject and mistrust them, as things done by compulsion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate kings the more, when they do accept these immeasurable and extreme honours done vnto them: but those forts chiefly hate them most, that against their wils are forced to do them those honours. Demetrius seeing then how injuriously the ATHENIANS had vied him, and at that time not knowing how to be reuenged of them, he modelly fent vnto them onely to make his complaints, and to demand his thips, among the which was that galley of fixteene banckes of oares. The which when he had received, he hoifed faile immediatly towards the straight of PELOPONNESUS, and therefound all things to go against him. For in enery place where he had left any garrison, the Captaines that had the charge of them, either yeelded them vp, or else revolted, and kept them against him. Therefore leaving Pyrrhus his Lieutenant in GRECE, he tooke fea againe, and failed towards CHERRONESVS, and there with the mischieucs he did, and with the spoiles he got in king Lysimachus land, he payed his men, and enriched his army, the which began againe to increase, and to be dreadfull to his encmies. But now for Lysimachus, the other kings made no great account of him, neither did they stirre to give him aide, because he was nothing inferiour vnto Demetrius: and for that he was of greater power and possessions then themselves, they therefore were the more affraid of him. Shortly after, seleucus sent unto Demetrius, to require his daughter Stratonice in mariage, notwithstanding that he had a sonne already called Antiochus, by his wife Apama a Persian. Howbeit he thought that his affaires and greatnesse of his estate and kingdome, was able inough to maintaine many successours after him. And furthermore, he considered with himselfe that he should have need of Demetrius alliance, because he saw Lysimachus himselfe match with one of Prolomies daughters, and his sonne: Agathoeles with his other daughter. Demetrius seeing this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, prefently tooke his daughter with him, and failed withall his ships directly towards Syria. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessity to land sometimes, and specially in CILICIA, the which Plistarchus the brother of Cassander kept at that time, being given him by the other kings for his part and portion of the spoile of of cassan-Antigonus, after he was overthrowne. This Plistarchus thinking that Demetrius landed notto der, at that refresh himselfe, but to forrage and spoile, because he would complaine of Seleucus for the alliance he made with their common enemy, without the confent and privity of all the other civia. Kings and Princes confederates, he went purposely vnto his brother Cassander. Demetrius hauing intelligence thereof, suddenly invaded the land, and spoiled as farre as the city of CYNDES, Demetrins and caried away (which he had leavied) twelve hundred talents, which he found yet left of his inadetli fathers treasure: and then with all the speed he could possible he returned to his ships, and hoifed faile. Shortly after his wife Phila also came vnto him. So Seleucus received them all neare vnto the city of OROSSVS, and there their meeting was Princely, without forow or suspition oncof the other. First of all Selencus did feast Demerrius in his tent, in the middest of his campe: and afterwards Demetrius feasted him againe in his galley, with thirteene banckes of oares.

Thus they passed many daies together, feasting and rejoycing each with other, being vnarmed and having no fouldiers to waite vpon them; vntill at length Seleucus with his wife Stratonice departed, and took his way with great pompe towards the city of Antioch. Now for Demetring. he kept the prouince of CILICIA, and fent his wife Phila vnto her brother Caffander, to answer the complaints and accusations of Plistarchus against him. In the meane time Deidamia his wife departed out of GRECE to come vnto him: who after she had remained with him a few dayes, died of a sicknesse. Afterwards Demetrius coming againe in fauour with Ptolomy, by Selencus his fon in lawes meanes, he maried his daughter Ptolemaide. Hitherunto Seleucus vied Demetrius very courteoufly, but afterwards he prayed him to deliuer him CILICIA againe, for a fum of mony that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly denied him. Then did Seleucus shew acruell and tyrannicall conetous field: for in anger, and with sierce threats & countenance he asked him the cities of Tyre, and Sidon. But therin me thinks he lacked honesty &civility: as though he that had vnder his obedience and subjection all that which lay betwixt the Indies, & the sease Syria, was in such need and pouerty, that for two cities onely, he should drive his father in law from him, who had sustained so hard and bitter change. But therby he rightly confirmed Platoes faying that he that will be rich indeed, must indeuor himself not to increase his riches, but rather to diminish his couetonsnesse. For he shall neuer be but a begger and needy, whose couetous defire hath no end. This notwithstanding, Demetrius yeelded not for scare, but prouided to replenish the cities with good garrisons to keepe them against him: faying, that though he had bene ouercome ten thousand times more in battell, yet it should never sincke into his head that he should be contented, and thinke himselfe happy to buy Seleucus alliance so deare. On the other fide, being aduertised that one Lachares having spied oportunity when the ATHENIAN'S werein cinill wars one against the other, & that he had ouercome the, & did tyrannically vsurpethego. nernment, he then perswaded himselfe that he might easily win it againe, if he came thither yppon the sudden. Thereupon he croffed the seas with a great sleete of ships, without any dangers but he had fuch a great storme and tempest vpon the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most part of his ships, and a great number of his men besides. But for himselfe he scaped, & began to make a little warre with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiuing that he did no good there, but lost his time, he sent some of his men to gather a number of his ships againe together, and he himselfeinthe meane time went into Peloponnesvs, to lay fiege to the city of Messina, where his person was in great danger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had such a blow with a dart, that it hit him full in the mouth, and ran through his cheeke. Notwithstanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subjection againe certaine towns that had rebelled against him. After that, he returned againe into Attica, & took the cities of Elevsin, and of Rhamnus and then spoiled all the country, and took a ship fraught with corne, and hung vp the merchant, that ought it, and the master of the ship that brought it: thereby to terrifie all other merchants, that they should be afraid to bring any more come thither, and so to famish the city, by keeping them from all things necessary for their sustenance; and so it happened. For a bushell of salt was fold at Athens for forty filuer Drachmaes, and a bushell of wheat for three hundred Drach-*30:rowns. mas. In this extreme necessity, the ATHENIANS had but a short ioy for the hundred & fifty galleys they faw neare vnto ÆGINA, the which Ptolomy fent to aide them: for when the fouldiers that were in them faw that they brought vnto Demetrius a great number of ships out of Pelo-PONNESUS, out of CYPRVS, and diverse other parts, which amounted in the whole to the number of three hundred saile, they weyed their ankers, & fled presently. Then Lachares for sook the city, & fecretly faued himfelf. Now the Athenians, who before had commanded vpon paine of death, that no man should make any motion to the councell, to treate of any peace with Demetrius, they did then vpon Lachares flying, presently open the gates next vnto Demetrius campe, and fent Ambassadors vnto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but because necessity draue them to it. During this fo hard and straight siege, there fell out many wonderfull and strange curus, at the things; but among others, this one is of speciall note. It is reported that the father and son sitting in their house, voide of all hope of life, there fell a dead rat before them from the top of the house, and that the father and sonne fought who should have it to eate. Moreover, that at the felfe same siege the Philosopher Epicurus maintained himselfe and his scholers, by giving them a portion of beanes enery day, by the which they lined. Thus the city of ATHENS being brought vnto this extremitie, Demetrius made his entrie into it, and gaue commandement to all the citizens, that they should assemble every man within the Theater: where he made them to be compassed in with armed souldiers, and then placed all his guard armed about the stage. Afterwards he came downe himfelf into the Theater, through high galleries and entries by the which the common players vsed to come to play their parts in tragedics, insomuch as § ATHE-NIAN'S were then worse afraid then before: howbeit Demetrius presently pacified their feare, as foone as he began to speake vnto them. For he did not fashion his Oration with a hastie angrie voice, neither did he vse any sharpe or bitter words but only after he had courteously told them their faults & discourtesie towards him, he said he forgaue them, & that he would be their friend Demetrius againe; and furthermore, he caused ten millions of bush: Is of wheat to be given voto them, and stablished such gouernors there, as the people missiked not of. Then Democles the Orator, seeing Athenians, that the people gaue out great shouts of joy in the praise of Demetrius, and that the Orators daily contended in the pulpit for Orations, who should exceed other in preferring new honours for Demetrius, he caused an order to be made, that the hances of Pirkevs and MVNYCHIA should be put into De netrius hands, to vie at his pleasure. This being established by voices of § people, Demetrius of his own prinate authority did place a great garrison within the fort called Mv s Ævm, because the people should rebell no more against him, nor divert him from his other enterprifes. Thus when he had taken Athens, he went to fet vpothe Laced Emonians. But Archidamus king of LACED & MON, came against him with a puissant armie, whom hediscomfited in gainst the battell, and put to flight, by the city of MANTINEA. After that he inuaded LACONIA with all his Lacedamoarmy, and made an inrode to the city of Sparta, where he once againe ouerthrew the Lace-DEMONIANS in set battell, took 500 of them prisoners, and flue 200: in so much as every man thought he might euen then go to Sparta without any danger to take it, the which had neuer yetbene taken afore by any. But there was neuer king that had so often and sudden changes of Demetrius fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affaires was ever so often litle, and then great: so suddenfortune. ly downe, and vp againe : so weake, and straight so strong. And therefore it is reported, that in his great aduer sities when fortune turned so contrarie against him, he was wont to cry out vpon fortune, that which Æfchylus speaketh in a place:

Thou feem'st to have begotten me, of purpose for to show Thy force in lifting of me up, me downe againe to throw.

Now againe when his affaires prospered so well, and that he was likely to recouer a great force Demoirius &kingdome, newes were brought him, first that Lysimachus had taken all his townes from him, which he heldin As IA: and on the other fide, that Ptolomy had won from him all the Realme of CYPRVS, the city of SALAMINA only excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very straightly befieged. This notwithstanding, fortune played with him, as the wicked woman Archilocus speaketh of, who

And in the other fire bestow. For taking him away, and (as it were) the city of Sparta also out of his hands by these dreadfull newes, euen when he was certaine to haue won it, she presently offered him hopes of other great and new things, by this occasion following. After the death of Cassander, Philip who was the cldeft of all his other fonnes, and left his heire and fuccessor in the kingdome of MACEDON, Great diff. reigned no long time oner the MACEDONIANS, but deceassed soone after his father was dead. Gention and The two other brethren also fell at great variance, and wars together; so that the one called An- first for The two other brethren also reli at great variance, and wars together to aid the other named Alexander, called in to aide him the Realme of Macedo, Demetrius and Parrhus, the one out of the Realme of Epirvs, and the other out of Pelopon-after the NEBVS. Pyrrhus came first before Demetrius, and kept agreat part of MACEDON for recom- death of pence of his paines, coming to aide him at his defire: fo that he became a dreadfull neighbour vnto Alexander himselfe, that had sent for him into his countrey. Furthermore, when he was and alexaduertifed that Demetrius did presently vpon the receipt of his letters, set forward with al his army to come to aide him, the yong Prince Alexander was twice as much more amazed and afraid, for the great estate and estimation of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithstanding, and Demetrius received him at a place called DE10N, and there imbraced and welcomed him. But immediatly after, he told him that his affaires were now in so good estate, that praised be the gods he wiles beshould not now need his presence to aide him. After these words the one began to mistrust the other. So it chanced one day, that as Demetrius went to Alexanders lodging where the feast was Demetrius. Hhhh prepared, there came one to him to tell him of an ambush that was laid for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he should thinke to be merrie at the banket. But Demetrius was nothing abashed at the newes, and onely went a little softlier, not making such hast as he did before, and in the meane time fent to command his Captaines to armetheir men, and to have them in readinesse; and willed his gentlemen and all the rest of his officers that were about him (which were a greater number by many then those of Alexanders side) cuery man of them to go in with him into the hall, and to tarie there till he arose from the table. By this meanes the men whom Alexander had appointed to affault him, durst not, being afraid of the great trainche had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius faining that he was not well at eafe at that time to make merry, he went immediatly out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him beleeue that he had certaine newes brought him of great importance; and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no longer keepe him company, for that he was driven of necessity to depart from him; and that another time they would meete together, with better leifure and liberty. Alexander was very glad to fee that Demetrius went his way out of Mac E-DON not offended, but of his owne good will: whereupon he brought him into THESSALIE, and when they were come to the city of LARISSA, they began againe to feast one another, to intrap each other: the which offered Denetrius occasion to haue Alexander in his hand as he would wish himselfe. For Alexander of purpose would not have his guard about him, fearing lest thereby he should teach Demetrius also to stand upon his guard. Thus Alexander turned his practife for another, vpon himselse: and he was determined not to suffer Demetrius to scape his hands, if he once againe came within danger. So Alexander being bidden to supper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius riling from the boord in the middest of supper, Alexander rose also, being afraid of that strange manner, and followed him soote by soote to the very doore. Then Demessias faid but to his warders at the gate, Kill him that followeth me. With those words he went our of the dores, and Alexander that followed him was slaine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to rescue him: of the which, one of them as they killed him said, that Demetrize had preuented them but one day. All that night (as it is no other likely) was full of vprore and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the Macedonians being maruelloufly troubled and afraid of Demetrius great power, when they faw that no man came to affaile them, but that Demetrius in contrarie manner fent vnto them to tell them that he would speake wich them, and deliuer them reason for that he had done: then they all began to be boild againe, and willingly gaue him audience. Now Demetrius needed not to vse many words, nor to make any long Orations, to win them vnto him: for, because they hated Antipater, as a horrible manqueller and murtherer of his mother, and because they had no better man to preferre, they easily chose Demetrius king of MACEDON, and thereupon brought him backe into MACEDON, to take possession of the kingdome. This change was not misliked of the other MACEDONIANS that remained at home in their country, for that they yet remembred the traiterous and wicked fact of Cassander against Alexander the Great: for which canse they veterly hated & detelled all his issue & posterity. And furthermore, if there were any sparke of remebrance in their hearts, of the bounty and goodnesse of their grandfather Antipater, Demetrius received the fruit and benefit, for his wife Philaes fake; by whom he had a fon that should succeed him in the kingdome, and was a proper youth, in campe with his father. Demetrius having this great good hap and fortune come vnto him, he received newes also that Ptolomy had not onely raised his fiege from the city of SALAMINA where he kept his mother & children straightly besieged: but further, that he had done them great honor, and bestowed great gifts vpon them. On theother fide also he was aduertised, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before bene maried vnto Seleucus, was now maried againe vnto Antiochus, the fonne of the faid Seleucus, and how that she was crowned Queene of all the barbarous nations inhabiting in the high provinces of Asia: and that came to passe in this maner. It chanced that this yong Prince Antiochus (as ione ouercometh all men) became in loue with his mother in law Stratonice, who already had a fonne by Selencus his father. She being yong and paffing faire, he was fo rauished with her, that though he proued all the wayes possible to master his furie and passion that way, yet he was still the weaker. So that in the end, condemning himselfe to death because he found his desire abhominable, his passion incurable, and his reason vtterly ouercome, he resolued to kill himselfe by litle and litle, with abstinence from meate and drinke, and made no other reckoning to remedie his griefe, faining to have some secret inward disease in his bodie. Yet could he not so finely cloake it, but that Erafifiratus the Phyfitian eafily found his griefe, that loue, not ficknesse, was Erafifiratus his infirmitie: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in loue. Erafistratus to veleucus, being earnestly bent to find out the partie he loued, he sate by this yong Prince alday long in his chamber; & when any faire yong boy or wife came to fee him, he earneftly looked Antiochus in the face, and carefully observed all the parts of the body, and outward movings, which do commonly betray the fecret passions and affections of the mind. So having marked him diverse times, that whe others came to fee him, what focuer they were, he still remained in one felf state. and that when Stratonice his nother in law came alone or in company of her husband Seleucus to vifite him, he commonly perceived those fignes in him, which Sappho writeth to be in lovers berb fig. (to wir, that his words and speech did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes still rolled to an eare, to and fro, and then a fudden fweat would take him, his pulse would beat fast and rise high, & in the yong prince end, that after the force & power of his heart had failed him, & shewed althese signes, he became Antiothus like a man in an extafie & trance, and white as a kercher:) he then gathering a true coniecture by but these so manifest signes and declarations, that it was only Stratonice whom this yong Prince sancied and the which he forced himselfe to keepe secret to the death, thought that to bewray it to figures and the king it would offend him much, but yettrusting to his great affection & fatherly louche bare tokens of a to his fonce, he ventured one day to tell him, that his fonces ficknesses was no other but love, and latter. withell, that his loue was impossible to be enjoyed, and therfore that he must of necessity die for it was incurable. Seleucus was cold at the heart to heare these newes: so he asked him, What, is he incurable: Yea, Sir, answered the Physician, because he is in love with my wife. Then replied Seleneus againe; Alas Erafifiratus, I have alwaies loved thee as one of my deareft friends, and wouldefithou not now do me this pleasure, to let my son many thy wife, sith thou knowest it well that I have no moe formes but he and that I fee he is but cast away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not do it your felfe, faid Brafistratus, if he were in love with Stratonice. O, faid Selencusto him again, that it were the wil of the gods, fome god or man could turne his love that way: for mine owne part, I would not onely leave him the thing he loued, but I would give my kingdome also to faue his life. Then Erafifiratus feeing that the king spake the word from his heart, & with abundance of teares, he took him by the right hand, & told him plainly, your grace necdethnot Erafifranis helpe in this. For being father, husband, and king, your felfe also may only bethe Phyfitian, to cure your fons difease. When Selenons heard that, he called an affembly of the people, and declared before them all, that he was determined to crowne his fon Antiochas king of the high provinces of Asia, and Stratonice Queene, to marry them together: and that he was Seleucus perswaded, that his son (who had alwaies shewed himselfe obedient to his fathers will) would business not disobey him in this mariage. And as for Stratonice, if she misliked this mariage, & would not ansieting. consent vnto it because it was no comon matter, then he praied that his friends would persuade her, the fhould think all good and comely that thould pleafe the king; and with all that concerned the generall benefit of the realme and commonwealth. Hercupon Antiochus and Stratonice were maried together. But now to return againe to history of Demetrius Demetrius came by hing. dome of MACEDON & THESSALY by this meanes as you have heard, & did moreover possesses the best part of Peloponnesvs, & on this side the streight, the cities of Megara & Athens. Furthermore heled his army against the Bobotians, who were at the first willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus king of Sparta was come into the city of THEEES with his army, the BOEOTIAN'S encouraged by the faire words & allurement of one Pilis, borne in the city of THESPIS (who at that time bare al the Iway & chiefe authority among (Ithe) they gaue vp their treaty of peace they had begun with Demetrius, & determined to make war. Thereupon Demetrins Went to befrege the city of THERES, & laid his enfignes of battery vnto it in fo much as Cleonymus for feare, stole secretly out of the city. Thereupon the Thebans being also afraid, yeelded themselves vnto Demetrius mercy; who putting great garrisons into the cities, The elay and having leavied a great summe of money of the province, left them Hieronymus the historio- gelded rn. grapher, his Lieutenant and gouernor there. So it appeared that he vied them very courteoufly, to Demeand did them many pleasures, and specially vnto Pisis. For when he had taken him prisoner, he Hierontomus did him no hurt, but received him very courteoufly, and vfed him well: and furthermore, he distributions made him Polemarchus (to wit, campe-master) in the city of The spis. Shortly after these grapher, things were thus brought to paffe, king Lysimachus by chance was taken by another barbarous Lieutenant,

Prince, called Dromichetes. Therupon Demetrius, to take fuch a noble occasion offered him, wene with a great army to inuade the country of THRACIA, supposing he should find no man to with. ffand him, but that he might conquer it at his pleasure. Howbeit, so soone as Demetrius back was turned, the Boeotians revolted againe from him, & therwithall newes was brought him, that Lysimachus was deliuered out of prison. Then he returned backe with all speed, maruellously offended with the Borotians, whom he found already discomfitted in battell by his son Antigonns, and went againe to lay siege to the city of THEBES, being the chiefe city of all that prouince of Bosotia. But at that present time, Pyrrhus came and forraged all Thessaly, and entred euento the straight of THERMOPILES. Therefore Demetring was constrained to leaue his fonne to continue the fiege at THEBES, whilest he himselfe went against Pyrrbus, who suddenly returned againe into his Realme. So Demetrius lest 10000 footmen, & 1000 horsemen in THES-SALY to defend the country, and returned with the rest of his army to win THERES. Therupon he brought his great engine of battery called Elepolis, against the wal, as you have heard before, the which was thrust forward by litle and litle, with great labor, by reason of the weight & heauines of it: so that it could scant be driven forward two surlongs in two moneths. But the Boso-TIAN'S and the THEEAN'S did valiantly defend themselues: & Demetrius of a malicious mind & desire of reuenge(more oftner then needfull, or to any purpose) compelled his mento go to the assault, and to hazard themselues: so that there were daily a great number of them slaine. Artigonus his son perceiuing it: Alas, said he, why do we thus suffer our men to be slaine and cast away to no purpose: Wherfore Demetrius angrily answered him againe: What needest thou to caree is there any * corne to be distributed to those that are dead? But notwithstanding, because men should not thinke he still meant to put others in danger, & durst not venture himselfe, he fought with them, til at length he was shot through the necke with a sharpe arrow-head, that was shot at him from the wall. Wherewithall he fell very ficke, but yet raifed not his fiege, nor remoued his campe, but took the city of THEBES againe by affault: the which being not long before againe replenished with people, was inten yeares spacetwise won & taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a maruellous feare, by his cruell threats he gaue them at his coming in to THEBES: fo that they looked to have received the extremest punishment the vanquished could have, through the iust wrath and anger of the conquerour. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirteene of themto death, and banished some, he pardoned al the rest. About that time fell out the celebration of the feast called Pythia, in the honor of Apollo: and because the Atolians kept all the high waies to bring them vnto the city of DELPHES, in the which of old time they did vie to celebrate those tports aforesaid, he caused them to be kept and solemnized at ATHENS, as in a place where this god in reason should be best honored & reuerenced, because he was patron of the city, & forthat the ATHENIANS maintained that he was their progenitor. Frothence he returned into Mace-DON, & knowing that it was against his nature to line idly, & in peace, & seeing on the other side also that the Macedonians did him more service, and were more obedient to him in wars,& that in time of peace they grew feditious, full of vanity and quarrels, he went to make war with y ÆTOLIANS: & after he had spoiled & destroyed their country, he left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there, with a great part of his army. Demetrius himselfe went in the meane time with the rest of his army against Pyrrhus, & Pyrrhus also against him ; but they missed of meeting each with other. Wherupon Demetrius passed further vnto the Realme of Epiros, the which he spoiled & forraged. Pyrrhus on the other fide went on fo far that he met with Pantauchus, Demetrius Lieutenat, with who he fought a battell, & came to the fword with him: so that he did both hurt him, and was also hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the vpper hand, put Pantauchus to flight, & flue a great number of his men, and tooke 5000 prisoners: the which was the chiefe ouerthrow of Demetrins, For Pyrrhus wan not the Macedonians ill will fo much for the mischieues and hurts he had done vnto the, as he got himself great fame & renowne with the, because himselfe alone had with his own hands done all the noble exploits of war in that iourny: for the which he was afterwards had in great estimation among the MACE DONIANS. Now many of them began to fay, that he was the only king of al others, in whom the lively image of the hardines & valiatnesse of Alexander the Great was to be seene: & that all the rest (but specially Demetrius) did but counterfeit his grauity & Princely countenance, like players vp6 a stage, that would counterfeit his countenance & gesture. And to say truly, there was much finenesse & curiosity about Demetrins, to make him a playing stocke in common playes. For some say, that he did not only weare

a great hat with his diademe vpon his head, and was apparelled in purple gownes imbrodered with gold: but also that he did vie to weare certaine wollen shooes on his feete died in purple colour, not woue, but fashioned together like a felt, & guilt vpon it. And Furthermore, he had long hefore caused a cloake to be made of a maruellous rich & sumptuous peece of worke. For youn it was drawn the figure of the world, with flars & circles of headen, the which was not through-It was drawning in Garcon the world, with the second as never king of Macedon after him that durft weare it: albeit there were many proud and arrogant kings that succeeded him. Now the with the MACEDONIANS were not only fory, & offended to fee fuch things as they were not wont to be figure of acquainted withall: but they much more misliked his curious maner of life, and specially because he was ill to come to, & worse to be spoken with. For he gaue no audience, or if he did, he was very rough, & would sharply take them vp that had to do with him. As, he kept the Ambasfadors of the Athenians two yeares, and would give the no answer & yet made as though he loued them better then any other people of GRECE. Another time also he was offended, because VLACED EMONIANS had fent but one man only Ambassador vnto him, taking it that they had doncitin despite of him. And so did the Ambatsador of the LACED EMONIAN'S answer him verygallantly, after the LACONIAN maner. For when Demetrius asked him, how chanceth it that v LACED EMONIANS do send but one man vnto me? No more but one, said he, ô king, vnto one. The plaine On a time he came abroad more plainly & popular like, then he was wont to do: wherby he put answer of the people in good hope that they might the cafilier speake with him, and that he would more the Ambascurreously heare their complaints. Therupon many came, and put vp their humble supplications Sparta, ruto and bils of petition vnto him. He received them, and put them vp in the lap of his cloake. The Demotrius. poore futers were glad of that, and waited vpon him at his heeles, hoping they should quickly be dispatched: but whe he was voon the bridge of the river of Axius, he opened his cloake, and cast with f. them all into the river. This went to the hearts of the Macedonians, who then thought they wereno more gouerned by a king, but oppressed by atyrant; and it grieued them so much the more, because they did yet remember (either for that they had seene themselves, or otherwise heard their forefathers fay) how courteous king Philip was in all flich matters, and how that one day as he paffed through the freet, a poore old woman pluckthim by the gowne, and effoones humbly befought him to heare her, but he answered her he was not then at leisure. Whereupon himseourse. the poore woman plainly cried out to him, Leaue thento be king. This word fo needed him, and the bold he tooke fuch a conceit of it, that he returned prefently to his pallace, and fetting all other mattersapart, did nothing else many daies but gaue himselse to heare all sutes, and began with this poore old woman. For truly nothing becometh a Prince better, then to minister instices for Mars Public (as Timetheus faith) fignifieth force, and is a tyrant: but inflice and law, according to Pindarus, is The chie-Queene of all the world. Moreouer, the wife Poet Homer faith not that Princes and Kings have felf office of received the custody of engines, and of munition, neither also strong & mighty ships of lipiter, a king. to keepe them to destroy townes withall; but with them to maintaine law & instice. And therefore he calleth northe cruell and bloudy king, but the inft & mercifull Prince, Jupiters friend and scholer. And Demetrius boasted that he had a name and title cotrary to Inpiter, whom they called Policus, or Poliouchos, fignifying protector and preferuer of cities: and that he was called Poliorcetes, a Fort-gainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, and vice preferred for vertue: because he Demerius could not differn the truth from falshood, which turned his iniuftice to glory, & iniquity to honor. But now to returne where we left: Demetrius fell into a great and dangerous ficknesse in the city of Pella, during which time he almost lost all Macedon, by a sudden inuasion Pyrrbus made, who in maner rode it all ouer, and came as farre as the city of Edessa. Howbeit so sone as he recoucred health againe, he easily draue him out, and afterwards made peace with him, because he would not fighting with him (whom he should have daily at his doores still skirmifling fometime here, fometime there) lose the oportunity, and weaken himselfe to bring that to passe which he had determined. For he had no small matters in his head, but thought to recouer all the Realmeshis father had; and befides, the preparation he made was no leffe fufficient then the purpose of such an imagination required. For he had leauied & assembled an army of source Demotrius fcore and eighteene thousand footmen: and vnto them he had also well neare 12000 horsemen, preparation & had befieles gotten aboue 500 ships together, which were built part in the hauen of PIR EVS, for there part at Corinth, part in the city of Chalcis, and partabout Pella. He himselfe in person, bis Realine went through their worke-houses, and shewed the artificers how they should make them, and agains. Hhhhh3

did helpe to deuise them: so that every man wondered not only at his infinite preparation, but at the greatnesse and sumptuousnesse of his works. For at that time there was no man lining thateuer saw agalley of fifteene or sixteene bankes of oares. But this is true, that afterwards Ptolomy, furnamed Philapater, built a galley of fortie bankes of oares, the which was 280 cubits long, and from the keele in height to the top of the poope, 48 cubits: and to looke to the tackle and guide her, did require 400 mariners, and 4000 watermen to row her, and befides all that, she could yet cary about the hatches, wel-neare 3000 fighting men. Howbeit this galley neuer ferued to other purpose but for shew, and was like to a house that neuer stirred; and it was neuer remoued out of the place where it was built but with maruellous ado, and great danger, more to make men wonder at, then for any seruice or commodity it could be imployed vnto. But now the beauty of Demetrius ships did nothing hinder their swiftnesse & goodnesse for fight, neither did the huge. nesse of their building take away the vse of them; but their swiftnesse and nimblenesse described more commendation, then their sumptuousnesse and statelinesse. Thus as this great power and preparation was in hand, being fuch as neuer king before fince the time of Alexander the Great) had affembled a greater to inuade As 1A, these three kings, Ptolomy, Selencus, and Lysimachus, did all ioyne together against him. And afterwards also, they sent Ambassadors vnto Pyrrhus in the name of them all, to draw him to their fide, alluring him to come into Macedon, perfivading him not to repose any trust in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make account of it as a good and fure peace : for, they faid that Demetrius did not give him pledge that he would neuer make warre with him, but rather first tooke oportunity himselfe to make warre with whom he thought good. Pyrrhus confidering fo much, and finding their words true, there rofe a sharpe and cruell warre on enery side against Demetrius, who tracted him, and stayed yet to begin. For at one selfe time, Piolomic with a great fleere of ships came downe into GRECE, and made all GRECE revolt from him and Lylimachus allo on THRACIAES fide, and Pyrrhus vpon the borders of Epirvs, confining with the realme of Macedon, they entred with a great army, and spoiled and sacked all as they went. Thereupon Demetrius leaving his son Antigonus in GRECE, he returned with all possible speed into Macedon, to go first against Lysimachus. But as he was preparing to go against him, newes were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the city of BERBHOEA. This newes being blowne abroad amongst the Macedonians, all Demetrius doings were turned top sieturuie. For all his campe was straight full of teares and complaints, and his men began openly to shew their anger against him, speaking all the ill they could of him, so that they would tary no longer, but enery one prayed leane to depart, pretending to looke to their businesseathome, but in truth to go and yeeld theinselves vnto Lysimachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it best for him to get him as far from Lysimachus as he could, and to bendall his armic against Pyrrhus: because the other was their countreyman, and familiarly knowne among the most of them, for that they had served rogether under Alexander the Great, and that as he thought, the Macedonians would not preferre Pyrrhus a stranger, before him. But there his iudgement failed him: for as soone as Pyrrbus had pitched his campe hard by him, the Mace-DON IANS that had euer loued valiantnes, and had of ancient time efteemed him worthier to be king that was the best soldier and valiantest in the field; and furthermore had heard the report of his great clemency and courtefie he had shewed to the prisoners he had taken: they having had goodwill of long time, fought but good occasion to forsake Demetrius, and to yeeld themselves vnto Pyrrbus, or to any other Prince what socuer he were. Then they secretly began to steale away oneafter another, by small companies at the first: but afterwards there rose such a generall tumult against him throughout all the campe, that some of them were so desperate to go into his tent to bid him flie, and faue himselse, because the Macedonians were too wearie with fighting for his curiofity. And yet Demetrius found these words more gentle, and modest, in respect of the vile and cruell words which others gave him. So he went into his tent, and cast a blacke cloake about his face, in stead of his rich and stately cloake he was wont to weare, not like vnto a king, but like a common player when the play is done; and then secretly stole away. When this was knowne in the campe, many of his fouldiers ran to his tent to rifle it, and cuery man tooke fuch hold of it to have his part, that they tare it in peeces, and drew their swords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus comming in the middest of the tumult, pacified this stirre, and presently without blow giuen, wan all Demetrius campe: and afterwards he deuided the Realme of Mace Don with Lysimachus, in the which Demesrius had quietly reigned the space of seuen yeares. Now Demetrius

Demetrius ar ay for a. and goeth

Demetrius being thus miserably ouerthrowne, and turned out of his realme, he fied vnto the city of CASSANDRIA. There he found his wife Phila, who tooke it maruellous heavily, and could notabide to fee him againe a private man, driven out of his kingdome, and the most miserable king that euer was of all other. Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, and detefling the fortune of her husband, the being more constant in calamitie then in prosperity, killed Phila, Deher selfe with poy son she tooke. Demetrius went from thence into GRECE, purposing to gather metrius together the rest of his shipwracks: and there assembled all his Captains and friends that he had. Soit seemeth to me, the comparison Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the Tragedies of selfe. Sophocles, in these verses:

Demetrius firange fore

My state doth turne continually about on Fortunes wheele, Whose double dealing diverse times enforc't I am to feele: Resembling right the Moone whose face abideth at no stay Two nights together but doth change in shape from day to day. At first sherifeth (mall with hornes; and as in age she growes, With fuller cheekes and bigger light a greater face the thewes. And when she cometh to the full, and shineth faire and bright, Among the goodly glistering stars the goodliest in the night: She fades and fals away againe, and runnes a counter-pace, Vntill she have foregone the light, and figure of her face.

This comparison might (I say) much better be applied vnto Demetrius fortune, to his rising and falling, and to his ouerthrow and reliefe againe. For when every man thought his force & power vtterly ouerthrowne, then began he to rife againe by repaire of foldiers, which by litle and litle came vnto him, and straight reuiued him with good hope. This was the first time that he was euer feene meanely apparelled, like a private man vp and downe the country, without fome shew ortokens of a king. And there was one that feeing him in this estate at THEBES, pleasantly applied these verses of Eurypides vnto him:

Of god immortall now become a mortall wight:

Ismênus bankes and Dirces streames he haunteth in our sight.

Now when he began to have fome hope againe, and was (as it were) entred into the great high buspingle. way of kings, and had gotten foldiers about him, which made a body and thew of royall power, hereftored the THEBANS their liberty and government againe. But the ATHENIANS once more revolted from him, and did revoke the dignity and Priesthood of Diphilus, who had bene that yeare created Priest of the fautours, in stead of the Gouernour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we have told you before; and made a law, that from thenceforth the ancient and common Gouernours of their city should be restored against to their ancient maner: and they fent also into MACEDON vnto king Pyrrhus, rather to terrifie Demetrius (whom they faw begin to rife againe) then for any hope they had he would come and helpe them. Howbeit Demotrius came against them with great fury, and did straightly besiege the city of ATHENS. Then the ATHENTAN'S fent Crates the Philosopher to him, (aman of great estimation & authority,) who fo handled him, partly by intreatic, and partly also through his wife perswasions and delinerate counfels he gaughing for his profit, that Demetrius prefently raifed his fiege. Wherefore, after Aidis from he had gathered together fo many ships as were left him, and had imbarked twelue thousand Demotrius footmen, and a small number of horsemen, he presently tooke sea, and failed towards As 1A, meaning to take the provinces of Caria and Lydia from Lyfinachus, and to make them to rebell against him. There Euridice, sister to his wife Phila, received him by the city of MILETVM, having with her one of Ptolomies daughters and hers, called Ptolemeide; the which had bene afore affianced to him by Seleucus meanes. So he maried Prolemaide there, with the good will and Prolemaide. consent of her mother Euridice. After his mariage he presently went into the field againe, and did fet forwards to winne fome cities, whereof many willingly received him, and others he tooke by force. Amongs them he tooke the city of Sandis, whither came diverse Captaines vnto him of king Lysimachus, who ycelded themselues, and brought him a great number of men and much money befides. But Demetrius receiving advertisement that Agathocles, Lysimachus fonne, followed him with a great army, he went thence into Phryota, making account, and also hoping, that if he could win Ar MENIA, he might easily make MEDIA rebell, & then that he would fee if he could conquer the high provinces of Asia, where he might have many places Hhhhh4

Demetrius troubles in of refuge, if fortune turned against him. Agathocles followed him very nearc, and yet skirmish. ing diverse times with him, Demetrius alway had the better: howbeit Agathocles did cut off his victuals from him eucry way, and kept him at fuch a streight, that his men durst no more stray from the campe to forrage: wherefore they fustained great want of victuals, and then began his men to be afraid, and to mistrust that he would make them follow him into ARMENIA and ME-DIA. The famine daily increased more and more in his army, and it chanced besides, that mis fing his way, and failing to gage the foord well as he passed ouer the river of Lycus, the fury and force of the river caried his men downe the streame, and drowned a great number of them; and yetnotwithstanding these great troubles, they mocked him besides. For one wrote at the entrie and coming in to his tent, the first verse of the Tragedy of Oedipus Colonian, written by Sophocles, changing onely fome word:

Thou impe of old and blind Antigonus, To what a point hast thou now caried vs? But in the end, the plague began also in the middest of this famine (a common thing, and almost a matter of necessity it should be so) because that men being driven to need and necessity, doe framethemselues to eate all that comes to hand; whereupon he was driven to bring backethose few men that remained, having loft of all forts (good and bad) not fo few as eight thousandfully told. When he came into the province of TARSVS, he commanded his men in no cafe to meddle with any thing, because the countrey was subject vnto king Selencus, whom he would in no wife displease. But when he saw it was impossible to stay his men being now brought to fuch extremity and need, and that Agathoeles had bard up the streights and passages of mount Taurus against him, he wrote a letter vnto Seleucus, first declaring his miserable state & hard fortune: and then presenting his humble petition and request vnto him, prayed him to take pitie vpon his friend, whom spitefull fortune had throwne into such miserie and calamity that could not but moue his greatest enemies to have compassion of him. These letters somewhat softened Seleucus heart, infomuch that he wrote to his Gouernours and Lieutenants of those parts, to furnish Demetrius person with all things needfull for a Princes house, and victuals sufficient to maintaine his men. But one Patrocles, a grave wife man accounted, and Seleveus faithfull friend alfo, came to tell him, that the charge to entertaine Demetrius foldiers, was not the greatest fault he made therein, and most to be accounted of: but that he did not wisely looke into his affaires, to fuffer Demetrius to remaine in his country, confidering that he had alway bene a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterprife any matters of great importance; and now he was brought to fuch despaire and extremity, that he had framed his men which were but ranke cowards, (contrarie to their nature) to be most desperate and hardie in greatest dangers. Selenens being moued with these perswasions, presently took his journy into Cilicia with a great army. Demetrius being aftonied with this fodaine change, and dreading fo great an army, got. him to the strongest places of mount Taurus. Then he sent vnto Selencus, first of all to pray him to suffer him to conquer certaine barbarous people thereabours, who lived according to their own lawes, and neuer had king: to the end that he might yet there with safety end the rest of his life and exile, fraying at length in some place where he might be safe. Secondly, if that liked him not, then that it would yet please him to victuall his men for the winter time onely, in the same place where they were, and not to be so hard hearted vnto him as to drive him thence, lacking all needfull things, and fo to put him into the mouth of his most cruell and mortall enemies. But Seleucus mistrusting his demand, sent vnto him that he should winter if he thought good, two moneths, but no more, in the country of CATAONIA, fo he gaue him the chiefest of his friends for hostages: howbeit in the meane time he stopped vp all the waies and passages going from thence into Synia. Demeirius now feeing himselfe kept in of all sides, like a beast to be taken in the toyle, he was driven to trust to his owne strength. Thereupon he overranne the country thereabouts, and so often as it was his chance to have any skirmish or conslict with Scleucus, he had euer the better of him: and fometime also when they draue the armed carts with fithes against him, he ouercame them, and put the rest to slight. Then he draue them away that kept the toppe of the mountaines, and had barred the passages to keepe him that he should not goe into Syria, and so kept them himselse. In fine, sinding his mens hearts lift up againe, and pretily encouraged, his heart also grew so bigge, that he determined to fight a battell with Selenens, and to fer all at fixe and feuen. So that Seleucus was at a straight with himselfe, and wish not what rodo. For he had returned backe the aide which Lysimachus sent vnto him, beca use he was afraid of him, & mistrusted him. On the other side also he durst not fight with Demetrius alone. being afraid to venture himselfe with a desperate man and also mistrusting much his vnconstant Deserate fortune, the which having brought him to great extremity, raifed him vp againe to great prof.

The meane force Demetrius fell into a great ficknesses the which becomes to be found, as the found, as petity. But in the meane space Demetrius fell into a great sicknesse, the which brought his body with very weake and low, and had almost veerly ouerthrowne his affaires. For his soldiers, some of them yeelded themselues to his enemies, and others stole away without leaue, and went where they lifted. Afterwards when he had hardly recoursed his health, and within forty daies space was pretily growneto strength againe, with those few soldiers that remained with him, he seemed to his enemies, that he would go and invade CILICIA: but then suddenly in the night without founding any trumpet, he remoued his campe, and went another way; and having paffed ouer mount Amanus, he spoiled the countrey under it, as farre as the region of CYRRESTI- Amanus ca. But Selencus followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereupon Demetrius fodaincly armed his men, and went out by night to affault Seleucus, and to take him fleeping when he mi- Demerius frusted nothing. So that Selencus knew nothing of his stealing on him, but late enough, vntil that of his real certaine traitors of Demetrius campe that fled before, went quickly to aduertife him, finding him afleepe, and brought him newes of the danger he was in. Then Seleucus in a maze and feare withall, got vp, and founded the alarme; and as he was putting on his hofe and making him ready, he seless by cried out, (speaking to his friends and familiars about him) We have now a cruell & dangerous sight. beast to deale with. Demetrius on the other side perceining by the great stir and noise he heard in the enemies camp, that his enterprise was discouered, he retired againe with speed, and the next morning by breake of day, Seleneus went and offered him battel. Demetrius prepared himselfe to ioune with him, and having given one of his faithfull friends the leading of one of the wings of his army himselfe led the other, and ouerthrew some of his enemies on his side. But Seleucus in the midst of the battell lighted from his horse, and taking his helmet from his head, he tooke a target on his arme, & went to the first rankes of his army, to make himself knowne vnto Demetrius men: perswading them to yeeld themselues vnto him, and to acknowledge in the end, that hehad fo long time deferred to give them battell, rather to faue them, then to ipare Demetrius. Demetrius foldiers hearing him fay fo, they did him humble reuerence, and acknowledging him Demetrius for their king, they all yeelded vnto him. Demetrius having fundry times before proved fo many fookehim, changes and ouerthrowes of fortune, thinking yet to escape this last also, and to passe it ouer, he and resided fled vnto the gates Amanides, which are certain straights of y mount Amanus. There he found themselves certaine litle thick groups, where he determined to fray all hight with certaine gentlemen of his house, and a few other of his houshold servants and officers which had followed him: meaning, freeliften if he could possible to take his way towards the city of CAVNVs, to go to that sea coast, hoping to heare of his ships there. But when it was told him, he had no victuals nor provision left but only to serue him that day, he began then to deuise some other way. At length one of his familiar friends Sofigenes came vnto him, that had foure hundred pecces of gold about him in his girdle. So hoping that with the same money he might flie to the sea, they tooke their way by night directly to the top of the mountaine. But when they perceived that the enemies kept watch there, and that there were great store of fires hard by them, they then despaired to passe any farther, lest they should be seene. So they turned to the selfe same place from whence they came, not all of them, for some of them fled: neither had they that remained also any life in them, as before. So one amongst the rest tooke vpon him to say, that there was no other way to escape, but to put Demetrius into Selencus hands. Demetrius therewithall drew out his fword, & would have flaine him felfe: but his friends about him would not fuffer him, but perfwaded him to yeeld Demerius himselse vnto Selencus. Thereupon he sent vnto Selencus, to tell him that he yeelded himselse vnto him. Selenens was fo joyfull of the newes, that he faid, it was not Demetrius good fortune misselest that faued him, but his owne: who besides many other happie good turnes she had done him, gaue him yet fo honourable occasion and good hap, as to make the world to know his elemencie and courtefie. Thereupon immediatly he called for his Officers of houshold, and commanded them to fet up his richest paulion, & to prepare althings meet to receive him honorably. There was one Appolonides a gentleman in Selencus court, who fometime had bene very familiar with Demetrius: him Seleucus fent immediatly vnto Demetrius, to will him to be of good cheare, and not to be affraid to come vnto the king his master, for he should find him his very good friend.

The death of Denie-Cherrone-

So soone as the kings pleasure was knowne, a few of his Courtiers went at the first to meet him but afterwards, enery man strined who should go meete him first, because they were all in hope that he should presently be much made of, and grow in credit with Selencus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitic into enuie, and gaue occasion also to Demetrius enemies and spitefull men, to turne the kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and dangers, faying, that certainly fo foone as the fouldiers faw him, there would grow great stirre and change in their campe. And therefore, shortly after that Apollonides was comeynro Demetrius, being glad to bring him these good newes, and as others also followed him one after another, bringing him some good newes from Selencus; & that Demetrus himselfe after so great an ouerthrow (although that before he thought it a shamefull part of him to have yeelded his body into his enemies hands) changed his mind at that time, and beganthento grow bold, and to haue good hope to recouer his state againe: behold there came one of Seleucus Captaines called Paufanias, accompanied with a thousand footmen and horsemen in all, who compassed in Demetrius with them, and made the rest depart that were come vnto him before; having charge given him not to bring him to the Court, but to convey him into CHERRONESVS of SYRIA, whither he was brought, & cuer after had a strong garrison about him to keepe him. But otherwife, Selencus fent him officers, mony, and all things else meete for a Princes house; and his ordinary fare was so delicate, that he could wish for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of liberty and pleasure appointed him, both to ride his horse in, and also pleasant walkes. and goodly arbours to walke or fit in, and fine parkes full of beafts where he might hunt: moreoner, the king suffered his owne houshold servants that followed him when he fled, to remaine with him if they would. And furthermore, there daily came some one or other vnto him from Seleucus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that fo foone as Antiochus and Stratonice were come, they would make fome good agreement and peace between them. Demetrius remaining in this state, wrote vnto his son Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieurenants which he had at CORINTH and ATHENS, that they should give no credite to any letters written in his name, though his scale were to them: but that they should keepe the townes they had in charge for his fon Antigonus, and all the rest of his forces, as if he himselfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captinity of his father, he marnellous grieuously tooke his hard fortune, wearing blackes for forrow, & wrote vnto all the other kings, but vnto Scleucus specially, beseeching him to take him as a pledge for his father, & that he was ready to yeeld vp al that he kept, to hauchis fathers liberty. The like request did many cities make vnto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lysmachus: who promised Selencus a great summe of mony to put Demetrius to death. But Seleneus, who of long time had no great fancie to Lysimachus, but rather vtterly despised him, did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wicked request he made vnto him. Wherefore he still delayed time, because he would have Demetrius delivered by his some Antiochus and Stratonices meanes, for that Demetrius should be bound to them for his deliucrie, and for euer should acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning patiently tooke his hard fortune, To did he daily more and more forget the misery he was in. For first of all, he gaue himselfe to riding and hunting, as far as the place gaue him liberty. Then by litle and litle be grew to be very groffe, and to giue ouer such pastimes, and therewithall he fell vnto drunkennesse and dicing: so that in that fort he passed away the most part of his time (as it should seeme) cither to avoide the grieuous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his mind when he was sober; or else vnder colour of drunkennes and eating, to shadow the thoughts he had: or else finding in himselfe that it was that manner of life he had long defired, and that through his vaine ambition and folly till that time he could neuer attaine vnto; greatly turmoyling and troubling himselfe and others, supposing to find in warres, by sea and land, the selicity and delight which he had found in case and idlenesse, when he neither thought of it, nor looked for it. For what better end can cuill and vnaduised kings and princes looke for, of all their troubles, dangers, and warres? who indeed deceine themselues greatly, not onely for that they sollow their pleasure and delights as their chiefest felicity, in stead of vertue and honest life: but also, because that intruth they cannot be mery and take their pleasure as they would. So Demetrius after he had bene shut vp in Cherronesvs three yearestogether, by ease, grossenesse, and drunkennes, fell fick of a disease whereof he died, when he was foure & fiftie yeares old. Therfore was Seleneus greatly blamed, and he himselfe also did much repent him that he so suspected himas he did, and that he followed not Dromichetes curtesie; a barbarous man borne in Thra-CIA, who had fo royally and courteoufly intreated Lysimachus, whom he had taken prisoner in the warres. But yet there was some tragicall pompe in the order of his funerall. For his son An- The fanetigonus vnderstanding that they brought him the ashes of his body, he took sea with all his ships, rale of Deand went to meete them, to receive them in the Ifles: and when he had received them, he fet vo the funerall pot of gold (in the which were his embers) vpon the poope of his Admirall galley. So all the cities and townes whereby they passed or harboured, some of them did put garlands of flowers about the pot, others also sent a number of menthither in mourning apparell, to accompany and honour the conuoy, to the very folemnity of his funerals. In this fort failed all the whole fleet towards the city of Corinth, the pot being plainely seene farre off, standing on the top of the Admirall galley: all the place about it being hanged with purple; and ouer it, the Diademe or royall band; and about it, also were goodly young men armed, which were as Pensioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famousest Mustian in that time, being set hard Xenophantus by it, played a fweet and lamentable fong on the flute, wherewithall the oares keeping stroke mounts. and measure, the found did meete with a gallant grace, as in a control where the mourners doe Gian. knock their breasts at the foot of every verse. But that which most made & people of Corinth to weepe and lament, which ran to the peere, and all along st the shore side to see it, was Antigomus, whom they faw all beblubbered with teares, apparelled as a mourner in blacks. Now after they had brought a wonderfull number of garlands and no legayes, and cast them ypon the funcrall pot, and had solemnized al the honours possible for the funerals at Corinth, Antigonus caried away the pot to burie it in the city of Demetrize the which bare the name of Demetrize that was dead, and was a new city, that had bene replenished with people, and built of little townes which are about Io Loos, Demetrius left two children by his first wife Phila, to wit, Antigonus and Stratonice: and two other fonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one furnamed Demetrius the leane, of a woman of ILLYRIA, & the other, king of the CYRENIANS, of his wife Ptolemaide: policity. and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who lived in Egypt. And it is reported also, that he had another fonne called Corrhebus, by his wife Euridice, and that his posterity reigned by succession from the father to the sonne, vntill the time of Perfers: who was the left king of MACE- Perfern the DON, whom the ROMAINE'S OUCTCAME by P.ulus Amylius, and wan all the realme

NTONIVS grandfather was that famous Orator whom Maringflue because he tooke Syllaes part. His father was another Antenius surna. med*CRETAN, who was not so famous, nor bare any great sway in the commonwealth: howbeit otherwise he was an honest man, and of a very good nature, and specially very liberall in giuing, as appeareth by an act he did. He was not very wealthic, and therefore his wife would not let him vie his liberality and franke nature. One day a friend of his comming to him to pray him to helpe him to fome money, bauing great need, Antonius by chance had no money to give him, but he commanded one of his men to bring him fome water in a filuer bafin; and after hee had brought it him, he washed his beard as though he meant to have shaven it, and then found an arrand for his man to fend him out, and gaue his friend the filuer basin, and bade him get him money with that. Shortly after, there was a great stirre in the house among the servants, seeking our of this filter baffer. Informuch as Antonius feeing his wife maruelloufly offended for it, and that the would examine all her feruants, one after another about it, to know what was become of it, at length he confessed he had given it away, and prayed her to be contented. His wife was Inlia, of the noble house and family of Iulius Casar: who for her vertue and chastitie, was to be compared with the noblest Lady of her time. Marcus Antonius was brought vp vnder her, being maried after her first husbands death, vnto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Gethegus and others, for that he was of Catilines confpiracie against the Commonwealth. And this feemeth to be the original cause and beginning of the cruell and mortall hate Antonius bare vnto Cicero. For Antonius selfe saith, that he would never give him the body of his sather in law to burie him, before his mother went first to intreate Gierroes wife: the which vindoubtedly was a flat lie. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them whom he executed by law. Now Antonius being a faire young man, and in the prime of his youth, he fell acquainted with Curio, whose friendship and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague vnto him. For he was a dissolute man, giuen ouer to all lust and insolencie, who to have Antonius the better at his commandement, trained him on into great follies, and vaine expenses ypon women, in rioting and banquetting: fo that in short time, he brought Antonius into a martiellous great debt, and too great for one of his yeares, to wit, of two hundred and fiftie talents, for all which fumme Cario was lds furctie. His father hearing of it, did put his fonne from him, and forbad him his house.

ANTONIVS.

Then he fell in with Clodins, one of the desperatest and most wicked Tribunes at that time in ROME. Him he followed for a time in his desperate attempts, who bred great stirre & mischiefe in Rome: but at length he for fooke him, being wearie of his rashnesse and folly, or else for that he was afraid of them that were bent against Clodius. Thereupon he left ITALY, and went into GRECE, and there bestowed the most part of his time, somtime in wars, and otherwhile in the findie of eloquence. He vied a maner of phrase in his speech, called Asiaticke, which caried the beft grace and estimation at that time, and was much like to his manners & life; for it was full of oftentation, foolish brauery, and vaine ambition. After he had remained there fome time, Gabinius Proconfull going into Syria, perswaded him to go with him; Antonius told him he would not go as a private man: wherefore Gabinius gave him charge of his horsemen, and so tooke him fratenius with him. So, first of all he sent him against Aristobulus, who had made the IE vv Es to rebell, and wasthe first man himselfethat got up to the wall of a castell of his, and so draue Aristobulus out rader Gaof all his holds: and with those few men he had with him, he ouercame all the IEVVE's infet battell, which were many against one, and put all of them almost to the fivord; and furthermore, ing install tooke Aristobulus himselfe prisoner with his sonne. Afterwards Ptolomy king of Agypr, that had bene driven out of his country, went vnto Gabinius to intreat him to go with his army with him afti against into AGYPT, to puthim again into his kingdome; and promifed him if he would go with him, ten thousand talents. The most part of the Captaines thought it not best to go thither, and Gabinius himselfe made it dainty to enter into this warre, although the couetous fresse of these 10000 talents fluck forcly with him. But Antonius that fought but for oportunity and good occasion to dobling pri attempt great enterprises, and that desired also to gratiste Ptolomies request, he went about to perswade Gabinius to gothis voyage. Now they were more afraid of the way they should go to come to the city of Perverva, then they feared any danger of the war belides: because they were to passe through deepe sands and desert places, where was no fresh water to be had all the marishes through, which are called the marishes Serbonides, which the AGTPTIANS call the exhalations or fume, by the which the giant Typhon breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the ouerflowing of the red fea, which breaketh out under the ground in that place where it is deuided in the narrowest place from the sea on this side. So Antonius was sent before into A Gyp T Antonius with his horfemen, who did not onely win that passage, but also tooke the city of PELVSIVM adding. (which is a great citie) with all the fouldiers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it Gabinus. fafe for all the rest of the army, and the hope of the victory also certaine for his Captaine. Now did the enemies themselves seele the fruites of Antonius courtesie, and the defire he had to winne honour: for when Ptolomy (after he had entred into the city of PELVSIVM) for the malice he bare vnto the city, would have put all the ÆGYPTIANS in it to the fword, Intenius with stood him, and by no meanes would fuffer him to do it. And in all other great battels and skirmifles which they fought, being many in number, Amonius did many noble acts of a valiant and wife Capiaine: but specially in one battell, where he compassed in the enemies behind, giving them the victory that fought in front, whereby he afterwards had fuch honorable reward, as his valiantnesse descrued. So was his great courtesse also much commended of all, the which he curtesse you flewed vnto Archelans: for having bene his very friend, he made warre with him against his will to drebelan while he lined; but after his death he fought for his body, & gaue it honorable burial. For these respects he wan himselfe great same of them of ALEXANDRIA, and he was also thought a worthy man of all the fouldiers in the Romains camp. But befides all this, he had a noble prefence, Actorius and shewed a countenance of one of a noble house; he had a goodly thicke beard, a broad forehead, crooked nofed, and there appeared fuch a manly looke in his countenance, as is commonly feene in Hercules pictures, stamped or grauen in mettall. Now it had bene a speech of old time, The house of that the family of the Aniony were descended from one Anion the son of Hercules, whereof the Aniony the family tooke name. This opinion did Antonins seeke to confirme in all his doings: not only refembling him in the likenesse of his body, as we have said before, but also in the wearing of sules. his garments. For when he would openly shew himselfe abroad before many people, he would alwaies weare his caffockegirt downelow vpon his hippes, with a great fword hanging by his fide, and vpon that, some ill-fauored cloake. Furthermore, things that seeme intollerable in othermen, as to boalt commonly, to ieft with one or other, to drinke like a good fellow with every body, to fit with the fouldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them fouldierlike, it is incredible what wonderfull loueit wan him amongst them. And furthermore, being

giuen to loue, that made him the more defired, and by that meanes he brought many to loue him. For he would further every mans love, and also would not be angry that men should mer. rily tell him of those he loued. But besides all this, that which most procured his rising and advancement, was his liberality, who gaue all to the fouldiers, and kept nothing for himfelfe. and when he was growne to great credite, then was his authority and power also very great, the which notwithstanding himselfe did ouerthrow by a thousand other faults he had. In this place I will shew you one example only of his wonderfull liberality. He commanded one day his cofferer that kept his mony, to give a friend of his five audtwenty Myriades, which the Romaines call in their tongue, Decies. His cofferer maruelling at it, and being angry withall in his mind brought him all this money in a heape together, to shew him what a maruellous masse of mo. ny it was. Antonius feeing it as he went by, asked what it was: the cofferer answered him. It was the mony he willed him to give vnto his friend. Then Antonius perceiving the spite of his man, I thought (faid he) that Decies had bene a greater fumme of money then it is, for this is bur atrifle: and therefore he gave his friend as much more another time, but that was afterwards. Now the Romains maintaining two factions at Rome at that time, one against the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate did joyne with Pompey being then in Rom E and the cotrary fide taking part with the people, fent for Cafar to aide them, who made wars in Gay L B: then Curio, Antonius friend, that had changed his garments, and at that time tooke part with Cafar, whose enemy he had bene before, he wanne Antonius; and so handled the matter, partly through the great credit & fway he bare amongst the people, by reason of his eloquent tongue, and partly also by his exceeding expence of money he made which Cafar gaue him: that Ann. nius was chosen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great helpe and furtherance to Cafars practifes. For so soone as Antonius became Tribune, he sid oppose himselfeagainst those things which the Consull Marcellus preferred (who ordained that certaine legions which had bin already leavied and billed, should be given vnto Cneus Pompey, with further commiffion and authority to leavie others vnto them) and fet downe an order, that the fouldiers which were already leauied and affembled, should be fent into Syria for a new supply vito Marcus Bibulus, who made warre at that time against the PARTHIANS. And further, gaue a prohibition that Pompey should leavy no more men, and also that the souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not fuffer C.e fars letters to be received, and openly read in the Senate, Antonius having power and warrant by his person, through the holinesse of his Tribuneship, did reade them openly, and made diverse men change their, minds: for it appeared to them that Cafar by his letters required no vnreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of confideration vnto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey or Cafar should leave their army, there were few of the Senators that thought it meete Pompey should leave his army, but they all in manner commaunded Calar to do it. Then Antonius rifing vp, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Cafar, both, should leaue their armies. Thereupon all the Senators iountly together gaue their whole consent, and with a great crie commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the judgement of the Senate. But the Confuls would not allow of that. Therfore Cafars friends preferred other reasonable demaunds and requests againe, but Cato spake against them: and Lentulus, one of the Confuls draue Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made grieuous curses against him. After that, he tooke a slaues gowne, and speedily fled to Casar, with Quintus Cassius, in a hired coach, When they came to Casar, they cried out with open mouth, that all went hand ouer head at Rome: for the Tribunes of the people might not speake their mindes; and were driven away in great danger of their lives, as many as stood with law and instice. Hercupon Cafar went incontinently into ITALY with his army, which made Cicero fay in his Philippides: That as Hellen was cause of the warre of Troy, so was Antonius the author of the ciuill wars; which indeed was a starke lie. For Cafar was not so fickle headed, nor so casily cariedaway with anger, that he would fo suddenly have gone and made warre with his countrey, vpon the fight onely of Antonius and Casiius, being fled to him in miserable apparell, and in a hired coach, had he not long before determined it with himselfe. But fith indeed Casar looked of long time but for fome colour, this came as he wished, and gaue him inst occasion of warre. But to fay truly, nothing else moved him to make war with all the world as he did, but one selse cause, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus also before him, to wit, an insatiable desire

ANTONIVS. 915 torcigne, with a senslesse couetousnesse to be the best man in the world; the which he could not celars and come vnto before he had first put downe Pompey, and veterly overthrowne him. Now after that bition the Cafar had gotten Rome at his commandement, & had driven Pompey out of ITALY, he purposed of the of the of the of the first to go into Spain against the legions Pompey had there and in the meanetime to make prouisson for ships and marine preparation, to follow Pompey. In his absence, he left Lepidus that was Prætor, gouernor of Rom E and Antonius that was Tribune, he gave him charge of all the fouldiers. & of ITALY. Then was Antonius straight maruellously commended & beloued of the souldiers, because he commonly exercised himself among them, and would oftentimes cate and drink of staly no. with them, and also be liberall vnto them, according to his ability. But then in contrary maner, to Antonius he burchased diversother menseuill wils, because that through negligence he would not doe them inflice that were injured, and dealt very churlifhly with them that had any fuite vnto him; view. and besides all this, he had an ill name to intice mens wives. To conclude, Casars friends that gouerned vnder him, were cause why they hated Casars gouernment (which indeed in respect of himself was no lesse then a tyranny) by reason of the great insolencies and outragious parts that were committed; amongst whom Antonius that was of greatest power, and that also committed greatest faults, described most blame. But Casar notwithstanding, when he returned from v wars of Spain, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put vp against him: but contrarily, because he found him a hardie man, and a valiant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefest affaires, and was no whit deceived in his opinion of him. So he passed over the Ionian sea vnto BRYNDY SIVM, being but flenderly accompanied, and fent vnto Antonius and Gabinius, that they should imbarke their men as sooneas they could, and passe them ouer into Macedon, Gabinius was afraid to take the sea, because it was very rough, and in the wintertime; and therfore fetched agreat compasse about by land. But Antonius fearing some danger might come vnto Casar, becanse he was compassed in with a great number of enemies, first of all he draue away Libo, who rode at anker with a great armie before the hauen of BRVNDVSIVM. For he manned out fuch a number of pinnaces, barkes, and other small boates about euery one of his galleys, that he draue him thence. After that, he imbarked into ships 20000 footmen, and 800 horsemen, and with Antonius this army he hoised saile. When the enemies saw him, they made out to follow him: but the sea rose so high, that the billowes put back their galleys that they could not come neare him, and so my at Brithescaped that danger. But withall he fell vpon therockes with his whole fleete, where the sea dusum, and wrought very high, fo that he was out of all hope to faue himselfe. Yet by good fortune, suddenly the wind turned South-west, and blew from the gulfe, driving the waves of the river into the maine sea. Thus Antonius loofing from the land, and failing with safety at his pleasure, boneafter he saw all the coasts full of shipwracks. For the force and boisterous nesses wind did cast away the galleys that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and splitted, and divers also cast away; and Antonius tooke a great number of them prisoners, with a great fumme of money also. Besides all these, he tooke the city of Lyssys, and brought Cesara great supply of men, and made him couragious, comming at a pinch with so great a power to him. Now there were divers hot skirmishes and encounters, in the which Antonius fought so Antonius valiantly, that he caried the praise from them all:but specially at two seucral times, when C. esars manhoed in menturned their backes, and fled for life. For he stepped beforethem, and compelled them to returne againe to fight: fo that the victory fell on Cafars fide. For this cause he had the second place in the campe among the fouldiers, and they spake of no other man vnto Cafar, but of him: who shewed plainely what opinion he had of him, when at the last battell of PHARSALIA (which indeed was the last triall of all, to give the conquerour the whole Empire of the world) hehimselfe did leade the right wing of his army, and gaue Antonius the leading of the left wing, as the valiantest man and skilfullest fouldier of all those he had about him. After Casar had won led the less the victory, and that he was created Dictator, he followed Pompey steppe by steppe: howbeit, before he named Antonius Generall of the horsemen, and sent him to Rome. The Generall of 41 Phatsa. the horsemen is the second office of dignity, when the Dictator is in the city: but when he is abroad, he is the chiefest man, and almost the onely man that remaineth, and all the other officers and magistrates are put downe, after there is a Dictator chosen. then to make bookes of daily receipt and expence, and perswaded Antonius his friend (who also gaped for a good occasion to please and gratifie the common people) to aide him to passe this law. But Trebellius and Asinius dissiwaded from it all they could possible. So by good hap it chanced that Antonius mistrusted Dolabella for keeping of his wife, and tooke such a conceit of it, that he thrust his wife out of his house, being his cosin germane, and the daughter of C. Antonius. who was Confull with Cicero; and ioyning with Afinius, he refifted Dolabella, and fought with him. Dolahella had gotten the market place, where the people do affemble in councell, and had filled it full of armed men, intending to have this law of the New tables to patle by force. Antonius by commandement of the Senate, who had given him authority to leavie men, and to vie force against Dolabella, went against him, and fought so valiantly, that men were slaine on both fides. But by this meanes he got the ill will of the common people; and on the other fide, the noble men (as Cicero faith) did not onely mislike him, but also hate him for his naughty life for they did abhor his banquets and drunken feasts he made at vnseasonable times, and his extreme wastfull expences vpon vaine light huswines; and then in the day time he would sleepe or walke out his drunkennesse, thinking to weare away the fume of the abundance of wine which heliad taken ouer night. In his house they did nothing but feast, dance, and maske; and himselfe passed away the time in hearing of foolish playes, and in marrying these players, tumblers, iesters, and fuch fort of people. As for proofeher of it is reported, that at Hippias mariage, one of his iefters, he drank wine fo lustily all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the people affembled in councell, who had fent for him, he being quafie stomacked with his surfet he had taken, was compelled to lay vpall before them, and one of his friends held him his gover in stead of a basin. He had another pleasant player called Sergius, that was one of y chiefest men about him, and a woman also called Cytheride, of the same profession, whom he loued dearly; he caried her vp and downe in a litter vnto all the townes he went, and had as many men waiting vpo her litter (she being but a player) as were attending vpon his own mother. It grieued honest men also very much, to see that when he went into the country he caried with him a great number of cupboords full of filuer and gold plate openly in the face of the world, as it had benethe pompe or shew of some triumph: & that eftsoones in the middest of his journy he would set up his hals and tents hard by some greenegroue or pleasant river, & therehis cooks should prepare him a sumptuous dinner. And furthermore, Lions were harnessed in trases to draw his carts; and besides also, in honest mens houses in the cities where hecame, he would have common harlots, curtizans, and these tumbling gillots lodged. Now it grieued men much, to see that Casar should be out of ITALY following of his enemies, to end this great war with such great perill & danger, and that others in the meane time abufing his name and authority, should commit such insolent and outragious parts vpon their citizens. This methinks was the cause that made the conspiracy against Casar increase more and more, and layed the reines of the bridle vpon the souldiers neckes, whereby they durst more boldly commit many extortions, cruckies & robberies. And therfore Cafar after his returne pardoned Dolabella, and being created Confull the thirdtime, he tooke not Intenius, but chose Lepidus his colleague and fellow Confull. Afterwards when Pompeys house was put to openfale, Antonius bought it : but when they asked him mony for it, he made it very strange, and was offended with them, and writeth himselfe that he would not go with Cefar into the warres of Africks, because he was not well recompenced for the service he had done him before. Yet Cafar did somewhat bridle his madnesse and insolencie, not suffering him to passe his faults so lightly away, making as though he saw them not. And therfore he left his dissolute maner of life, and maried Fuluia that was Clodius widow, a woman not so basely minded to spend her time in spinning and housewivery; and was not contented to master her husband at home, but would also rule him in his office abroad, and commanded him that commanded legions and great armies: fo that Cleopatra was to give Falmathankes for that she had taught Antonius this obedience to women, that learned so well to be at their commandement. Now, because Fuluia was somewhat sowre and crooked of condition, Antonius deuised to make her pleasanter, and somewhat better disposed : and therefore he would play her many pretie youthfull parts to make her merry. As he did once, when Cafar returned the last time of all conquerour out of Spaine, every man went out to meete him, and so did Antonius with the rest. But on the sudden there ranne a rumour through ITALIE, that Casar was dead, and that his enemies came againe with a great armie. Thereupon he returned with speed to

 R_{OME} and tooke one of his mens gownes, and fo apparelled came home to his houle in a darke night, faying, that he had brought Fuluia letters from Antonius. So he was let in, and brought to her muffled as he was, for being knowne; but fhe taking the matter heavily, asked him if Antonius were well. Antonius gaue her the letters, and faid neuer a word. So when she had opened the letters, and began to reade them, Antonius ramped on her neck, & kiffed her. We hauetold you this tale for examples fake only, and so could we also tell you of many such like as these. Now when Cafar was returned from his last warre in Spain Ball the chiefest nobility of the city rode many daies journy from Rome to meete him, where C. far made maruellous much of Antonius aboue all the menthat came vnto him. For he alwaies tooke him into his coach with him throughout al ITALY, and behind him Brutus Albinus and Octavius the fonof his Neece, who afterwards was called Cafar, and became Emperor of Rom = long time after. So Cafar being afterwards cliosen Confull the fift time, he immediatly chose Antonius his colleague and companion: & defired by deposing himselfe of his Consulship, to make Dolabella Consuls in his roome, and had already streams, moued it to the Senate. But Antonius did froutly withfrand it, and openly reuiled Dolabella in conjuts. the Senate, and Dolabella also spared him as litle. Thereupon Casar being assamed of the matter. he let it alone. Another time also when Cafar attempted againe to substitute Dolabella Consull in his place, Antonius cried out, that the fignes of the birds were against it: so that at length Cafar was compelled to give him place, and to let Dolabella alone, who was marvelloufly offended with him. Now in truth, Cafar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Celar answered one that did accuse Antonius and Dolabella unto him for some matter of conspiracie: Tush said he, they be not those fat fellowes and fine combed men that I feare, but I mistrust rather these pale and leane men, meaning by Brutus and Casius, who afterwards conspired his death, and flue him. Antonius vnwares afterwards gaue Cefars enemies infloccation and colour surviving todo as they did: as you shall heare. The ROMAINE s by chance celebrated the feast called Lupercalia, and C.ofar being apparelled in his triumphing robe, was fet in the Tribune where they vie to make their Orations to the people, and from thence did behold the fport of the runners. The maner of this running was thus: On that day there are many yong men of noble house, and thosespecially that be chiefe officers for that yeare, who running naked vp & down the city, annointed with the oile of olive, for pleasure do strike them they meet in their way, with white leather though they have in their hands. Antonius being one among therest that was to run, leaving the ancient ceremonies and old customes of that followinity, he ran to the Tribune where Custar was set, & caried a laurell crowne in his hand, having a royall band or diademe wreathed about it, which in old time was the ancient marke and token of a king. When he was come to Cafar, he made his fellow runners with him lift him vp, and so he did put his laurel crowne vpon his head, Antonias fignifying thereby that he had deferued to be king. But Cafar making as though he retufed it turned away his head. The people were foreioyced atit, that they al clapped their hads for ioy, An. dixime tonius againe did put it on his head: Cafar again refused it; and thus they were strining off & on a programming did put his lawel grown with him a few of his following bead. great while rogether. As oft as Antonius did put this laurel crown vnto him, a few of his followers reioyced at it: and as oft also as Casar refused it, all the people together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they suffered all things subjects should do by commandement of their kings; and yet they could not abide the name of a king, detesting it as the vtter destruction of their liberty. C. far in a rage arose out of his seate, and plucking downe the coller of his gown from his necke, he shewed it naked, bidding any man strike off his head that would. This laurell crowne was afterwards put upon the head of one of C. clars statues or images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt off. The people liked his doing therin fo wel, that they waited on him home to his house, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Casar did turne them out of their offices for it. This was a good incoragement for Brutus and Cassus to conspire his death, who fell into a co- Brutus and fort with their trustiest friends, to execute their enterprise, but yet stood doubtfull whether they frie Cesare should make Antonius pring to it or not. Althe rest liked of it, fauing Trebonius only. He toldthe, death. that when they rode to meet Cafar at his returne out of Spaine, Antonius & he alwaies keeping company, and lying together by the way, he felt his mind a far off-but Antonius finding his meaning, would hearken no more vnto it, & yet not with standing neuer made Cefar acquainted with consultation this talke, but had faithfully kept it to himselfe. After that they consulted whether they should about the kill Antonius with Cafar, But Brutus would in no wife confent to it, faying, that venturing on fuch murther of an enterprise as that, for the maintenance of law and instice, it ought to be cleare from al villany. with cefar:

Yet they fearing Antonius power, & the authority of his office, appointed certaine of the confoin racy, that when Cafar were gone into the Senate, & while others shold execute their enterprise they should keep Antonius in a talke out of the Senate house. Euen as they had deuised these marters, so were they executed; and Casar was flaine in the middest of the Senate. Antonius being pur in a feare withall, cast a slaues gowne vpon him, & hid himselfe. But afterwards when it was told him that the murtherers flue no man els, & that they went only into the Capitoll, he fent his son vnto them for a pledge, and bade them boldly come down vpon his word. The felf fame day he did bid Cassius to supper, and Lepidus also bad Brutus. The next morning the Senate was affembled, and Antonius himself preferred a law, that all things past should be forgotten, and that they should appoint provinces vnto Cassius and Brutus: the which the Senate confirmed, and further ordained, that they should cancell none of Cafars lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more praised & better esteemed then euer man was, because it seemed to euery man that he had cut off all occasion of civill wars, & that he had shewed himself a maruellous wise governour of the commonwealth, for the appearing of these matters of so great weight and importance. But now, the opinion he conceiued of himfelfe after he had a little felt the good wil of the people towards him, hoping thereby to make himselfe the chiefest man if he might ouercome Brutus, did cafily make him after his first mind. And therefore when Cafars body was brought to the place where it should be buried, he made a funerall Oration in comendation of Cofar, according to the ancient custome of praising noble men at their funerals. When he saw that the people were very glad & defirous also to heare Cafar spoken of, & his praises vetered, he mingled his Oration with lamentable words; & by amplifying of matters did greatly moue their hearts & affections vnto pitie & compassion. In fine to conclude his Oration, he vnfolded before the whole assembly the bloudy garments of the dead, thrust through in many places with their fwords, & called the malefactors, cruell and curfed murtherers. With thefe words he put the people into fuch a fury, that they presently tooke Casarsbody, and burnt it in the market place, with such tables & formes as they could get together. Then when the fire was kindled, they tooke firebrands, and ran to the murtherers houses to set them on fire, & to make them come out to fight. Brutus therfore & his accomplices, for fafety of their persons were driven to slie the city. Then came all Calars triends vnto Autonius, & specially his wife Calpurnia putting her trust in him, she brought the most part of her mony into his house, which amounted to § sum of 4000 talents; & furthermore brought him all Cafars books and writings, in the which were his memorials of all that he had done & ordained. Antonius did daily mingle with them such as he thought good, & by that means he created new officers, made new Senators, called home some that were banished, and delivered those that were prisoners: and then he faid, that all those things were so appointed and ordained by Cafar. Therefore the ROMAINES mocking them that were so moned, they called them CHARO-NITES, because that whethey were ourcome, they had no other help but to say, that thus they were found in Cafars memorials, who had failed in Charons boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled absolutely also in all other matters, because he was Consull, and Caius one of his brethren Prætor, and Lucius the other, Tribune. Now things remaining in this state at Rome, Octauius Cafar the yonger came to Rom E, who was the fon of Iulius Cafars Neece, as you have heard before, & was left his lawfull heire by will, remaining at the time of the death of his great volle that was flainc, in the city of Apollonia. This yong man at his first arrivall went to salute Antonius, as one of his late dead father Cafars friends, who by his last will and testament had made him his heire:and withall, he was prefently in hand with him for mony and other things which were left of trust in his hands; because Cafar had by will bequeathed vnto the people of Rome threescore and fifteene filuer Drachmaes to be given to every man, the which he as heire stood charged withall. Antonius at the first made no reckoning of him, because he was very yong, and faid, he lacked wit, and good friends to aduife him, if he looked to take fuch a charge in hand, as to vndertake to be Cafars heire. But when Antonius saw that he could not shake him off with those words, and that he was still in hand with him for his fathers goods, but specially for the ready money, then he spake and did what he could against him. And first of all, it was he that did keepe him from being Tribune of the people: and also when Octavius Cafar began to meddle with the dedicating of the chaire of gold, which was prepared by the Senate to honour Cafar with, he threatned to fend him to prison, and moreover defisted not to put the people in an vprore. This young Cafar feeing his doings, went vnto Cicero and others, which were

Antonius enemies, and by them crept into fanour with the Senate: and he himselfe sought the Ottomius peoples good will cuery manner of way gathering together the old fouldiers of the late deceafed C.efar, which were dispersed in diners cities and colonies. Antonius being affraid of it, talked friendship with Octavius in the Capitoll, and became his friend. But the very same night Antonius had a with cuere. frange dreame, who thought that lightning fell ypon him, and burnt his right hand. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cafar lay in waite to kill him. Cafar cleared himselfe vnto him and told him there was no fuch matter: but he could not make Antonius beleeue the contrarie. friends. Whereupon they became further enemies then euer they were: infomuch that both of them drame. made friends of either fide to gather together all the old fouldiers through ITALY, that were difoersed in divers townes: and made them large promises, and soughtalso to win the legions on their fide, which were already in armes. cicero on the other fide being at that time the chiefeft man of authority and estimation in the city, he stirred up all men against Autonius: so that in the end he made the Senate pronounce him an enemy to his country, and appointed young Cafar Anionial Screeants to cary axes before him, and fuch other figns as were incident to the dignity of a Cofull or Prætor: and moreouer, sent Hircius and Pansa, then Confuls, to drive Antonius out of ITA - the Senate. LIE. Thefe two Confuls together with Cafar, who also had an army, went against Antonius that Hirdin and belieged the city of ModenA, and there overthrew him in battell: but both the Confuls were fail. flain there. Antonius flying vpon this ouerthrow, fell into great mifery alatonice but the chiefest Antonius want of alother, & that pinched him most, was famine. Howbeit he was of such a strong nature, energing was famine. that by patience he would ouercome any aductifity, and the heatier fortune lay vpon him, the bythe city more constant showed he himself. Every manthat feeleth want or adversity, knoweth by vertue of Medena. and discretion what he should do:but when indeed they are overlaid, with extremity, and be fore patient in oppreffed, few haue the hearts to follow that which they praife and commend, and much leffe to advertise. anoid that they reproue & mislike: but rather to § contrary, they yeeld to their accustomed eafielife, and through faint heart. & lacke of courage, do change their first mind and purpose. And therefore it was a wonderfull example to the fouldiers, to fee Antonius that was brought vp in al bardnesse in bardnesse in finenefic & superfluity, so easily to drink puddle water, and to cate wild fruits & roots: & more-adversity, over it is reported, that even as they passed the Alpes, they did eate the barkes of trees, and such mounts that a constant of the superfluity. beafts as neuer man tasted of their stell before. Now their intent was to joyne with the legions ding his first beinging up that were on the other fide of the mountains, vnder Lepidus charge: whom Antonius tooke to be his friend, because he had holpen him to many things at Castars hand, through his meanes. When hewas come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him : and when he faw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venter himselfe, and to go vnto Levidu. Since the ouerthrow he had at Modena, he fuffered his beard to grow at length and neuer clipt it, that it was maruellous long, & the haire of his head also without combing and besides al this, he went in a mourning gown, and after this fort came hard to the trenches of Lepides camp. Then he beganto speake vnto the fouldiers, & many of them their hearts yerned for pity to see himfo poorely arrayed, and fome also through his words began to piry him: infomuch that Lepidas began to be affraid, and therefore commanded all the trumpers to found together to ftop the fouldiers eares, that they should not hearken to Autonius. This notwith standing, the fouldiers tooke the more pity of him, and spake secretly with him by Clodius and Lelius meanes, whom they fent vnto him difguifed in womens apparell, and gaue him counfell that he should not be affraid to enter into their camp, for there were a great number of fouldiers that would receiue him, and kill Lepidus, if he would fay the word. Antonins wold not fuffer them to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his army to wade a foord, at a litle river that ran betweene them; and himfelfe was the formost manthat tooke the river to get over, seeing a number of Lepidus campe that gaue him their hands, plucked vp the stakes, and layed slat the bancke of their trench to let him into their camp. drinke lustily with him, and therefore in mockerie was firnamed Cocylon, to wit, a bibber. So o. Etauius Cafar would not leane to Cicero, when he faw that his whole trauell and indeuor was on. ly to restore the commonwealth to her former liberty. Therefore he sent certaine of his friends to Antonins, to make them friends againe: and thereupon all three met together (to wit, Cafar, Antonius, and Lepidus) in an Iland enuironed round about with a litle river, and there remained three daies together. Now as touching all other matters, they were eafily agreed, and did deuide tonius, and all the Empire of Rome betweene them, as if it had bene their owne inheritance. But yetthey could hardly agree whom they would put to death; for enery one of them would kill their enemies, and faue their kinsemen and friends. Yet at length, giving place to their greedy defire to be reuenged of their enemies, they spurned all reuerence of bloud, and holinesse of friendships their feet. For Cefar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius also for sooke Lucius Cefar, who was his vncle by his mother: and both of them together suffered Lepidus to kill his own brother Panlus. Yet some writers affirme, that Cafar and Antonius requested Paulus might be slaine, and that Lepidus was contented with it. In my opinion there was neuer a more horrible, vnnaturall, and crueller change then this was. For thus changing murther for murther, they did as well kill those whom they did for sake and leaue vnto others, as those also which others left vnto them to killbut so much more was their wickednesse and cruelty great vntotheir friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, and having no cause to hate them. After this plot was agreed vpon betweene them, the fouldiers that were thereabouts, would have his friendship & league betwixt them confirmed by mariage, and that Cafar should mary Claudia, the daughter of Fuluia Antonius wife. This mariage also being agreed upon, they condemned 300 of the chiefest citizens of Rome, to be put to death by profeription. And Antonius also comanded the to whom he had given commission to kill Cicero, that they should strike off his head and right hand, with the which he had written the inucctive Orations (called Philippides) against Antonius. So when the murtherers brought him Ciceroes head and hand cut off, he beheld them a long time with greatioy, and laughed hartily, & that oftentimes for the greatioy he felt. Then when he hadtaken his pleasure of the fight of them, he caused them to be set up in an open place, ouer the pulpit for Orations (where when he was aline, he had ofte spoken to the people,) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not blemished his own fortune, shewing himselfe (to his great shame and infamy) a cruell man, and vnworthy the office and authority he bare. His vncle Lucius Cafar alfo, as they fought for him to kill him, & followed him hard, fled vnto his fifter. The murderers coming thither, forcing to breake into her chamber, she stood at her chamber doore with her armes abroad, crying out fill: You shal not kill Lucius Cafar, before you first kill me, that bare your captaine in my wombe. By this meanes she saued her brothers life. Now the gouernment of these Triumuiri grew odious & hatefull to the Romaines, for divers respects; but they most blamed Antonius, because he being elder then Cesar, & of more power and force then Lepidus, gaue himfelf againe to his former riot & excesse, whe he left to deale in the affaires of the comonwealth. But fetting afide the ill name he had for his infolency, he was yet much more hated in respect of the house he dwelt in, the which was the house of Pompey the great: a man as famous for his temperance, modesty, & ciuill life, as for his three triumphs. For it grieued them to see the gates comonly shut against the Captains, Magistrates of the city, & also Ambassadors of strange nations which were fometimes thrust from the gate with violence; and that the house within was full of tumblers, anticke dancers, iuglers, players, iesters, and drunkards, quasfing and guzling; and that on them he bestowed the most part of his mony he got by alkind of possible extortions, bribery & policy. For they did not only fell by the cryer the goods of those whom they had outlawed and appointed to murder, flander oufly deceived the poore widowes & yong orphanes, & also raifed alkinds of imposts, subsidies and taxes: but vnderstanding also that the holy Vestall Nuns had certain goods and mony put in their custody to keep, both of mens in the city, & those also that were abroad, they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Octavius Cafar perceiving that no mony would ferue Antonius turne, he prayed that they might deuide the mony between them, and so did they also denide the army, for them both to go into MACEDON to make war against Brutus and Casius: and in the meane time they left the gouernment of the city of Rome vnto Lepidus. When they had paffed ouer the feas, and that they began to make war, they being both camped by their enemies, to wit, Antonius against Cassius, and Casar against Brutus, Cosar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the vpper hand, and did all. For at the first battell

Cefar was overthrowne by Brutes, and loft his campe, and very hardly faued himselfe by flying The rabate from them that followed him. Howbeithe writeth himselse in his Commentaries, that he fled remiss as before the charge was given, because of a dreame one of his friends had. Antonius on the other gainst Bru. fide ouerthrew Cassus in battel, though some write that he was not there himselfe at the battel. but that he came after the ouerthrow, whileft his men had the enemies in chafe. So Cassius at his The death of earnest request was slaine by a faithfull servant of his own called Pindarus, whom he had infranrhifed: because he knew not in time that Brutus had ouercome Casar; Shortly after they fought another battel againe, in the which Brutus was overthrowne, who afterwards also slue himselfe. Thus Antonins had the chiefest glory of this victory, specially because Casar was sicke at that rime. Antonius having found Bratus body after this battell, blaming him much for the murtheret Brunn flat of his brother Caiul, who he had put to death in MACE DON for revenge of Ciceroes cruel death. bimfly. and vet laying the fault more in Hortensius then in him, he made Hortensius to be flaine on his brothers tombe. Furthermore he cast his coate armor (which was wonderfull rich and sumptu- Antonius ous) vpon Brutus body, and gaue commandement to one of his flaues infranchifed, to defray vcharge of his buriall. But afterwards Antonius hearing that his infranchifed bondman had not mie Brusst burnt his coat-armour with his body because it was very rich, and worth a great summe of money, and that he had also kept backe much of the ready money appointed for his funerall and tombe, he also put him to death. After that, Casar was conveyed to Rome, and it was thought he would not live long, nor escape the ficknessehe had: Antonius on the other fide went towards the East provinces and regions to leavie money; and first of all he went into GR B B C B, and caried an infinite number of foldiers with him. Now, because enery fouldier was promised fine thousand filuer Drachmaes, he was driven of necessity to impose extreme tallages & taxations. At his first coming into GREECE, he was not hard nor bitter vnto the GRECIANS, but gaue himselfe only to heare wife men diffute, to fee playes, & also to note the ceremonies & facrifices of GRBCE, ministring instice to enery man; and it pleased him maruellously to heare themcall him Philellen. Wherfore the MEGARIANS, toexceedy ATHENIANS, thinking to shew An- Greet. tonius a goodly fight, they prayed him to come and fee their Senate house, and councel hall. Antonius went thither to fee it. So whe he had feene it at his pleafure, they asked him: My Lord, how like you our hall. Me thinkes (quoth he)it is litle, old, and ready to fall downe. Furthermore he tooke measure of the temple of Apollo Pythias, and promised the Senate to finish it. But when he was once come into As I A having left Lucius Cenforinus Gouernor in GREECH, and that he had felt the riches and pleasures of the East parts, and that Princes, great Lords, and Kings, came to wait at his gate for his coming out; and that Queenes and Princelles to excell one another, gaue him very rich prefents, and came to fee him, curioufly fetting forth themfelues, and vfing all are that might be to shew their beauty, to win his fauour the more: (Cafar in the meane space turmoiling his wits and body in civill wars at home, Antonius living merily and quietly abroad) he eafily fell again to his old licentious life. For straight, one Anaxerora player of the citherne Xoutus a player of the flute, Metrodorus a tumbler, and Tuch a rabble of ministrels and fit ministers for the pleasures of As IA (who in finenesse & flatteric passed at the other plagues he brought with The plagues him out of ITALY) all these flocked in his court, and bare the whole sway; and after that, all went of nations awry. For enery one gaue themselves to riot and excesse, when they saw he delighted in it; and all Asia was like to the city Sophocles speaketh of in one of his Tragedies:

> Was full of sweet perfumes, and pleasant songs; Wish wofull weeping mingled there amongs.

For in the city of EpHESVS, women attired as they go in the feafts & facrifice of Bacchus, came out to meete him with fuch folemnities and ceremonies, as are then yied: with men and children difguifed like Fawnes and Satyres Moreouer, the city was full of Juie, and darts wreathed about with Iuie, platterions, flutes and howboyes, and in their fongs they called him Bacchus father of mirth, courteous and gentle: and so was he vnto some, but to the most part of men, cruell and extreme. For he robbed Noblemen and Gentlemen of their goods, to give it vnto vile flat- Antonia terers: who oftentimes begged living mens goods, as though they had bene dead, and would enter their houses by force. of their country, boldly faid vnto him : If thou wilt have power to lay two tributes in one years vpon vs. thou shouldest also have power to give vs two Sommers, two Autumnes, and two Har. uests. This was gallantly and pleasantly spoken vnto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleased him well to heare it: but afterwards amplifying his speech, he spake more boldly, and to better purpose: As 1A hath payed thee two hundred thousand talents. If all this mony be not come to the coffers, then ask account of them that leavied it: but if thou have received it, and nothing be left of it, then are we veterly vndone. Hybreas words netled Antonius roundly. For he vnderstood not of the thefts and robberies his officers committed by his authority, in his treasure and affairs:not so much because he was carelesse, as for that he over simply trusted his men in al things. For he was a plaine man, without fubrilty, and therfore ouer late found out the foule faults they committed against him but when he heard of them, he was much offended, and would plainly confesse it vnto them whom his officers had done iniurie vnto by countenance of his authority. He had a noble mind, as well to punish offenders, as to reward well doers: and yet he did exceed more in giuing, then in punishing. Now for his outragious manner of railing he commonly v. fed, mocking and flouring of every man, that was remedied by it felfe: for a man might as boldly exchange a mocke with him, and he was as wel contented to be mocked, as to mocke others. but yet it oftentimes marredall. For he thought that those which told him so plainly and truly in mirth, wold neuer flatter him in good carnest in any matters of weight. But thus he was easily abused by the praises they gaue him, not finding how these flatterers mingled their flatterievnder this familiar & plain maner of speech vnto him, as a fine deuice to make difference of meats with sharpe & tart fauce; and also to keepe him by this frantick leasting & bourding with himse the table, that their common flatterie should not be troublesome vnto him, as men do easily mislike to haue too much of one thing: and that they handled him finely therby, when they would giue him place in any matter of weight, and follow his counsell, that it might not appeare to him they did it so much to please him, but because they were ignorant, and vinderstood not so much as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the last and extremest mischiefe of all other (to wir. the lone of Cleopatra) lighted on him, who did waken and stirvp many vices yet hidden in him. & were neuer seene to any : and if any sparke of goodnesse or hope of rising were left him, Cleapatra quenched it straight, and made it worse then before. The manner how he fell in loue with her was this. Antonius going to make war with the PARTHIANS, sent to command Cleopatrato appeare personally before him when he came into CILICIA, to answer vnto such accusations as were laid against her, being this: that she had aided Cassius and Brutus in their war against him. The messenger sent vnto Cleopatra to make this summons vnto her, was called Dellius, who when he had throughly confidered her beauty, the excellent grace and fweetnesse of her tong, henothing mistrusted that Antonius would do any hurt to so noble a Lady, but rather assured himself, that within few daies she should be ingreat fauour with him. Therupon he did her great honor, and perfwaded her to come into CILICIA, as honourably furnished as she could possible; and bad her not to be affraid at all of Antonius, for he was a more courteous Lord, then any that she had ener feene. Cleopatra on the other fide beleening Dellius words, and gueffing by the former accesse and credit she had with Iulius Casar, and C. Pompey (the son of Pompey the Great) only for her beauty, she began to have good hope that she might more easily win Antonius. For Casarand Pompey knew her when she was but a yong thing, and knew not then what the world meant: but now she went to Antonius at the age when a womans beauty is at the prime, and she also of best iudgement. So she furnished her selfe with a world of gifts, store of gold & silver, and of riches and other sumptuous ornaments, as is credible enough she might bring fro so great a house, and from so wealthy & rich a realme as Æ GYPT was. But yet she caried nothing with her wherin she trusted more then in her selfe, and in the charmes and inchantment of her passing beauty and grace. Therefore when she was sent vnto by diverse letters, both from Antonius himselfe, and also from his friends, she made so light of it, and mocked Antonius so much, that she disdained to set forward otherwise, but to take her barge in the river of Cydnus; the poope whereof was ofgold, the failes of purple, and the oares of filuer, which kept stroke in rowing after the found of the musicke of stutes, howboyes, eithernes, vials, and such other instruments as they played vpon in the barge. And now for the person of her selfe, she was layed under a paulion of cloth of gold of tiffue, apparelled and attired like the goddeffe Venus, commonly drawne in picture: and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretie faire boyes apparelled as Painters do set foorth god Cupid, with little fans in their hands, with the which they fanned wind voon her. Her Ladies and Gentlewomen alfo, the fairest of them were apparelled like the Nimphes Nereides (which are the Myrmaides of the waters) & like the Graces, some stearing the helme, others tending the tackle and ropes of the barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull passing sweet sauour of perfumes, that perfumed the wharfes fide, peftered with innumerable multitudes of people. Some of them followed the barge all along the river fide others also ranne out of the city to see her coming in So that in the end, there ranne fuch multirudes of people one after another to fee her, that Antonius was left post alone in the market place, in his Imperiall seate to give audience: and there went a rumour in the peoples mouthes, that the goddeffe Venus was come to play with the god Bacchus for the generall good of all Asia. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius sent to inuite her to supper to him. But she fent him word againe he should do better rather to come and Suppe with her, Antonius therefore to shew himselfe courteous vnto her at her arrivall, was contented to obey her, and went to support o her: where he found such passing sumptuous fare, that The sump no tongue can expresse it. But amongst all other things, he most wondered at the infinit number of lights and torches hanged on the toppe of the house, giving light in every place, so artificially the suppers fer and ordered by deuices, some round some square: that it was the rarest thing to behold that of Cleopatra eye could discerne, or that euer bookes could mention. The next night, Antonius feasting her, nins. contended to paffe her in magnificence and fineneffe : but she ouercame him in both. So that he himselfe began to scorne the grosse service of his house, in respect of Cleopatraes sumptuousnesse and finenesse. And when Cleopatra found Antonins icasts and flents to be but groffe, and fouldier like, in plaine maner, she gaue it him finely, and without feare taunted him throughly. Now her beauty (as it is reported) was not so passing, as vnmatchable of other women, nor yet such as y- cleepatraes pon present view did enamour men with her: but so sweet was her company and conversation. that a man could not possibly but be taken. And besides her beauty, the good grace she had to talke and discourse, her curteous nature that tempered her words and deeds, was a spur that prickedto the quick. Furthermore, besides all these, her voice and words were maruellous pleasant: forher tong was an instrument of musick to divers sports and pastimes, the which she casily turned into any language that pleased her. She spake vnto few barbarous people by interpreter but made them answer her felf, or at the least the most part of them: as the ÆTHIOPIANS, the ARA-BIANS, the Troglodytes, the HEBREVVES, the Syrians, the MEDES, & the PARTHIANS, &to many others also, whose languages she had learned. Wheras divers of her progenitors, the kings of ÆGYPT, could scarce learne the ÆGYPTIAN tongue only, and many of them forgot to speake the MACEDONIAN. Now Antonius was so rauished with the love of Cleopatra, that though his wife Fuluia had great wars, and much ado with Cafar for his affaires, and that the army of the PARTHIANS (the which the kings Lieutenants had given to the onely leading of Labienus) was now affembled in Mesopotamia, ready to inuade Syria: yet (asthough all this had nothing touched him) he yeelded himselfe to go with Cleopatra vnto ALEXANDRIA, where he spent and loss in childish sports (as a man might say) and idle passimes, the most precious thing a man can spend, (as Antiphon saith) and that is, Time. For they made an order betweenethem, which for pp by they called Amimetobion, (as much to fay, No life comparable and matchable with it) one fea- antonius sting each other by turnes, and in cost, exceeding all measure and reason. And for proofe hereof, Thaue heard my grandfather Lampryas report, that one Philotas a Physitian, borne in the city of Amonius Amphissa, told him, that he was at that present time in Alexandria, and studied Phisicke: and Cleopaand that having acquaintance with one of Antonius cookes, he tooke him with him to Antonius gypt. house, (being a yong man desirous to seethings) to shew him the wonderfull sumptuous charge and preparation of one only supper. When he was in the kitchin, and faw a world of diversities of meats, and amongst others, eight wild bores rosted whole, he began to wonder at it, and said: Eight wild Sure you have a great number of guests to supper. The cooke fell a laughing, and answered him: boares roa-No (quoth he) not many guests, nor aboue twelue in all: but yet all that is boiled or roasted must be served in whole, or esse it would be marred straight; for Antonius peraduenture will sup presently, or it may be a pretie while hence, or likely enough he will deferre it longer, for that he hath drunke well today, or else hath had some other great matters in hand: and therefore we Philitian do not dreffe one supper only, but many suppers, because we are vncertaine of the house he will borne in suppein. Philotas the Physician rold my grandfather this tale, and faid moreouer, that it was Amphissa. his chance shortly after to serve the eldest sonne of the said Antonias, whom he had by his thin sail.

wife Fuluia; and that he fate commonly at his table with his other friends, when he did not dine nor suppe with his father. It chanced one day there came a Physitian that was so full of words that he made every man wearie of him at the boord: but Philotas to stoppe his mouth, put on this subtill proposition to him: It is good in some fort to let a man drinke cold water that hath an ague: But enery man that hath an ague, hath it in some fort: Ergo, it is good for every man that hath an ague to drink cold water. The Physitian was fo grauelled & amated with all that he had not a word more to fay. Yong Antonius burft out into fuch a laughing at him, and was fo glad of it, that he faid vnto him: Philotas, take all that, I giue it thee: shewing him his cupboord full of plate, with great pottes of gold and filuer. Philolas thanked him, and told him he thought him selfe greatly bound to him for this liberality, but he would never have thought that he had had power to hauegiuen fo many things, and offogreat value. But much more he maruelled, when fhortly after one of yong Antonius men brought him home all the pots in a basket, bidding him fet his marke and stampe vponthem, and to lock them vp. Philoias returned the bringer of them fearing to be reproued if he tooke them. Then the young Gentleman Antonius faid vnto him. Alas poore man, why doeft thou make it nice to take them; knoweft thou not that it is the some of Antonius that gives them thee, and is able to do it! if thou wilt not beleeve me, take rather the ready mony they come to: because my father peraduenture may aske for some of the plate. for the anticke & excellent workmanship of them. This I have heard my grandsather tell often. times. But now againeto Cleopatra, Plato writeth that there are four kinds of flatterie: but Cleo. pura deuided it into many kinds. For the (were it in sport, or in matters of earnest) still deuised fundry new delights to have Antonius at commandement, never leaving him night norday, nor once letting him go out of her fight. For the would play at dice with him, drinke with him. and hunt commonly with him, and also be with him when he went to any exercise or activitie of body. And sometime also, when he would go vp and downethe city disguised like a slauein the night, and would peere into poore mens windowes and their shops, and scold and braule with them within the house, Gleopatra would be also in a chamber maides array, and amble vp and downe the fireets with him, so that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mocks and blowes, Now though most men misliked this maner, yet the ALEXANDRIAN'S were commonly glad of this iolitic, and liked it well, saying very gallantly & wifely: that Antonius shewed them a comicall face to wit, a meric countenance; and the Romaines a tragical face, to fay, a grimmelook, But to reckon up all the foolish sports they made, reuelling in this fort, it were too fond a part of me, and therefore I will onely tell you one among the rest. On a time he went to angle for fish, and when he could take none, he was as angrie as could be, because Cleopatra stood by. Whereforc he fecretly commanded the fishermen, that when he cast in his line, they should straight dive under the water, and put a fish on his hooke which they had taken before; and so snatched vp his angling rod, & brought vp a fifth twife or thrife. Cleopatra found it ftraight, yet she seemed not to fee it, but wondered at his excellent fishing: but when she was alone by her selfe among her owne people, she told them how it was, & bad them the next morning to be on the water to feethe fishing. A number of people came to the hauen, and got into the fisher boates to feethis fishing. Antonius then threw in his line, and Cleopatra straight commanded one of her mento dive vnder water before Antonius men, & to put some old salt-fish vpon his bait, like vnto those that are brought out of the country of Pont. When he had hung the fifth on his hooke, Amowins thinking he had taken a fish indeed, snatched vp his line presently. Then they all fell a laughing. Cleopatra laughing alfo, said vnto him: Leaue vs (my Lord) ÆGYPTIANS (which dwell in the country of Pharvs and Canobus) your angling rod: this is not thy profession, thou must hunt after conquering of Realmes and countries. Now Antonius delighting in these fond and childish pastimes, very ill newes were brought him from two places. The first from Roms, that his brother Lucius and Fuluia his wife, fell out first betweene themselues, and afterwards fell to open warre with Cafar, and had brought all to nought, that they were both driven to flie out of ITALY. The second newes, as bad as the first: that Labienus conquered all Asia with the army of the PARTHIANS, from the river of Euphrates, and from Syria, vnto the country of Lydia and Ionia. Then began Intenius with muchado, a litle to rouze himselfe, as if he had bene wakened out of a deepe fleepe, and as a man may fay, coming out of a great drunkenneffe. So, first of all he bent himselfe against the Parthians, and went as farre as the country of Phoe-NICIA: but there he received lamentable letters fro his wife Fuluia. Wherupo he straight returned towards ITALIE, with two hundred faile: and as he went, tooke up his friends by the way that fled out of ITALIE to come to him. By them he was informed, that his wife Fulnia was the only cause of this war, who being of a pecuish, crooked, & troblesome nature, had purposely raifed this vprore in Italie, inhope therby to withdraw him from Cleopatra, But by good fortune his wife Fuluia going to meet with Antonius, fickned by the way, and died in the city of Sier- The death ON E and therefore Octavius Cafar and he were the cafilier made friends againe. For when An of Fuluia. tonius landed in ITALIE, and that men faw Cafar asked nothing of him, and that Antonius on the Antonius other fide laid all the fault and burden on his wife Fuluia: the friends of both parties would not fuffer them to vnrip any old matters, and to proue or defend who had the wrong or right, and who was the first procurer of this war, fearing to make matters worse between them: but they made them friends together, and deuided the Empire of Rome between them, making the fea Ionium the bounds of their division. For they gave all the Pounces Eastward vnto Antonius, press' and the countries Westward vnto Cafar, and left Africke vnto Lipidis: and made a law, that they three, one after another, should make their friends Consuls, when they would not be three the themselves. This seemed to be a found counsell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a straighter Triumwis. bond, which fortune offered thus. There was Offania the eldeft fifter of Cafar, not by one mo- offania the ther, for the came of Ancharia, and Cafar himselfe afterwards of Accia. It is reported, that he dearely loued his fifter Octavia, for indeed she was a noble Ladie, and left the widow of her first husband Caius Marcellus, who died not long before and it feemed also that Anionius had bene widower euerfince the death of his wife Fuluia. For he denied norther he kept Cleopatra, neither which was did he confesse that he had her as his wife: and so with reason he did defend the love he bare vnto this AGYPTIAN Cleopatra. Thereupon enery man did fetforward this mariage hoping there- mother. by that this Lady octania, having an excellent grace, wildome and honefty, joyned vnto fo rare a beauty, when she were with Antonius (he louing her as so worthy a Lady deserueth) fhe should be a good meane to keepe good love and amity betwixt her brother and him. So when G. efar and he had made the match between them, they both went to Rome about this mariage, although it was against the law, that a widow should be maried within ten moneths after Alay at her husbands death. How beit the Senate differifed with the law, and fo the mariage proceeded Rome for accordingly. Sextus Pompeius at that time kept in Sicilia, and so made many an inrode into I- marying of medical sextus Pompeius at that time kept in Sicilia, and so made many an inrode into Iraty with a great number of pinnaces and other pirates shippes, of the which were Captaines Automias two notable pirates, Menas and Menecrates, who fo foured all the fea thereabours, that none meridan durst peepe out with a faile. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had dealt very friendly with Antonius, mis elers for he had courteously received his mother when she fled out of Ir ALY with Fuluia and there- hair fire. forethey thought good to make peace with him. So they met all three together by the mount of Misena, upon a hill that runneth farre into the fea: Pompey having his flippes riding hard by end offer atanker, and Antonius and Cafar their armies vponthe shore side, directly ouer against him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius should have Sicile and Sardinia, with this have mith condition, that he should ridde the sea of all theenes and pirates, and make it safe for passengers, sexual and withall, that he should send a certaine of wheat to Rome of them did seast another, and drew cuts who should begin. It was Pompeius chance to inuite them first. Whereupon Antonius asked him: And where shall we supper. There, faid Pompey, and shewed him his Admirall gallie which had fixe bankes of oares: That (faid he) is my fathers house they have left me. He spake it totaunt Antonius, because he had his fathers house, that was Pompey the Great. So he cast ankers Sextus enow into the fea, to make his gally fast, and then built a bridge of wood to contrey them to his Pembius galley, from the head of mount Mifena: and there he welcomed them, and made them great tauns to cheare. Now in the midft of the feaft, when they fell to be mery with Antonius lone vnto Cleepa. tra, Menas the pirate came to Pompey, and whifpering in his care, faid vnto him: Shall I cut the cables of the ankers, & make thee Lord not only of Sigile & Sardinia, but of the whole Empire Pompting of Rom e befides: Pompey having payfed a while vpon it, at length answered him: Thou shouldest bems off. haue done it, and neuer haue told it me; but now we must content vs with that we haue: as for derival. my selfe, I was never taught to breake my faith, nor to be counted atraitor. The other two also great for did likewise feast him in their camp, & then he returned into Sicile. Antonius after this agreement made, fent Ventidius before into As IA to stay the PARTHIANS, & to keep them they shold faith falls come no further: and he himselse in the meane time, to graitsie Casar, was contented to be cho-resission sen Iulius Cefars priest & facrificer, and so they iointly together dispatched al great matters concerning the state of the Empire. But in all other maner of sports and exercises, wherin they past fed the time away the one with the other, Antonius was ever inferior vnto Cafar, and alway loft which grieucd him much. With Antonius there was a Soothfayer or Aftronomer of ÆGYPT, that could cast a figure, and judge of mens nativities, to tell them what should happen to them. He either to please Cleopatra, or else for that he found it so by his art, told Antonius plainly, that his fortune (which of it felfe was excellent good, and very great) was altogether blemished and obfeured by Calars fortune: and therefore he counselled him vtterly to leave his company, and to get him as far from him as he could. For thy Demon, faid he, (that is to fay, the good angell and fpirit that keepeth thee) is afraid of his and being couragious and high when he is alone, becommeth fearfull and timorous when he cometh neare vnto the other. How focuer it was, the cuents enshing proued the AGYPTIAN's words true: for it is faid, that as often as they two drew cuts for pastime, who shold have any thing, or whether they plaid at dice, Antonius alway lost. Oftetimes when they were disposed to see cock-fight, or quails that were taught to fight one with another. Cafers cocks or quales did euer ouercome. The which spited Antonius in his mind, although he made no outward shew of it and therfore he beleeved the ÆGYPTIAN the better. In fine, herecommended the affaires of his house vnto C.esar, and went out of ITALY with Octavia his wife who he caried into Grece after he had had a daughter by her. So Antonius lying all the winter at ATHENS, news came vnto him of § victories of Ventidius, who had ouercome the PARTHIANS brods king in battell, in thewhich also were flaine Labienus and Pharnabates, the chiefest Captains king Orodes had. For the legood news he feasted all ATHENS, & kept open house for all the GRECIANS. and many games of price were plaid at Athens, of the which he himself wold be judge. Wherfore leauing his guard, his exes, and tokens of his Empireat his house, he came into the slewplace or lifts (where these games were plaid) in a long gown and slippers after the GRECIAN fashion, and they caried tipstanes before him, as Marshals men do carie before the Judges, to make place: and he himselfe in person was a stickler to part the young men, when they had foughtenough. After that, preparing to go to the wars, he made him agarland of the holy Olive, and caried a vessell with him of the water of the fountaine Clepsydra, because of an Oracle he hadreceiued, that so commanded him. In the meane time, Ventidius once againe ouercame Pacorus(0. motable vi- rodes lon, king of PARTHIA) in a battell fought in the country of CYRRESTICA, he being come Gory of the again with a great army to inuade Syria at which battell was flaine a great number of the Par-The death THIANS, and among them Pacorus the kings owne forme. This noble exploit as famous as ever of Paterus, any was, was a full revenge to the ROMAINES of the shame and losse they had received before by the death of Marcus Crassus: and he made the PARTHIANS flie, and glad to keepe themselves within the confines & territories of MESOPOTAMIA & MEDIA, after they had thrice together bene ouercome in seuerall battels. Howbeit Ventidius durst not vndertake to follow them any farther, fearing left he should have gotten Antonius displeasure by it. Notwithstanding he led his armie against them that had rebelled, and conquered them againe: amongst whom he besieged Antiochus king of Commagena, who offered him to give a thousand talents to be pardoned his rebellion, and promised euer after to be at Antonius commandement. But Ventidius madehim answer, that he should send vnto Antonius; who was not farre off, and would not suffer Ventidius to make any peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this litle exploit should passe in his name, and that they should not think he did any thing but by his Lieutenant Ventidius. The siege grew very long, because they that were in the towne, seeing they could not be received vpon no reasonable composition, determined valiantly to defend themselves to the last man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet received great shame, repenting him much that he tooke not their first offer. And yet at the last he was glad to make truce with Antiochus, and to take three hundred talents for composition. Thus after he had set order for the state & affaires of Syria, he returned againe to Athens: and having given Ventidius such honours as he deserved, he sent him to KOME, to triumph for the PARTHIANS. Ventideus was the only man that ever triumphed of the PARTHIAN'S VINILL this present day, a meane man borne, and of no noble house or family: who onely came to that he attained vnto, through Antonius friendship, the which deliuered him happy occasion to archieue great matters, and yet to fay truly, he did so well quit himselfe in all his enterprises, that he confirmed that which was spoken of Antonius and Galar, to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made warre by their Lieutenants, then by themselues. For Sosius one of Antonius Lieutenanes in Syria, did notable good feruice: and Canidius whom he had also left his Lieutenant in the borders of ARMENIA, did conquer it all. So did he candidate blfo ouercome the kings of the IBBRIANS & ALBANIANS, & went on with his conquests vnto mount Caucasus. By these conquests, the same of Antonius power increased more and more, and grew dreadfull vnto all the barbarous nations. But Antonius notwithstanding, grew to be maruellously offended with Cofar, vpon certaine reports that had bene brought vnto him; and so tooke fea to go towards ITALY with three hundred faile. And because those of BRVNDVSIVM would not receive his army into their hauen, he went farther vnto TARENTVM. There his wife betwise Octavia that came out of GRECE with him, befought him to fend her vnto her brother, the Antonius which he did. O Et ania at that time was great with child, and moreouer had a fecond daughter by hiss celer. him, and yet she puther self in iourny, and met with her brother Octavius Casar by the way, who brought his two chiefe friends, Mecenas and Agrippa with him. She tooke them afide, and with all the instance she could possible, intreated them they would not suffer her that was the happies The words woman of the world, to become now the most wretched & vnfortunatest creature of all other. The Mee For now, faid the enery mans eyes do gaze on me, that am the fifter of one of the Emperours, ends and and wife of the other. And if the worst counsel take place (which the gods forbid) and that they grow to warres: for your felues, it is vncertaine to which of them two the gods have affigned the victorie or ouerthrow. But for me, on which fide focuer the victory fall, my flate can be but most miserable still. These words of Octania so softened Casars heart, that he went quickly vnto Octanias TAR ENTYM. But it was a noble fight for them that were prefent, to fee fo great an army by land the quarrel notto stirre; and so many shippes afloate in the roade, quietly and safe; and furthermore, the between meeting and kindnesse of friends, louingly embracing one another. First, Antonius feasted Ca- amonius far, which hegranted vnto for his fifters fake. Afterwards they agreed together, that Cofar brother Oring should give Anionius two legions to go against the PARTHIANS; and that Antonius should let tamin Ca-Cafar have an hundred gallies armed with brazen spurres at the prooes. Besides all this, O Etania far. obtained of her husband, twenty Brigantines for her brother: and of her brother for her husband, a thousand armed men. After they had taken leave of each other, Casar went immediatly to make warre with Sextus Pompeius, to get Sicilia into his hands. Antonius alfo leaving his wife Ostauia and litle children begotten of her, with Cafar, and his other children which he had by Fuluia, went directly into Asia. Then beganne this peftilent plague and mischiefe of Cleoparaes loue (whichhad flept a long time, and feemed to have beneviterly forgotten, and that Antonius had given place to better counfell) again to kindle, and to be in force, to foone as Antonius camencare vnto Syria. And in the end, the horse of the mind, as Plato termeth it, that is Plato ealfo hard of reine (I means the vnreined luft of concupifcence) did put out of Antonius head al honeft and commendable thoughts: for he fent Fonteius Capito to bring Cleopatra into Syria: Vnto baje of the whom, to welcome her, he gaue no trifling things; but vnto that the had already, he added the mind promines of Phenicia, those of the nethermost Syria, the He of Cypres, and a great part of fent for cle. Cilicia, and that country of Ivny where the true balm is, and that part of Anabia where the opairs into NABATH EIANS do dwell, which stretcheth outtoward the Ocean. These great gifts much misliked the ROMAINS. But now, though Anionius did eafily give away great feguiories, realines, gave great and mighty nations vnto some private men, and that also he took from other kings their lawfull provinces realms, (as from Antigonus king of the Ievves, whom he openly beheaded, where neuer king before had fuffered like death; yet all this did not so much offend the Romains, as the vnmeafurable honours which he did vnto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggrauate their malice lung of 14. and ill will towards him, because that Cleopatra having brought him two twinnes, a sonne and a king betea. daughter, he named his fonne Alexander, and his daughter Cleopatra; and gaue them to their fur- dead by An. names, the Sunne to the one, and the Moone to the other. This not with standing, he that could described finely cloke his shamefull deeds with fine words, faid, that the greatnes and magnificence of the Empire of Rome appeared most, not where the Romain's tooke, but where they gave much: clepatra, and Nobilitie was multiplied amongst men by the posteritie of Kings, when they left off their feed in divers places; and that by this means his first ancestor was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his line and posteritie in the wombe of one onely woman, fearing Solons lawes, or regarding the ordinances of men touching the procreation of children: Phraortes but that he gaueit vnto nature, and established the foundation of many noble races and families Ine bis fa. in divers places. Now when Phraortes had flaine his father Orodes, and possessed the kingdome, king of many Gentlemen of PARTHIA for sooke him, and fled from him, Amongst them was Moneses parities.

a Nobleman, and of great authority among his countrimen, who came vnto Antonius that recei ued him, & compared his fortune vnto Themifocles, and his own riches and magnificence vnto kings of Persia. For he gaue Monefes 3. cities, Larissa, Arethysa, & Hierapolis, which was called before Bombice. Howbeit the king of Parthia shortly after called him home again. vpon his faith & word. Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to steale vpon Phragrees vnprouided. For he fent vnto him, and told him that they would remaine good friends, & have peace together, so he would but only redeliuer the standards and ensignes of the Romaines. (which the PARTHIANS had won in the battel where M. Crassus was slain) and the men also that remained yet prisoners of this ouerthrow. In the meane time he fent Cleopaira back into AGYPT and tooke his way towards Arabia and Armenia, and there took a generall mufter of all his army he had together, and of the kings his confederates that were come by his commandement to aid him, being a maruellous number: of the which, the chiefest was Artanasdes king of ARME. NIA, who did furnish him with 6000. horsmen, and 7000. footmen. There were also of the Ro. MAINES about threescore thousand footmen, and of horsinen (Spaniar Ds and Gavles rec. kened for Romanes) to the number of 10000. & of other nations thirty thousand men, recke. ning together the horfmen & light armed footmen. This fo great & puitfant army (which made the Indians quake for feare, dwelling about the country of the Bactrians, and all Asia alfo to tremble) served him to no purpose, & all for the love he bare to Cleopatra. For the earnest great defire he had to lie all winter with her, made him begin this war out of due time, and for halt to put all in hazardibeing fo rauished and enchanted with the sweet poison of her love, that he had no other thought but of her, and how he might quickly returne again, more then how he might ouercome his enemies. For first of all, where he should have wintered in Armenia to refresh his men, wearied with the long iourney they had made, having come eight thousand furlongs, and y then at the beginning of the ipring to go and inuade Media before the Parthians should fir out of their houses and garrifons the could tarry no longer, but led them forthwith vnto the protince of Arropatene, leaving Armenia on the left hand, and for raged all the country. Furthermore, making all the hast he could, he left behind him engines of battery which were caried with him in three hundred carts, (among the which also there was a ram four escore foot long) being things most necessary for him, and the which he could not get againe for money, if they were once lost or marred. For the high provinces of Asia have no trees growing of such height and length, neither strong nor straight enough to make such like engines of batterie. This notwithfranding, he left them all behind him, as an hinderance to bring his matters and intent freedily to passe; and left a certain number of men to keepe them, and gaues them in charge vnto one Tatianus. Then he went to beliege the city of PHRAATA, being the chiefest and greatest city the king of MEDIA had, where his wife & children were. Then he straight found out his own fault, and the want of his artillery he left behind him, by the work he had in hand: for he was faine for lack of a breach (where his men might come to the fword with their enemies that defended the wall) to force a mount of earth hardto y wals of the city, the which by litle and litle with great labor, rose to some height. In the meanetime king Phraories came down with a great army, who vnderstanding that Antonius had left his engines of battery behind him, he fent a great number of horfinen before, which enuironed Tatianus with all his cariage, & flue him, and ten thousand men he had with him. After this the barbarous people tooke these engines of battery and burnt them, and got many prisoners, amongst whom they tookeasso king Polemon. This discomfiture maruelloufly troubled al Antonius army, to receive fo great an overthrow (bey od their expectation) at the beginning of their iourney: infomuch that Artaba Zus king of the Armenians, defpairing of the good successe of the Romains, departed with his men, not with standing that he was himself the first procurer of this war and journy. On the other side, the PARTHIANS came couragiously vnto Antonius campe, who lay at the siege of their chiefest city, and cruelly reuiled and threatned him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay still and did nothing, his mens hearts would faile them, he took ten legions, with three cohorts or enfignes of the Prætors, (which are companies appointed for the guard of the Generall) and all his horsemen, and caried them out to forrage, hoping thereby he should easily allure the PARTHIANS to fight a battell. But when he had marched about a daies journy from his campe, he faw the PARTHIANS wheeling round about him to giue him the onset, and to skirmish with him, when he would thinke to march his way. Therefore he fet out his fignall of battell, and yet caused his tents and fardels to be truffed vo.asthough he meant not to fight, but onely to leade his men backe againe. Then he marched heforethe armie of the barbarous people, the which was martialled like a creffant or halfe Moone; and commanded his horfemen, that as as foone as they thought the legions were neare enough vnto their enemies to fet vpon the voward, they should set spurres to their horses, and begin the charge. The PARTHIANS stood in battell ray, and beholding the countenance of the Battell betwies ROMANES as they marched, tooke them for fouldiers indeed, for that they marched in as and Antonius, good array as was possible. For in their march they kept their rankes a litle space one from an The Romans good other, not straigling out of order, and shaking their pikes, speaking neuer a word. But so some as order in their the alarme was given the horse men suddenly turned head your the Division of the march. the alarme was given, the horse-men suddenly turned head vpon the PARTHIANS, and with great cries gaue charge on them: who at the first received their charge couragiously, for they were joyned nearer then within an arrowes shoote. But when the legions also came to joyne with them, shouting out aloud, and ratling of their armours, the Parthians horses and themselues were so afraid and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the Ro-MANES could come to the fword with them. Then Antonius followed them hard in chafe, being ingreat hope by this conflict to haue brought to end all or the most part of this warre. But after that his footmen had chased them fiftie furlongs off, and the horsemen also thrise as far, they found in all but thirtie persons taken, and about fourescore men onely slaine: which did much discourage them, when they confidered with themselves, that obtaining the victorie, they had flaine fo few of their enemies: and when they were ouercome, they loft fo many of their men, as they had done at the ouerthrow when their cariage was taken. The next morning Antonius armietrussed up their carriage, and marched backe towards their campe: and by the way in their returne they met at the first a few of the Parthians; then going on further, they met a few more. So at length when they all came together, they reuiled them, and troubled them on every fide, as freshly and couragiously as if they had not bene ouerthrowne: so that the Romanes very hardly got to their campe with safetie. The Medes on the other side, that were besieged in their chiefe Citie of Phraata, made a fally out upon them that kept the mount which they had forced and castagainst the wall of the city, and draue them for search fro the mount they kept. Antonius was to offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he divided his men by ten legions, martial punishment of them he put the rough legion to death on whom the legions of them he put the rough legion to death on whom the legions of them. and then of them he put the tenth legion to death, on whom the lot fel; and for the other nine, he ment. caused them to have barley given them in stead of wheate. Thus this warre fell out troublesome vnto both parties, and the end thereof much more fearfull: for Antonius could looke for no other of his fide but famine, because he could forrage no more, nor fetch in any victuals, without great loffe of his men: and on the other fide, Phraortes knew well enough that the PARTHIANS would do any thing rather then lie in campe abroad in the winter. Therefore he was afraid, that if the ROMANES continued their fiege all winter long, and made war with him still, that his men wold for fake him, and specially because the time of the yeare went away apace, and the aire waxed cloudie and cold in the equinoctiall Autumne. Thereupon he called to mind this deuice: He gaue the chiefest of his Gentlemen of the PARTHIANS charge, that when they met the Ro- The graft of the HANES out of their campe, going to forrage, or to water their horse, or for some other prouisio, Parthians athat they should not distresse them too much, but should suffer them to carrie somewhat away, sains the Roand greatly commend their valiantnesse and hardinesse, for which their king did esteeme them the more, and not without cause. After these first allurements, they began by little and little to come nearer vnto them, and to talke with them on horsebacke, greatly blaming Antonius selfewill, that did not give their king Phraortes occasion to make a good peace, who defired nothing more then to faue the lines of fo goodly a companie of valiant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greatest and most dreadful enemies he could have, to wit, winter and samine, the which they could hardly away withall, though the Parthians did the best they could to aid & accompany them. These words being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a litle pliant, for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he would not fend vnto the king of PARTHIA before they had first asked these barbarous people that spake so courteously vnto his men, whether they spake it of themselves, or that they were their masters words. When they told them, the king himselfe said so, and did perswade them further not to seare or mistrust them, then Antonius sent some of his friends vnto the king, to make demand for the deliuery of the enfignes and prisoners he had of the Romans fince the ouerthrow of Crassing, to the end it should not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they should thinke he were glad that he might only scape with Kkkk 3 fafetic out of the danger he was in. The king of PARTHIA answered him, that for the enfignes and prisoners he demanded, he should not breake his head about it, but if he would depart presently and without delay, he might do it peaceably, and without danger. Wherefore Antonius after he had given his men fome time to truffe vp their cariage, he raifed his campe. and tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very proper to entertaine his fouldiers and men of warre, and that he could paffingly well do it, as well or better then any Captaine in his time: yet for shame he would not speake vnto them at his remouing but gaue the charge thereof to Domitius Anobarbus. Many of them tooke this in vervill part, and thought that he did it in disdaine of them: but the most part of them presently vn. derftood the truth of it, and were also ashamed. Therfore they thought it their duties to cary the like respect ynto their Captain that their Captaine did ynto them: and so they became the more obedient vnto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the same way he came, being a plaine barren countrey without wood. But there came a fouldier to him, borne in the countrey of the MAR DIANS, who having bene long familiar with the PAR THIANS, knew their fashions very wel and had also shewed himselfe very true & faithfull to the ROMANES in the battell where Antonius engines of battery and cariage were taken away. This man came vnto Antonius, to counfell him to beware how he went that way, &to make his army a prey (being heavily armed) vnto fo great a number of horfmen, all archers in the open field, where they should have nothing to let them to compass. him round about & that this was Phraortes fetch, to offer him so friendly conditions & courteous words, to make him raise his siege, that he might afterwards meet him as he would in the plaines: howbeit, if he thought good he would guide him another way on the right hand. through woods & mountains, a far nearer way, & where he should find great plenty of all things needfull for his armie, Antonius hearing what he faid, called his counfell together to confelt voon it. For after he had made peace with the PARTHIANS, he was loth to give them cause to thinke he mistrusted them: and on the other file also he would gladly shorten his way, and passe by places well inhabited, where he might be prouided of all things necessary therefore he asked the MAR. DIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promifed. The MARDIAN gaue himselfe to be bound hand and foote, till he had brought his army into the countrey of Armenia. So he guided his army thus bound, two daies together, without any trouble or fight of enemy. But the third day Antonius thinking the PARTHIANS would no more fo'low him, and trufting thereto. furfered his foldiers to march in diforder as every man lifted. The MARDIAN perceiving that the dams of a river were newly broken up, which they should have passed over, & that the river had overflowne the banks & drowned all the way they should have gone, he guessed straight that the PARTHIANS had done it, and had thus broken it open, to stay the ROMANES for getting too far before them. Therfore he had Antonios looke to himfelf, and told him that his enemies were not farre off, Antonius having fet his men in order, as he was placing of his archers and flingmen to refift the enemies, and to drive them backe, they descried the PARTHIANS that wheeled round dolar pon An. about the army to compasse them in on enery side, & to breake their ranks, and their light armed really in lare- men gaue charge vpon them. So after they had hurt many of the Roman Es with their arrowes. and that they them elues were also hurt by them with their darts & plummets of lead, they retired a litle, and then came againe and gaue charge, vntill that the horfinen of the GAV LBS turned their horses, and fiercely galloped towards them, that they dispersed them so, as all that day they gathered no more together. Hereby Antonius knew what to do, and did not only frengthen the rereward of his armie, but bot's the flankes also with darts and fling-men, and made his armie march in a square battell: commanding the horsemen, that when the enemies should come to affaile them, they should drive them backe, but not follow them too farre. Thus the PARTHIANS fouredayes after, feeing they did no more hurt to the Romanes then they also received of them, they were not so hote vpon them as they were accustomed, but excusing themselues by the winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. The fift day Flauius The bold of Galles, a valiant man of his hands, that had charge in the army, came vnto Antonius to pray him to let him have some moe of his light armed men then were already in the rereward, and some of the horsementhat were in the voward, hoping thereby to do some notable exploit. Antonius granting them vnto him, when the enemies came according to their manner to fet vpon the taile of the armie, and to skirmith with them, Flauius couragiously made them retire, but not as they were wont to do before, to retire and joyne presently with their armie; for he ouer rashly thrust in among them to fight it out at the sword. The Captains that had the leading of the rereward, seeing Flauius stray too farre from the army, sent vnto him to will him to retire, but he would not hearken to it. And it is reported also, that Titius himselfe the Treasurer, tooke the enfignes, & did what he could to make the enfigne-bearers returne backe, reuiling Flavius Gallin, hecause through his folly and desperatnesse he caused many honest and valiant men to be both hurt and flaine to no purpose. Gillus also fell out with him, and commanded his men to flav. Wherefore Tities returned agains into the army, and Galless fill overthrowing and driving the enemies back whom he met in the voward, he was not ware that he was compaffed in : and feeing himselfe environed on all fides, he sent vnto the army, that they should come and aide him. where the Captains that led the legions (among the which Canidius, a man of great estimation canidius fault, about Antonius made one) committed many faults. For where they should have made head with Antonius Cat. the whole army upon the Parthians, they fent him aide by small companies; and when they taine. were flaine, they fent him others also. So that by their beafflinefle and lacke of confideration, they had like to have made all the army flie, if Antonius himselfe had not come from the front of the battell with the third legion, the which came through the midft of them that fled, vntill they came to affront the enemies, and stayed them from chasing any farther. Howbeit at this last conflict there were flaine no leffe then 3000 men, and 5000, befides brought fore hurt into the campo, and amongst them also Flanius Gallus, whose body was shot through in source places, Flanius Gallus, whereo he died, Antonius went to the tents to vifit and comfort the ficke and wounded, and for Antonius care n'ties fake he could not refraine from weeping: and they also shewing him the best countenance of them that they could, tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to go and be drefted, and not to trouble him- were wounded. felfe for them, mostreuerently calling him their Emperor and Captaine: & that for themselves: they were whole and fafe, to that he had his health. For indeed to fay truly, there was not at that time any Emperor or Captaine that had so great and puilfant an army as his together, both for lufty youths and courage of fouldiers, as also for their patience to away with so great paines and trouble. Furthermore, the obedience & reuerence they shewed vnto their Captaine, with a maruellous carnest loue and good will, was so great, and all were indifferently (as well great as small, uerence of the the noble men, as meane men, the Captaines as fouldiers) fo earneftly bent to effect Matonius fouldiers mio good will and fauor, about their owne life and fafety, that in this point of martiall discipline, the Anioniss. ancient Rom ANES could not have done any more. But diverse things were cause thereof, as we There and finhaue told you before: Antonius nobility and ancient house, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his li- gular gifts of betality and magnificence, and familiarity to sport and to be merry in companie: but specially difference. the care he tooke at that time to helpe, vifite, and lament those that were ficke and wounded, seeing enery man to have that which was meet for him, was of fuch force and effect, as it made them that were ficke and wounded to loue him better, & were more defirous to do him feruice then those that were whole and found. This victory so incouraged the enemies (who otherwise were weary to follow Antonius any farther) that all night long they kept the fields. & houered about the Romanes camp, thinking that they would prefently flie, and that then they should take the spoile of their campe. So the next morning by breake of day, there were gathered together a far greater number of the PART HI ANS then they were before. For the rumor was, that there were not much fewer then 40000, horse, because their king sent thither even the very guard about his person, as vinto a most certaine and assured victory, that they might be partners of the spoile and booty they hoped to have had for as touching the king himselfe, he was never in any conflict or The king of Paris battel. Then Antonius desirous to speak to his souldiers, called for a blacke gowne, to appeare the more pitifull to the but his friends did disswade him from it. Therfore he put on his coat armor, fully & being so apparelled, made an Oration to his army: in the which he highly comended the that had ouercome & driven backe their enemies, & greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backes. So that those which had ouercome, prayed him to be of good cheare: the other also to cleare themselves, williagly offered to take the lot of Decimation if he thought good, or otherwife to receive what kind of punishment should please him to lay vponthem, so that he would forget any more to mislike, or to be offended with them. Antonius seeing that, did lift up his hands to heauen, and made his prayer to the gods, that if in exchange of his former victories, they wold now fend him fome bitter a duerfity, then that all might light on himselfe alone, and that they Antonius charis would give the vistorie to the rest of his army. The next morning, they gave better order on the rest for his enery fide of the armie, and so marched forward: so that when the PARTHIANS thought to armie.

returne agains to affaile them, they came far short of the reckoning. For where they thought to come not to fight, but to spoile and make hauocke of all, when they came neare them, they were fore hurt with their flings and darts, and fuch other lauelins as the ROMANES darted at them, and the PARTHIAMS found them as rough and desperate in fight, as if they had bene fresh men they had dealt withall. Wherupon their hearts began againe to faile them. But yet when the Romans came to go downe any steepe hils or mountaines, they would fet on them with their arrowes. because the Romanes could go downe but faire and softly. But then againe, the souldiers of the legion that caried great shields, returned backe, and inclosed them that were naked or light armed in the middeft among them, and did kneele of one knee on the ground, and fo fet downe their shields before them: and they of the second ranke also covered them of the first ranke, and the third also covered the second, and so from ranke to ranke all were covered. Insomuch that this manner of courring and fluading themselves with shields, was denised after the fashion of laving tyles upon houses, and to fight was like the degrees of a Theater, and is a most strong defence and bulwarke against all arrowes and shot that falleth upon it. When the PARTHIANS saw this countenance of the Romane fouldiers of the legion which kneeled on the ground in that fort upon one knee, supposing that they had bene wearied with trauell, they layed downe their bowes, and tooke their fpeares and lances, and came to fight with them man for man. Then the ROMANS fuddenly rose vpon their feet, and with the darts that they threw from them, they sluce the foremose, and put the rest to flight, and so did they the next dayes that followed. But by meanes of these dangers and lets, Antonius army could win no way in a day, by reason whereof they fuffered great famine: for they could have but litle corne, and yet were they driven daily to fight for it and befides that, they had no inftruments to grind it to make bread of it. For the most part of them had bene left behind, because the beasts that caried them were either dead, or else employed to cary them that were fore and wounded. For the famine was fo extreme great, that the eight part of a bushell of wheat was fold for fifty Drachmaes, and they fold barley breadby the weight of filter. In the end they were compelled to live of hearbs and foots, but they found few of them that men do commonly eate of, and were enforced to tast of them that were ne uer eaten before: among the which, there was one that killed them, and made them out of their wits, For he that had once eaten of it, his memory went from him, and he knew no manner of thing, but onely bufied himfelfe in digging and hurling of stones from one place to another, as though it had bene a matter of great weight, and to be done with all possible speed. All the camp ouer, men were builty stooping to the ground, digging and carrying of stones from one placeto another: but at the last, they cast up a great deale of choler, and died suddenly, because they lacked wine, which was the only four raigne remedy to cure that disease. It is reported that Antonius feeing fuch a number of his men die daily, and that the PARTHIANS left them not, neither would The valiant reffe fuffer them to be at reft, he often times cried out fighing, and faid: Oten thousand! He had the of tenthousand valiantnesse of 1000. GRECIANS in such admiration, whom Xenophon brought away after the Transparage overthrow of Cyrus: became they had come a farther journey from Barrion, and had also away after the fought against much more enemies many times told, then themselves and yet came home with fafety. The PART HI ANS therefore feeing that they could not breake the good order of the army of the Romans, & contrarily, that they themselves were often times put to flight, and welfauo-The Parthians redly beaten, they fell against to their old crafty fubtilities. For when they found any of the Ro-MAN'S feattered from the army to go forrage, to feeke fome corne, or other victuals, they would come to them as if they had bene their friends, and flew them their bowes vibent, faving, that themselves also did returne home to their country as they did, and that they would follow them no farther: howbeit that they should yet have certaine Medes that would follow them a dayes iourney or two, to keepe them that they should do no hurt to the villages from the high-wayes; and fo holding them with this talke, they gently took their leave of them, and bad them farewell, To that the ROMANES began against to thinke themselves safe. Antonius also vinderstanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine countrey, because also they should find no water in the mountaines, as it was reported vnto him. So as he was determined to take his course, there came into his hoast one Mithridates, a gentleman from the enemies camp, who was cofin vnto Mone (es that fled vnto Antonius, and vnto whom he had given three cities. conspiracie of his When he came to Antonius campe, he prayed them to bring him one that could speake the Par-THIAN OF STRIAN tongue. So one Alexander An TIOCHIAN, a familiar of Antonius, was brought brought vnto him. Then the gentleman told him what he was, and faid that Monefes had fent himto Antonius, to require the honour and courtefie he had shewed vnto him. After he had yfed this ceremonious speech, he asked Alexander if he saw those high mountaines a fair off, which he nointed vnto with his finger. Alexander answered he did. The Parthinas (faid he) doly in ambuth at the foot of those mountaines, under the which lieth a goodly plaine champion country: and they thinke that you being deceived with their crafty fubtill words, will leave the way of the mountaines, and turne into the plaine. For the other way, it is very hard and painful, and you shall abide great thirst, the which you are well acquainted with all but if Antonius take the lower way, let him affure himselfe to runne the same fortune that Marcus Crassus did. So Mithridates having faid, he departed. Antonius was maruelloufly troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, and therfore called for his friends, to heare what they would fay to it. The Mar DIAN alfo that was their guide, being asked his opinion, answered, that he thought as much as the gentleman Mithridates had faid. For, faid he, admitthatthere were no ambush of enemics in the valley, yet it is a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the mountaine way, though it be flony and painfull, yet there is no other danger, but a whole daies trauelling without any water. So Antonius changing his first mind and determination, removed that night, and tooke the mountaine way, commanding every man to provide himselfe of water. But the most part of the lacking veffels to cary water in, some were driven to fill their fallets & murrians with water, and others also filled goates skinnes to cary water in. Now they marching forward, word was brought vnto the PARTHIAN's that they were removed: whereupon, contrary to their manner, they presently followed them the selfe same night, so that by breake of day they ouertooke the rereward of the Romains, who were fo lame and wearied with going, and lacke of fleepe, that they were euen done. For beyond expectation, they had gone that night, two hundred and forty furlongs, and further, to fee their enemies fo fodainly at their backs, that made them veterly despaire: but most of all, the fighting with them increased their thirst, because they were forced to fight as they marched, to drive their enemies backe, yet creeping on still. The voward of the army by chancemet with a river that was very cleare and cold water; but it was falt and venimous todrinke: for straight it did gnaw the guts of those that had drunke it, and made them maruellousdry, and put them into a terrible ache and pricking. And notwithstanding that the Man-DIAN had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thrust them backe that would have kept them from drinking, and fo dranke. But Antonius going vp and downe amongst them, prayed them to take a little patience for a while, for hard by there was another riuerthat the water was excellent good to drinke, and that from thenceforth the way was flony and ill for horsemen, that the enemies could follow them no further. So he caused the retrain to befounded to call them backe that fought, and commanded the tents to be fet vp, that the fouldiers might yet haue shadow to refresh them with. So when the tents were set vp, and the PAR-THIAN'S also retired according to their manner, the gentleman Muthridates before named, returned againe as before, and Alexander in like maner againe was brought vnto him for interpreter. Then Mithridates aduised him, that after the army had reposed a little, the Romaines should remoue forthwith, and with all speed possible get to the river: because the PARTHIANS would go no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander caried the reportthereof vnto Antonius, who gaue him a great deale of gold plate to bestow vpon Authri-Antonius dates. Mithridates took as much of him as he could well cary away in his gowne, and fo departed great libe. with speed. So Antonius raised his camp being yet day light, & cansed all his army to march and saley amo the PARTHIAN'S neuer troubled any of them by the way: but among it themselves it was as ill tei, for the and dreadfull a night as euer they had. For there were villaines of their owne company, who cut one had their fellowes throats for the mony they had, and befides that, robbed the fumpters and carriage of his falty. of fuch money as they caried, and at length, they fet vpon Antenius flaues that draue his owne of Antenius fumpters and cariage, they brake goodly tables and rich plate in peeces, and divided it among themselves. themselues. Thereupon all the campe was straight in tumult and vprores for the residue of them uston, nesses, were afraid it had bene the PARTHIANS that had given them this alarme, and had put all the army out of order. Infomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his flaues enfranchifed that was of his guard, and made him give him his faith that he would thrust his fwordthrough Antonius him when he would bid him, and cut off his head, because he might not be taken aline of his desperate enemies, nor knowne when he were dead. This griened his friends to the heart, that they burst amongst the fouldiers in her owne name, as if she had given it them. In the meane time it chanced that the king of the MEDES, and Phraortes king of the PARTHIANS, fell at great wars together, the which began (as it is reported) for the spoyles of the Romains: and grew to be so hote between them, that the king of MEDES was no lefte afraid, then also in danger to lose his whole Realme. Thereupon he fent vnto Antonius, to pray him to come and make warre with the PAR-then it was pleasure to the other to offer it. Hereupon, after he had spoken with the king of

MEDES at the river of Araxes, he prepared himfelf once more to go through ARMENIA, and to make more cruell warre with the Parthians, then he had done before. Now whilest Antonius wasbufy in this preparation, Octavia his wife, who he had left at Rome, would need take feato authors do report) as for that he might have an honest colour to make warre with Antonius if he had brought these newes from his wife Ottania, & withall did greatly praise her, as she was worthy, and well deferued, Cleopatra knowing that Octania would have Antonius from her, and fearing also that if with her vertue and honest behaviour (besides the great power of her brother cafar) she did adde thereunto her modest kind loue to please her husband, that she would then betoo ftrong for her, and in the end win him away: The fubtilly feemed to languish for the loue of Antonius, pining her body for lacke of meat. Furthermore, the every way to framed her countenance, that when Antonius came to fee her, the caft her eyes vpon him, like a woman rauilled for ioy. Straight againe when he went from her, she fell a weeping and blubbering looking rufully on the matter, and still found the meanes that Antonius should oftentimes find ahard natured man, and that he had fmall loue in him, that would fee a poore Ladie in fuch torment for his fake, whose life depended onely vpon him alone. For Offania, fayd they, that was maried vnto him as it were of necessary, because her brother Cafars affaires so required it, teries and inticements, they so wrought Antonius effeminate mind, that fearing less she would make her felfe away, he returned againe vnto ALEXANDRIA, and referred the king of MEDES to the next yeare following; although he received newes that the PARTHIANS at that time

out a weeping for forow. The Mardian also did comforthim, and affured him that the riverha fought for was hard by & that he did guesse it by a sweet moist wind that breathed vpon them. and by the aire which they found fresher then they were wont, and also, for that they fetched their wind more at liberty; & moreouer, because that since they did set forward, he thought they were neare their journeys end, not lacking much of day. On the other fide also Antonius was informed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the enemies, but through the vile couetousnesse and villany of certaine of his souldiers. Therfore Antonius to set his army againg in order, and to pacifie this vprore; founded the trumpet that every man should lodge. Now day began to break, and the army to fal again into good order, and all the hurly burly to ceafe, when the PARTHIANS drew neare, and that their arrowes lighted among them of the rereward of his army. Thereupon the fignall of battell was given to the light armed men, and the legioners did couer themselves as they had done before with their shields, with the which they received and defended the force of the Parthians arrowes, who never durft any more come to handy ftrokes with them; and thus they that were in the voward, went downe by little and little, till at length they espied the river. There Antonius placed his armed men upon the lands to receive and drive back the enemies, and first of all, got over his menthat were fick and hurt, and afterwards all the reft. And those also that were left to refist the enemies, had leisure inough to drink fafely. and at their pleafure. For when the Parthians faw the river, they vinbent their bowes, and bad the ROMAINS passe ouer without any searc, and greatly commended their valiantnesse. When they had all passed ouer the river at their ease, they tooke a litle breath, and so marched forward again, not greatly trusting the PARTHIANS. The fixt day after this last battell, they came to the river of Araxes, which divide the countrey of Armenia from Media, the which appeared vnto them very dangerous to passe, for the depth & swiftnesse of the streame. And furthermore there ran a rumor through the campe, that the PARTHIAN's lay in ambush thereabouts, and that they would come and fet vpon them whilest they were troubled in passing ouer the river. But now, after they were all come fafely ouer without any danger, and that they had gotten to the other fide, into the prouince of ARMENIA, then they worshipped that land, as if it had benethe first land they had seene after a long and dangerous voyage by sea, being now arrived in a lafe and happy hauen: and the teares ran downe their cheekes, and enery man imbraced each other for the great ioy they had. But now, keeping the fields in this fruitfull country so plentifull of all things, after fo great a famine and want of all things, they fo crommed themselues with such plenty of victuals, that many of them were cast into fluxes & dropsies. There Antonins mustring his whole army, found that he had loft 20000 footmen, and 4000 horsemen, which had not all bene flaine by their enemies: for the most part of them died of sicknesse, making seuen and twenty dayes iourney, coming from the city of Phraata into Armenia, and having overcome the PARTHIANS in eighteene feuerall battels. But thefe victories were not throughly perfineral bat. formed nor accomplished because they followed no long chase: and thereby it easily appeared, that Artabazus king of ARMENIA, had kept Antonius from ending this warre. For if the fixteene Parishians, thousand horsemen which he brought with him out of MEDIA, had bene at these battels (con-The triche fidering that they were armed and apparelled much after the PARTHIAN maner, and acquainted bazus king also with their fight, when the Romaine's had put them to flight that had fought a battell with of armonia them, and that there ARMENIAN's had followed the chase of them that fled) they had not gathered themselves againe in force neither durst they also have returned to fight with them so often after they had bene so many times ouerthrowne. Therefore, all those that were of any credit and countenance in the army, did perswade and egge Antonius to be reuenged of this ARME-NIAN king:but Antonius wilely diffembling his anger, he told him not of his trechery, nor gaue him the worse countenance, nor did him lesse honour then he did before: because he knew his army was weak, & lacked things necessary. Howbeit afterwards he returned againe into Arme-NIA with a great army, and so with faire words, and sweete promises of messengers, he allured Artabazus to come to him: whom he then kept prisoner, and led in triumph in the city of A-LEXANDRIA. This greatly offended the Romaines, and made them much to mislike it, when they faw that for Cleopatraes fake he deprined his country of her due honor and glory, onely to zu king of gratifie the Æ GYPTIAN'S. Butthis was a prety while after. Howbeit then, the great half he made to returne vnto Cleopatra, caused him to put his men to so great paines, forcing them to lie in the field all winter long when it fnew vnreafonably, that by the way he lost eight thousand of his

And because she taried longer then he would have had her, he pined away for love and so- date mines row: To that he was at fuch a straight, that he wist not what to do, and therfore to we are it out, he pined away gaue himself to quaffing and feasting. But he was so drowned with the loue of her, that he could Glenhatra. notabide to fit at the table till the feaft was ended but many times while others banquetted, he Clepara ran to the fea fide to fee if the were coming. At length the came, and brought with her a world Blaceburg of apparell and money to give vnto the fouldiers. But fome fay notwithstanding, that she brought apparell and no money, and that she tooke of Antonius mony, and caused it to be given must did misuse her, and not esteeme of her as she ought to be. But when she was come to ATHENS, Offanis, the received letters from Antonius, willing her to ftay there vntill his coming, and did advertife her of his iourny and determination. The which though it grieued her much, and that flie knew to state the it was but an excuse: yet by her letters to him of answer, she asked him whether he would have to meet those things fent vnto him which she had brought him, being great store of apparell for fouldi. with him.

All these ring entire tricks she vsed Antonius being in readines to go into Syria to speake with the king of MEDES. were at civill warres among themselves. This not with standing, he went afterwards and made peace with him. For he maried his daughter which was very yong, vnto one of the fons that cle opatra had by him: and then returned being fully bent to make warre with Cafar. When Ottania was returned to Rome from Athens, Cafar commanded her to go out of Antonius house, and print An to dwell by her self, because he had abused her. Obtania answered him again, that she would not for lake her husbands house, and that if he had no other occasion to make warre with him, she prayed him then to take no thought for her: for faid she, it were too shamefull a thing, that two fo famous Captaines should bring in civill warres among the Romains, the one for the love of of a woman, and the other for the lealousie betwixt one another. Now as she spake the word so did she also performe the deed: for she kept still in Antonius house, as if ne had bene there, and very honeftly, and honourably kept his children, not onely those she had by him, but the other which her husband had by Fulusa. Furthermore, when Antonius fent any of his men to Rome to she for any office in the commonwealth, she received the very curreously, and so vsed her self vnto her brother, that she obtained the things she requested. Howbeit therby, thinking no hurt. the did Antonius great hurt. For her honest lone & regard to her husband, made enery man have him, when they faw he did fo vnkindly vfe fo noble a Lady: but the greatest cause of their malice vnto him, was for the division of lands he made among his children in the city of ALEX-ANDRIA. And to confesse a troth, it was too arrogant and insolenta part, and done (as a man would fay) in derifion and contempt of the ROMAINES. For heaffembled all the people in the shew place, where yong men do exercise themselves, and there you a high tribunal silvered he fer two chaires of gold, the one for himself, and the other for Cleopatra, and lower chaires for his drabyele. children, then he openly published before the assembly, that first of all he did establish cleapage Queene of Agypt, of Cyprus, of Lydia, and of the lower Syria; and at that time also cell. rean king of the fame Realmes. This Cafarion was supposed to be the fon of Iulius Cafar, who had feetenment left cleopatragreat with child. Secondly, he called the fons he had by her, the kings of kings, and gaue Alexander for his portion, ARMENIA, MEDIA, and PARTHIA, when he had conquered the country; and vnto Ptolomy for his portion, PHENICIA, SYRIA, and CILICIA. And therewithall he brought out Alexander in a long gowne after the fashion of the MEDES with a high cop-tanke hat on his head, narrow in the top, as the kings of the MEDEs and ARMENIANS do vieto weare them: & Piolomy apparelled in a clockeafter the Macedonian maner, with Aippers on his feet and a broad har, with a royall band or diademe. Such was the apparell and old attire of the ancient kings and fuccessors of Alexander the Great. So after his tons had done their humble duties. and killed their father and mother, prefently a company of Armenian fouldiers fer there of purpose, compassed the one about, and a like company of MACEDONIANS the other. Now for Class patra the did not onely weare at that time (but at all other times else when she came abroad) the apparell of the goddeffe Isis, and so gave audience vnro all her subjects, as a new Isis. Octavius Ca. far reporting all these things voto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole people on between and affembly in Rome, he thereby ftirred vp all the Romains against him. Antonius on the other fide fent to Rome likewise to accuse him, and the chiefest points of his accusations hecharged him with, were thefe. First, that having spoiled Sextus Pompeius in Sicile, he did not give him his part of the Ile. Secondly, that he did detaine in his hands the ships he lent him to make that warre. Thirdly, that having put Lepidus their companion and triumuerate out of his part of the Empire, and having depriued him of all honours, he retained for himselfe the lands and reuenues thereof, which had bene affigned ynto him for his part. And last of all, that he had in maner divided all ITALY amongst his owne fouldiers, and had left no part of it for his foldiers. Octavius Cafar answered him againe: that for Lepidus, he had indeed deposed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, because he did ouer cruelly vse his authoritie. And secondly, for the conquests he had made by force of armes, he was contented Antonius should have his part of them, so that he would likewise lethim have his part of ARMENIA. And thirdly, that for his fouldiers, they should seeke for nothing in ITALY, because they possessed MEDIA and PARTHIA, the which provinces they had added to the Empire of Rome, valiantly fighting with their Emperour and Captaine. Antonius hearing these newes, being yet in ARMENIA, commanded Canideus to go presently to the sea side with his sixteene legions he had: and he him-Iclfe with Cleopatra, went vnto the city of EPHESVS, and there gathered together his galleyes and ships out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred, reckoning the great ships of burthen; and of those Cleopatra furnished him with two hundred and twenty thousand ta- Antonias lents befides, and prouision of victuals also to maintaine all the whole army in this war. So Antonius, through the perswasion of Domitius, commanded Cleopatra to return again into A- dredsale Gypt, and there to vinderstand the successe of this warre. But Cleotatra fearing lest Antonius against stanting for the first with Octavins Cofar, by the meanes of his wife Octavia, she so Cafar. plied Canidius with money, and filled his purfe, that he became her spokes-man vnto Antonius, and told him, there was no reason to send her from this warre, who defrayed so great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, because thereby the ÆGYPTIANS would then be viterly difcouraged, which were the chiefest strength of the army by sea: considering that he could see no king of all the kings their confederates, that Cleopatra was inferiour vnto, either for wildome or indgement, seeing that long before she had wiscly gouerned so great a realme as A gyp Tand befides that, the had bene fo long acquainted with him, by whom the had learned to manage great affaires. These faire perswasions wan him: for it was predestinated that the government of all the world should fall into Octavius Cafars hands. Thus, all their forces being joyned together, they cleopatra hoised faile towards the Ile of Samos, and there gaue themselves to feasts and solace. For as all with him the Kings, Princes, and communalties, people, and cities from Syria, vnto the marrifles Macotides. & from the ARMENIANS to the ILLYRIANS were fent voto to fend & being all munition offenties and warlike preparation they could: even so all players, minst els, tumblers, fooles, and icusters, were commaunded to affemble in the Ile of Samos. So that, where in manner all the world in feature a enery place was full of lamentations, fighes and teares, only in this Ile of Samos there was no- the lle of thing for many daies space but singing and piping, and all the Theater full of these common gether. players, minstrels, and finging-men. Befides all this, every city fent an one thither to facrifice, & kings did ftring one with another who should make the noblest feasts, and give the richest gifes. Sothar cuery manfaid, What canthey do more for ioy of victory, if they winne the battell, when they make already fuch fumptuous feafts at the beginning of the warre? When this was done he gaue the whole rabble of these minstrels, and such kind of people, the city of Prinning to keepe them withall, during this warre. Then he went vuto the city of ATHENS, and here gaue himselfe againe to see playes and pastimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Chopatra on the other fide, being icalous of the honours which offania had received in this city, where indeed fle was maruelloufly honoured and beloued of the Athenians: to winne the peoples goodwill also at ATHENS, the gaue them great gifts; and they likewise gaue her many great honours, and appointed certaine Ambassadors to carry the decree to her house, among the which Antonius was one, who (as a citizen of ATHENS) reported the matter vnto her, and made an Oration in the behalfe of the city. Afterwards he fent to Rome to put his wife Offaula out of his Antonius house, who (as it is reported) went out of his house with all Antonius children, saving the eldest of training the of them he had by Fuluia, who was with his father: bewailing & lamenting her curied hap, that of bishouse had brought her to this, that she was accounted one of the chiefest causes of this civil war. The at Rome ROMAINE'S did pitieher, but much more Antonius, and those specially that had seene Cleopatra. who neither excelled Octavia in beauty, nor yet in young yeares. Octavius Cafar understanding the fudden and wonderfull great preparation of Antonius, he was not a little aftonied at it (fearing he should be driven to fight that sommer) because he wanted many things, and the great and grieuous exactions of money did fore oppresse the people. For all manner of menelle were "". "Traines driuen to pay the fourth part of their goods and reuenew, but the Libertines (to wit, those afterbyriewhose fathers or other predecessors had sometime bene bond-men) were seissed to pay the moutpai eight part of all their goods at one payment. Hereupon there arose a wonderfull exclamation ments of the Romainess. and great vprore all ITALY ouer, fothat amongst the greatest faults that euer Antonius committed, they blamed him most for that he delayed to give Cesar battell. For he gave Cesar leifure to make his preparations, and also to appeale the complaints of the people. When such a great fumme of money was demanded of them, they grudged at it, and grew to mutinic vpon it: but when they had once payed it, they remembred it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plancus (two of Antonius chiefest friends, and that had bene both of them Consuls) for the great iniuries Cleopatra did them, because they hindered all they could that she should not come to this warre, they went and yeelded themselues vnto Casar, and told him where the testament was that Antonius had made, knowing perfectly what was in it. The will was in the custodie of the Vestall Nunnes: of whom Cesar demanded it. They answered him, that they would not give it him: but if he would go and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereupon Cafar went this ther, and having read it first to himselfe, he noted certaine places worthy of reproch: so affembling all the Senate, he read it before them all. Whereupon diuers were maruelloufly offended and thought it a strange matter, that he being aliue, should be punished for that he had appointed by his will to be done after his death. Cafar chiefly took hold of this, that he ordained touching his buriall : for he willed that his body, though he died at Rome, should be brought in funerall pompe through the middeft of the market place, and that it should be sent into ALEXANDRIA VIIto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among divers other faults wherewith Antonius was to be charged for Cleopatraes fake, Caluifus one of Cafars friends reproued him, because he had frankly given Cleopatra al the Libraries of the royall city of Pergamy m, in the which she had about two hundred thousand seucrall bookes. Againe also, that being on a time set at the table, he suddenly rose from the board and trode vpon Cleopatraes foot, which was a figne given between them, that they were agreed of. That he had also suffered the Ephesians in his presence to call Cleopatra their sourraigne Ladie. That divers times sitting in his tribunall and chaire of state, giving audience to all Kings and Princes, he had received love letters from Cleopatra, written in tables of Onyx or Christall, & that he had read them, fitting in his Imperiall feat. That one day when Furmus a man of great account, & the cloquentest man of al the Romains, pleaded a matter before him, Cleopatra by chance coming through § market place in her litter where Furnius was a pleading, Antonins straight rose out of his seat, & left his audience to follow her litter. This not withstanding, it was thought Caluifus denifed the most part of all these accusations of his own head. Neuerth-leffe they that loued Antonius were interceffors to the people for him, and amongst them they fent one Geminius vnto Antonius, to pray him he would take heed that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he should be counted an enemy to the people of Rome. This Geminius being arrived in Grece, made Cleopatra icalous flraight of his coming, because she surmised that he came not but to speake for Ottania. Therfore she spared not to taunt him all supportine; and moreover to spite him the more, she made him to be set lowest of all at the boordishe which he tooke patiently, expecting occasion to speake with Antonius. Now Intenius commanding him at the table to tell him what wind brought him thither, he answered, That it was no table talke, and that he would tell him to morow morning fasting; but drunke or fasting, howfoeuer it were, he was fure of one thing, that all would not go well on his fide, vnleffe Cleepatra were fent backe into AGYPT. Antonius tooke these words in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other side answered him, Thou does well Geminius, said she, to tell the truth beforethou becompelled by torments: but within few daies after, Geminius stole away, and fled to Rome. The flatterers alfo to please Gleopatra, did make her drine many other of Antonius faithful fernants & friends fro him, who could not abide the injuries done vnto them: among the which these two were chiefe, Marcus Syllanus, and Dellius the Historiographer, who wrote that he sled because her Phisitian Glaucus told him, that Cleopatra had set some secretly to kill him. Furthermore, he had Cleopatraes displeasure, because he faid one night at supper, that they made them drinke fowre wine, where Sarmentus at Rome dranke good wine of FALERNA. This Sarmentus was a pleasant yong boy, such as the Lords of Rome are wont to have about them to make the pastime, which they call their joyes, and he was Ottanius Casars boy. Now after that Casar had made sufficient preparation, he proclaimed open warre against Cleopatra, and made the people to abolish the power and Empire of Antonius, because he had before given it vp vnto a woman. And C.efar faid furthermore, that Antonius was not master of himselfe, but that Cleopatra had brought him befide himselseby her charmes and amorous poysons: and that they that should make warre with them, should be Mardian the Eunuch, Photinus, and Iras (a woman of Cleopatraes bed-chamber, that frizeled her haire, and dreffed her head) and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this warre, as it is reported, many fignes and wonders fell out. First of all, the city of PISAVRVM which was made a Colonie to Rome, and replenished with people by Antonius, standing upon the shore side of the sea Adriaticke, was by a terrible earth-quake funke into the ground. One of the images of stone which was fet vp in the honour of Intenius in the city of ALBA, did sweate many daies together: and though some wiped it away, yet it left not sweating still. In the city of PATRAS whilest Antonius was there, the temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning. And at the city of ATHENS also, in a place where the warre of the Giants against the gods is set out in Imagerie, the statue of Bacchue with a terrible wind was throwne downe in the Theater. It was faid, that Antonius came of the race of Hercules (as you have heard before,) and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus, and therfore he was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the fame bluftering forme of wind ouerthrew the great monftrous images at ATHENS, that were made in v honor of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named & intituled, The Astonians, and yet did they fourt none of the other images, which were many befides. The Admirall galley of Cleanatra was called Antoniade, in the which there chanced a maruellous ill figne: Swallowes had bredynder A the poope of her ship, and there came others after them that draue away the first, and plucked downe their neafts. Now when all things were ready, and that they drew neare to fight, it was found, that Antonius had no leffe then 500 good ships of war, among which there were many gallies that had eight and ten banks of oares, the which were fumptuoufly furnished, not so meet for fight, as for triumph: an hundred thousand footmen, and 12000 horsemen; and had with him to sower a aid him these kings & subjects following: Bocchus king of Lynin, Tarcondemus king of high C1- Sain Octa-LICIA, Archelans king of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus king of PAPHLAGONIA, Milbridgies king of Comage sa, and Adallas king of Thracia. Al which were there every main perfo. The re- had sight fidue that were abfent, fent their armies: as Polemon king of Pont, Manchus king of Anaria, Herodes king of Ivry; and furthermore Amyntas king of Lycaonia & of the Galatians: & be-the adding sides all there, he had aly aid the king of MEDEs fent vnto him. Now for Cefar, he had 250 ships of war, 80000 footmen, & well neare as many horsemen as his enemy Antonius, Antonius for his part had all under his dominion from Armenia & the river of Euphrases, unto the fea Ioniun & ILLYRICYM. Offenius C.efar had also for his part, all that which was in our Hemispher e or halfe part of the world, from Illyria unto the Ocean fea vpon the West; then all from the Ocean unto mare Siculum and from Africk E, all that which is against Italy, as Gavil and assument SPAINE. Furthermore, al from the province of Cyrenia to Ethiopia, was subject vnto Antonius, Now Antonius was made fo fubicct to a womans wil, that though he was a great deale the momen. ftronger by land, yet for Cleopatraes fake he would needs have this battell tried by feathough he faw beforehis eyes, that for lacke of water-men, his captaines did preft by force al forts of men raid by out of GREGE that they could take up in the field, as travellers, muletters, reapers, harveft-men, Clepatra, and yong boyes; and ver could they not fufficiently furnish his galleys; for that the most part of them were empty, and could feant row, because they lacked water-menenough. But on the contrary fide, C. afars ships were not built for pompe, high and great, onely for a fight and brauerie. but they were light of yarage, armed and fornished with water men as many as they needed, and had them all in readinesse in the banens of Tarentym and Bryndysiym. So Octanius C.e. keratile far fent vnto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his armic into bed of ITALY: and that for his owne part he would give him fafe harbour to land without any trouble; and that he would withdraw his army from the fea, as farre as one horse could runne, vntill dry of Nihe had put his army afhore, and had lodged his men. Antonius on the other fide brauely fent him egolia ha word again, and challenged the combat of him, man for man, though he were the elder and that * The grate ifhe refused him so, he would then fight a battell with him in the fields of Pharsal I a as Inline of the safe Cefar and Pompey had done before. Now whilest Amonius rode at anker, lying idly in harbour at the head of Activm in the place where the city of Nicopolis standeth at this present, Cofar had quickly passed the sea Ionium, and taken a place called Tony stable fore Antonius under- ing other stood that he hadtaken ship. Then began his men to be afraid, because his army by land-was left behind. But Clopatra making light of it; And what danger I pray you, faid the, if C. efar keepe equipments at * TORYNE: The next morning by breake of day, his enemies comming with full force of of this word oares in battell against him, Antonius was afraid, that if they came to ioyne, they would take which from and carry away his ships that had no men of warre in them. So he armed all his water-men, and man a afet them in order of battell vponthe fore-castell of their ships, and then lift vp all his rankes of to of alla. oares towards the element, as well on the one fide as on the other, with the prooes against the enemies, at the entrie and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point of Activ M: and fo to fear more kept them in order of battell, as if they had benearmed and furnished with water-men and fouldiers. Thus Octanins Cafar being finely deceined by this stratageme, retired presently, and therewithall Antonius very wifely and fuddenly did out him offfrom fresh water. For vnderstanding far fair by that the places where Octanius Cafar landed had very litle store of water, and yet very bad, he forming flutthem in with strong ditches and trenches he cast, to keepe them from failing out at their of the por.

pleasure, and so to go seeke water farther off. Furthermore, he dealt very friendly and course. oufly with Domitius, and against Cleopatraes mind. For he being sicke of an ague when he went and tooke a little boate to go vnto Cafars campe, Antonius was very forie for it, but yet he fent after him all his cariage, traine, and men; and the fame Domitius, as though he gaue him to vnderstand that he repented his open treason, died immediatly after. There were certaine kings and Deiota- also that for sooke him, and turned on Cafars side, as Amyntas and Deiotarus. Furthermore, his fleete and nauie that was vnfortunate in all things, and vnready for seruice, compelled himto change his mind, and to hazard battell by land. And Canidius also, who had charge of his army by land, when time came to follow Antonius determination, he turned him cleane contrary, and counselled him to fend Cleopatra backe againe, and himselfe to retire into MACEDON, to fight there on the maineland. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes king of the Garre promifed to aide him with a great power: and that it should be no shame nor dishonour to him to let Cafar have the fea, because himselfe and his men both had bene well practised and exercised in battels by sea, in the warre of Sicilia against Sextus Pompeius: but rather that he should do against all reason (he having so great skill and experience of battels by land as he had if he should not imploy the force and valiantnesse of so many lustic armed foor-men as he had readie, but would weaken his army by deuiding them into ships. But now, notwithstanding all these good perswasions, Cleopaira forced him to put all to the hazard of battell by sea: confidering with her selfe how she might flie and prouide for her safety, not to helpe him to winne the victory, but to flie more easily after the battell lost. Betwixt Antonius campe and his fleete of ships, there was a great high point of firme land that ranne a good way into the sea, the which Antonius vsed often for a walke, without mistrust of feare or danger. One of Casars men perceiued it, and told his master that he would laugh if they could take vp Antonius in the middest of his walke. Thereupon Cafar fent some of his men to lie in ambush for him, and they missed not much of taking him (forthey tooke him that came before him) because they discovered too foone, and fo Antonius feaped very hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by fea, he fet all the other ships on fire, but threescore ships of ÆGYPT, and reserved onely the best and greatest galleys, from three bankes vnto tenbankes of oares. Into them he put two and twenty thousand fighting men, with two thousand darters and slingers. Now as he was setting his men in order of battell, there was a Captaine, a valiant man, that had ferued Antonius in many battels and conflicts, and had all his body hacked and cut: who, as Antonius paffed by him, cried out vnto him, and faid: O noble Emperour, how commeth it to paffe that you trust to these vile brittle ships? What, do you mistrust these wounds of mine, and this sword? let the ÆGYPTIANS and PHOENICIANS fight by sea, and set vs on the maine land, where we vseto conquer, or to be flaine on our feete. Antonius paffed by him and faid neuera word, but onely beckened to him with his hand and head, as though he willed him to be of good courage, although indeed he had no great courage himfelfe. For when the masters of the galleys and pilots would have let their failes alone, he made them clap them on; faying to colour i matter withal, that not one of his enemics should scape. All that day and the three daies following, the sea rose fo high, and was fo boisterous, that the battell was put off. The fift day the storme ceassed, & the fea calmed againe, and then they rowed with force of oares in battell one against the other: Antonius leading the right wing with Publicola, and Calius the left, and Marcus Octavius, and Marcus Insteins the midst. Octavius Casar on the other side had placed Agrippa in the left wing of his army, and had kept the right wing for himselse. For the armies by land, Canidius was Generall of Antonius side, and Taurus of Casars side: who kept their men in battell ray, the one before the other, vpon the sea side, without stirring one against the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaines: Antonius being in a swift pinnace, was caried vp and downe by force of oares through his army, & spake to his people to encourage them to fight valiantly, as if they were on maine land, because of the steadinesse and heavinesse of their shippes: and commanded the pilots and masters of the galleys, that they should not stirre, none otherwise then if they were at anker, and so to receive the first charge of their enemies, and that they should not go out of the streight of the gulfe. Cefar betimes in the morning going out of his tent, to fee his shippes throughout, met a man by chance that draue an Asse before him: Casar asked the man what his name was. The poore man told him that his name was Eutychus, to say Fortunate: and his Asses name Nicon, to fay Conquerour. Therefore Cafar after he had wonne the battell, setting out the market place with the spurres of the galleys he had taken, for a signe of his victory, he caused also the man and his Affe to be fet up in braffe. When he had visited the order of his armie throughout he tooke a litle pinnace; and went to the right wing, and wondered when he faw his enemies lie stil in the streight, & stirred not. For discerning them a far off, men would have thought they had bene ships riding at anker: and a good while he was so perswaded. So, he kept his galleys eight furlongs from his enemies. About noone there arose a litle gale of wind from the sea, and then Antonius men waxing angry with tarying follong, and trufting to the greatnesse and height of their ships, as if they had bene inuincible, they began to march forward with their left wing. Cafar feeing that, was a glad man, and began a litle to give backe from the right wing, to allure them to come farther out of the streight and gulfe, to the end that he might with his light ships well manned with water-men, turne and enuirone the galleys of the enemies, the which were heavie of yarage, both for their bignesse, as also for lacke of water-men to row them. When the skirmish began, and that they came to joyne, there was no great hurt at the first meeting, neither did the ships vehemently hit one against the other, as they do commonly in fight by sea. For on the other fide, Antonius ships for their heavinesse could not have the strength and swiftnesses make their blowes of any force: and Cafars ships on the other side tooke great heed not to rush and shocke with the forecastels of Antonius ships, whose prowes were armed with great brazen fources. Furthermore they durft not flanke them, because their points were easily broken, which way focuer they came to fet vpon his ships, that were made of great maine square pecces of timber, bound together with great yron pins: fo that the battell was much like vnto a battell by land, or to speake more properly, to the affault of a city. For there were alwaies three or foure of Cafars thips about one of Antonius slips, and the fouldiers fought with their pikes, halbards and darts, and threw halbards and darts with fire. Antonius ships on the other side beflowed among them, with their crosbowes and engines of battery, great flore of flot from their high towers of wood that were fet upon their ships. Now Publicala seeing Agrippa put forth his left wing of Gefars army, to compaffe in Antonias ships that fought, he was driven also to loofe off to have more roome, and to go a litle at one fide, to put those farther off that were afraid, and in the middest of the battell: for they were fore distressed by Arruntius. Howbeit the battell was yet of even hand, and the victory doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when suddenly they faw thethreescore ships of Cleopatra busily about their yard-masts, and hoising saile to flie. So they fled through the middest of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behind the great ships, and did maruellously diforder the other ships. For the enemies themfelues wondered much to fee them faile in that fort, with full faile towards PELOPONNESVS. There Antonius shewed plainly, that he had not onely lost the courage and heart of an Emperour, but also of a valiant man; and that he was not his owneman (prouing that true which an old man spake in mirth, That the soule of a louer lived in another body, and not in his owne;)he The soule of was focaried away with the vaine loue of this woman, as if he had bene glued vnto her, and that action with in and she could not have removed without moving of him also. For when he saw Cleopatraes ship vn. sher body. der faile, he forgot, for sook, and betrayed them that fought for him, and imbarked vpon a galley distance. with five bankes of oares, to follow her that had already begun to overthrow him, and would in cleopard, the end be his veter destruction. When she knew his galley a farre off, she lift up a signe in the poope of her ship; and so Antonius comming to it, was pluckt vp where Cleopatra was: howbeit he saw her not at his first comming, nor she him, but went and sate downe alone in the prow of his ship, and faid neuer a word, clapping his head betweene both his hands. In the meane time came certaine light brigantines of Cafars, that followed him hard. So Antonius straight turned the prow of his flip, and prefently put the rest to flight, saving one Eurycles a LACED AMONIAN, that followed him neare, and preffed upon him with great courage, fliaking a dart in his hand ouerthe prow, as though he would have throwne it vnto Antonius feeing him, came to the fore-castell of his ship, and asked him what he was that durst follow Antonius so neare ? I am, answered he, Eurycles the son of Lachares, who through Casars good fortune seeketh to revenge the death of my father. This Lachares was condemned of fellonie, and beheaded by Antonius. But yet Eurycles durst not venture vpon Antonius ship, but set vpon the other Admirall galley (for there were two:) and fell vpon him with fuch a blow of his brazen fourre that was so heavy and bigge, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was loden with very rich stuffe and carriage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he turned againe to his place, and sate downe, fpeaking neuer a word, as he did before: and fo lived three dayes alone, without speaking to a. ny man. But when he arrived at the head of Tanarus, there Cleopatraes women first brought Antonius and Cleopatra to speake together, and afterwards to sup and lie together. Then began there againe a great number of merchants ships to gather about them, and some of their friends that had escaped from this ouerthrow, who brought newes, that his army by sea was ouerthrowne, but that they thought the army by land was yet whole. Then Antonius sent vnto Canidins, to returne with his army into Asia by Macedon. Nowfor himselfe, he determined to crosse ouer into Africke, and tooke one of his carects or hulkes loden with gold and filuer,& other rich cariage, & gaue it vnto his friends, comanding them to depart, and feeke to faue themfelues. They answered him weeping, that they would neither do it, nor yet forsake him. Then Antonius very courteously and louingly did comfort them, & prayed them to depart; and wrote VIITO Theophilus gouernour of Corinth, that he would feethem fafe, and helpe to hide them in some secret place, vntill they had made their way and peace with Cafar. This Theophilus was the father of Hipparchus, who was had in great estimation about Antonius. He was the first of all his enfranchifed bondmen that revolted from him, and yeelded vnto Gafar, and afterwards went and dwelt at Corinth. And thus it flood with Antonius. Now for his army by sea, that fought before the head or foreland of Activm, they held out a long time, and nothing troubled them more then a great boisterous wind that rose full in the prowes of their ships; and yet with much ado his nauic was at length ouerthrowne, flue houres within night. There were not flaine aboue fine thousandmen: but yerthere were three hundred shippestaken, as Octavius Casar writeth himselfe in his Commentaries. Many plainly saw Antonius flie, and yet could very hardlybeleeue it, that he that had nineteene legions whole by land, and twelue thouland horsemen voor the sea side, would so have for saken them, and have fled so cowardly, as if he had not oftentimes proued both the one & the other fortune, and that he had not bene throughly acquainted with the diverse changes and fortunes of battels. And yet his fouldiers still wished for him, and ever hoped that he would come by fome meanes or other vnto them. Furthermore, they frewed themselues so valiant and faithfull vnto him, that after they certainely knew he was fled, they kept themselues whole together seuen daies. In the end Canidius, Antonius Lieutenant, flying by night, and forfaking his campe, when they faw themselues thus destitute of their heads and leaders, they yeelded themselues vnto the stronger. This done, Casar sailed towards ATHENS, and there made peace with the GRECIANS, and denided the rest of the corne that was taken up for Antonins army, vnto the townes and cities of GRECE, the which had bene brought to extreme misery and pouerty, cleane without money, slaues, horse, and other beasts of carriage. So that my grandfather Nicarchus told, that all the citizens of our city of CHERONEA (not one excepted) were driven themselves to cary a certaine measure of corne on their shoulders to § sea side, that lieth directly ouer against the Ile of Anticyra, & yet were they drive thither with whips, They caried it thus but once: for the second time that they were charged againe to make the like cariage, all the corne being ready to be caried, newes came that Antonius had Iost the battell, and fo scaped our poorecity. For Antonius souldiers & deputies fled immediatly, & the citizens deuided the corne amongst them. Antonius being arrived in Lybia, he sent Cleopatra before into A-GYPT from the city of PAR ATONIVM; & he himselferemained very solitary, having onely two of his friends with him, with whom he wandered vp and downe both of them Orators, the one Aristocratesa GRECIAN, & the other Lucilius a Romaine of whom we have written in another place, that at the battel where Brutus was overthrowne, by the city of PHILIPPES, he came and willingly put himself into the hands of those that followed Brutus, saying that it was he; because Brutus in the meane time might have liberty to save himselfe. And afterwards, because Antonius faued his life, he still remained with him, & was very faithfull & friendly vnto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had trusted with the gouernment of Lybia, and vntowhom he had given the charge of his army there, had yeelded vnto Cafar, he was fo mad withall, that he would have flaine himfelfe for anger, had not his friends about him withstood him, & kept him from it. So he went vnto Alexandria, and there found Cleopatra about a woderfull enterprise, and of great attempt. Betwixt the red sea, and the sea betweene the lands that point vpon the coast of Ægypr, there is a litle peece of land that deuideth both the seas, and separateth Aprick E from Asia: the which streight is so narrow at the end where the two seas are narrowest, that it is not about three hundred furlongs ouer. Cleopatra went about to lift her thips out of the one sea, and to hale them ouer the banke into the other sea: that when her ships were come into the gulfe of ARABIA, she might then carie all her gold and siluer away, and so with a great company of men go and dwell in some place about the Ocean sea, farre from the fea Mediterraneum, to scape the danger and bondage of this warre. But now, because the A-RABIANS dwelling about the city of PETRA, did burne the first shippes that were brought to land, and that Antonius thought, that his army by land which heleft at Activm was yet whole, the left off her enterprise, and determined to keepe all the ports & passages of her realme. Antonius, he for sooke the city and company of his friends, and built him a house in the sea, by the Ile of Pharos, vpon certaine forced mounts which he caused to be cast into the sea, & dwelt there, Antonius as a man that banished himselfe from all mens company: saying that he would leade Timons life. followell hecause he had the like wrong offered him, that was before offered vnto Timon and that for the the life am vnthankfulnesse of those he had done good vnto, and whom he tooke to be his friends, he was Temon Miangry with all men, and would trust no man. This Timon was a citizen of ATHENS, that lived fantingpos about v war of Peloponnesvs, as appeareth by Plato and Aristophanes comedies; in the which they mocked him, calling him a viper and malicious man vnto mankind, to shun all other mens Tlato and companies, but the company of young Alcibiades, a bold and infolent youth, whom he would greatly feast and make much of, and kissed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked ny of Timen him the cause whathe meant to make so much of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Misanthro minte cause what he meant to make so much of that young man about, and to hate all others.

For, what he was to the ATHENIANS. This Timon fomtimes would have Apemantus in his company, because he wasmuch like of his nature and conditions, and also followed him in manner of life. On a time when they folemnly celebrated the feast called Chox at ATHENS, (to wit, the feasts of the dead where they make sprinklings and sacrifices for the dead and that they two then feasted together by themselves, Apemantus said vnto the other: O here is a trim banquet Timon. Timon answered againe: Yea, said he, so thou wert not here. It is reported of him also, that this Timon on a time (the people being affembled in the market place about dispatch of some affaires) got vp into the pulpit for Orations, where the Oratours commonly vse to speake vnto y people: and silence being made, enery man liftening to heare what he would fay, because it was a wonder to see him in that place, at length he beganto speake in this manner: My Lords of ATHENS, I have a little yardat my house where there groweth a figge tree, on the which many citizens have hanged themselues; and because I meane to make some building on the place, I thought good to let you all vnderstand it, that before the figgetree be cut downe, if any of you be desperate, you may there in time go hang your felues. He died in the city of HALES, and was buried vpon the sea side. Now it chanced so, that the sea getting in, it compassed his tombe round about, that no man could come to it: and vpon the same was written this Epitaph:

Here lies a wretched corse, of wretched soule bereft : Seeke not my name: a plague consume you wicked wretches left.

Itis reported that Timon himselfe, when he lived, made this Epitaph: for that which is commonly rehearsed, was not this, but made by the Poet Callimachus:

Here lye I Timon, who aline all lining men did hate: Passe by and curfe thy fill : but passe, and stay not here thy gaie.

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this little shall suffice at this present. But now to returne to Antonius againe. Canidius himselfe came to bring him newes, that he had lost all his army by land at Activm: on the other fide he was aduertifed also, that Herodes king of Ivare, who had also certaine legions and bands with him, was revolted vnto Casar, and al the other kings in like maner: fo that fauing those that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwithstanding did nothing trouble him: and it feemed that he was contented to forgo all his Alexandria hope, and so to be rid of all his cares and troubles. Thereupon he left his solitary house he had built by the sea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopaira received him into her royall pallace. He was no foonercome thither, but he ftraight fet all the city on rioting & banquetting againe, throw. and himselfe to liberalitie and gifts. He caused the son of Iulius Casar and Cleopaira, to be enrol- Toga viris led (according to the manner of the ROMAINES) amongst the number of young men; and gaue Antyllus the Anyllus, his eldeft son he had by Fuluia, the mans gowne, the which was a plaine gowne without eldeft son of gard or embroderie, of purple. For these things, there was kept great feasting, banquetting and by his wife dancing in ALEXANDRIA many daies together. Indeed they did break their first order they had Faluis. LILLA turning his head at one fide, he thrust his sword into himselfe, and fell downe dead at his masters foote, Then faid Antonius: ô noble Eros, I thanke thee for this, and it is valiantly done of thee, to shew me what I should do to my selfe, which thou couldest not doc for me. Therewithall he tooke his fword, and thrust it into his belly, and so fell downey ponalittle bed. The wound he had, killed him not presently, for the bloud stinted a litle when he was laide; and when he came fomewhat to himselfe againe, he prayed them that were about him, to dispatch him. But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out tormenting himselfe: vntill at the last there came a Secretarie vnto him(called Diomedes) who was commanded to bring him into the tomb or monument where Cleopatra was. When he heard that she was aliue, he very earnestly prayed his men to carie his body thither, and so he was caried in his mens armes into the entry of the monument. Notwithstanding, Cleopatra would not open the gates, but came to the high windowes, and cast out certaine chaines and ropes, in the which Antonius was trussed: and Cleonara her owne selfe, with two women onely, which she had suffered to come with her into these monuments, trifed Antonius vp. They that were present to behold it, said they never saw so pitiful a fight. For they plucked vp poore Antonius all bloudy as he was, and drawing on with panes of death:who holding up his hands to Cleopatra, raifed up himfelfe as well as he could It was a hard thing for these women to do, to lift him vp:but Cleopatra stooping down with her head, putting too all her strength to her vetermost power, did lift him vp with much ado, and neuer let go her hold, with the helpe of the women beneath that bad her be of good courage, & were as foryto fee her labour so, as she her selfe. So when she had gotten him in after that fort, and laid him on a bed, she rent her garments vpon him, clapping her breast, and scratching her face and stomacke. Then she dried up his bloud that had bewrayed his face, & called him her Lord, her husband, & Emperor, forgetting her own misery and calamity, for the pity and compassion she took of him. Antonius made her ceasse her lamenting, & called for wine, either because he was a thirst, orese for that he thought thereby to hasten his death. When he had drunke, he earnestly prayed her. and perswaded her, that she would seeke to saue her life, if she could possible, without reproch& dishonour: and that chiefly she should trust Proculeius aboue any man else about Casar. And as for himselfe, that she should not lament nor sorow for the miserable change of his fortuneat the end of his daies; but rather that the should thinke him the more fortunate, for the formertriumplies and honors he had received; confidering that while he lived, he was the noblest & greatest Prince of the world, & that now he was ouercome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a ROMAINE by another ROMAINE. As Antoniess gaue the last gaspe, Proculeius came that was sent from Cafare For after Antonius had thrust his fword in himself, as they caried him into the combs and monuments of Cleopatra, one of his guard (called Dercetaus) took his fword with the which he had ftriken himselfe, and hid it: then he secretly stole away, and brought Ottanius Casar the first newes of his death, and showed him his sword that was bloudied. Cafar hearing this newes, straight withdrew himselfe into a secret place of his tent, and there burst out with teares, lamenting his hard and miserable fortune, that had bene his friend and brother in law, his equal in the Empire, and companion with him in fundry great exploits and battels. Then he called for all his friends and shewed them the letters Amonius had written to him, and his answers also fent him againe, during their quarrell and strife: and how fiercely and proudly the other answered him, to alliust and reasonable matters he wrote vnto him. After this, he sent Proculeius, and commanded him to do what he could possible to get Cleopatra aliue, fearing lest otherwise all the treasure would be lost:and furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra, and bring her aliue to Rome, she would maruellously beautifie and set out his triumph. But Cleopatra would never put her selse into Proculeius hands, although they spake together. For Proculeius came to the gates that were thicke and strong, and surely barred, but yet there were some cranewes, through the which her voice might be heard, and so they without vnderstood, that Cleopatra demanded the kingdome of ÆGYPT for her fonnes: and that Proculeius answered her: That she should be of good cheare, and not be affraid to referre all vnto Cafar. After he had viewed the place very well, he came and reported her answer vnto Casar . who immediatly sent Gallus to speake once againe with her, and bad him purposely hold her in talke, whilest Proculeius did set vp a ladder against that high window by the which Antonius was trifed vp, and came downe into the monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra stood to heare what Gallus said vnto her. One of her women which was thut vp in her monuments with her, faw Processleius by chance as herame downe, and skreeked out : O poore Cleopatra, thou artitaken. Then when the faw Proculeius behind her as the came from the gate, the thought to have stabbed her felfe in with a fhortdagger she wore of purpose by her side. But Proculeius came sodainly vpon her, and taking clopaira her by both the hands, faid vnto her: Cleopatra, first, thou shalt do thy selfe great wrong, and secondly, vnto Cafar, to depriue him of the occasion and oportunity, openly to shew his bounrie and mercy, and to give his enemies cause to accuse the most courteous and noble Prince that cuer was, and to appeach him, as though he were a cruell and mercilesse man, that were not to betrusted. So euen as he spake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and shooke her clothes for feare of any poyfon hidden about her. Afterwards, Cafar fent one of his infranchifed men called Epophroditus, whom he straightly charged to looke well vnto her, and to beware in anv effethat the made not her felfe away: and for the rest, to vse her with all the courtesse possible. And for himselfe, he in the meane time entred the city of ALEXANDRIA, and (as he went) talked with the Philosopher Arrius, and held him by the hand, to the end that his countrymen Celar tooke fould reuerence him the more, because they saw Casar so highly esteeme and honour him. the city of Then he went into the shew-place of exercises, and so vp to his chaire of stars which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commandement, all the people of A. greatly ho. region min of a great neight: and there according to the community knees before him, and rius the craued mercy. C.efar bad them all stand vp, and told them openly that he forgane the people, Philosopher. and pardoned the fellonies and offences they had committed against him in this warre. First, for the founders sake of the same city, which was Alexander the Great: secondly, for the beauty of the city, which he much esteemed and wondered at : thirdly for the lone he bare vnto his very friend Arrius. Thus did Cafar honour Arrius, who craued pardon for himselfe and many others, and specially for Philostratus, the eloquentest man of all the Sophisters and Orators of histime, for present and sodaine speech: howbeit, he falsely named himselfean Academicke Philosopher. Therefore Casar that hated his nature and conditions, would not heare his suite. Therupon he let his gray beard grow long, and followed Arrius step by step in a long mourning gowne, still buzzing in his eares this Greeke verse:

A wise man, if that he be wise indeed, May by a wife man have the better speed.

Cafar vnderstanding this, not for the defire he had to deliuer Philostratus of his feare, but to ridde Arrius of malice and envie that might have fallen out against him, he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius fonnes, Antyllus, his eldest sonne by Fuluia was slaine, because his schoolemaster Antyllus, Theodorus did betray him vnto the fouldiers, who strake off his head. And the villaine tooke a eldest sonby precious stone of great value from his necke, the which he did sow in his girdle, and afterwards Fuluia, denied that he had it: but it was found about him, and so Cafar trussed him vp for it. For Cleopatracschildren, they were very honourably kept, with their gouernours & traine that waited on them. But for Cafarior, who was faid to be Iulius Cafars fonne, his mother Cleopatra had fent him VIIIO Y INDIAN'S through ÆTHIOPIA, with a great fumme of mony. But one of his gouerners alfocalled Rhodon, even fuch another as Theodorus, perfwaded him to returne into his countrey, and told him that Cefar fent for him to give him his mothers kingdome. So, as Cefar was determining with himselfe what he should do, Arrins said vnto him:

Too many Cafars is not good. Alluding vnto a certaine verse of Homer, that faith: Too many Lords doth not well.

Therefore Cafar did put Cafarion to death, after the death of his mother Cleopatra. Many Princes, great Kings and Captaines did crave Antonius body of Octavius Cafar, to give him honourableburiall: but Cefar would neuer take it from Cleopatra, who did sumptuously and royally burie him with her own hands, whom Cafar fuffered to take as much as she would to bestow vppon his funerals, Now was shealtogether ouercome with sorow and passion of mind, for she had burieth Anknocked her brest so pitifully, that she had martyred it, and in diuers places had raised vicers & sonius. inflammations, fo that she fell into a feuer withall: whereof she was very glad, hoping thereby to have good colour to abstaine from meate, and that so she might have died easily without any trouble. She had a Phisitian called olympus, whom she made priny to her intent, to the end he should helpe to ridher out of her life; as Olympus writeth himself, who wrote a book of all these Clepatrase things. But Casar mistrusted the matter, by many coniectures he had, and therefore did puther Phistian.

in feare, and threatned her to put her children to shamefull death. With these threates, Cleopatra for feareyeelded ftraight, as she would have yeelded vnto strokes: and afterwards suffered her selfe to becured and dieted as they listed. Shortly after, Casar came himselfe in person to see her, and to comfort her. Cleopatra being layed vpon a litle low bed in poore estate (when she saw Ce. far come into her chamber,) fodenly rose vp, naked in her smocke, and sell downe at his seete maruellously disfigured: both for that she had plucked her haire from her head, as also forthat the had martyred all her face with her nailes; and befides, her voice was finall and trembling, her eyes funk into her head with continuall blubbering; and moreouer, they might fee the most part of her stomacke torne in funder. To be short, her body was not much better then her mind:yet her good grace & comlinesse, and the force of her beauty was not altogether defaced. But notwithstanding this vgly and pitifull state of hers, yet she shewed her selfe within, by her outward lookes and countenance. When Cefar had made her lie downe againe, and fate by her beds side; Cleopatra began to cleare and excuse her selfe for that she had done, laying all to the seare she had of Antonius: Cafar in contrary manner, reproued her in every point. Then she suddenly altered her speech, and prayed him to pardon her, as though she were affraid to dye, and defirous to liue. At length, she gaue him a briefe and memoriall of all the ready mony and treasure she had, But by chance there stood one Seleucus by, one of her Treasurers, who to seeme, a good servant, came straight to Cafar to disproue Cleopatra, that she had not set in all, but kept many things back of purpose. Cleopatra was insuch a rage with him, that she slew upon him, and tooke him by the haire of the head, and boxed him well fauouredly. Cafar fell a laughing & parted the fray. Alas, faid she, ô Cafar: is not this a great shame and reproch, that thou having vouchsafed to take the paines to come vnto me, and done me this honor, poore wretch, & caitife creature, brought into this pitifull and miferable state: and that mine owne servants should come now to accuse me. though it may be I have referred fome iewels and trifles meet for wome, but not for me(poore foule) to fet out my felfe withall, but meaning to give some pretie presents and gifts vnto offs. nius and Liuia, that they making means and interceffion for me to thee, thou mightest yetextend thy fauour and mercy vpon me. Cafar was glad to heare her fay fo, perswading himselfethereby that she had yet a desire to saucher life. So he made her answer, that he did not only give her that to dispose of at her pleasure; which she had kept back, but further promised to vie her more honourably and bountifully, then she would thinke for: and so he tooke his leave of her, supposing he had deceived her, but indeed he was deceived himselfe. There was a yong Gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cafars very great familiars, and besides didbeare no ill will vnto Cleopatra, He sent her word secretly (as she had requested him) that Cesar determined to take his iourny through Syria, & that within three daies he would fend her away before with her children. When this was told Cleopatra, she requested Cafar that it would please him to suffer herto offer the last oblations of the dead, vnto the soule of Antonius. This being granted her, she was caried to the place where his tombe was, and there falling downe on her knees, embracing the tombe with her women, the teares running downe her cheeks, she began to speake in this fort.O my deare Lord Antonius, it is not long fithence I buried thee here, being a free woman: & now I offer vnto thee the funerall sprinklings and oblations, being a captine and prisoner; and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing and murthering this captive body of mine with blowes, which they carefully guardand keepe, onely to triumph of thee: looke therefore henceforth for no other honors, offerings, nor facrifices from me: for these are the last which Cleopatra can give thee, fith now they carie her away. Whilest we lined together, nothing could seuer our companies: but now at our death, I feare me they will make vs change our countries. For as thou being a Romain, hast bene buried in Ægypt : euen so wretched creature I an Ægyptian, shall be buried in ITALY, which shall be all the good that I have received by thy country. If therefore the gods where thou art now haue any power & authority, fith our gods here haue forfaken vs, fuffer not thy true friend and louer to be caried away aliue, that in me they triumph of thee: but receiue me with thee, and let me be buried in one selfe tombe with thee. For though my grieses and miscries be infinit, yet none hath grieued me more, nor that I could lesse beare withall, then this small time which I have bene driven to live atone without thee. Then having ended these dolefull plaints, and crowned the tombe with garlands & fundry no fegayes, and maruellous louingly embraced the same, she commanded they should prepare her bath, and when she had bathed and washed herselfe, she fell to her meate, and was sumptuously served. Now whilest she was at dinner, there came a countriman and brought her a basket. The fouldiers that warded at the gates, asked him straight what he had in his basket. He opened his basket, and tooke out the leanes that couered the figs, and shewed them that they were figs he brought. They all of them maruelled to see so goodly figges. The countrieman laughed to heare them, and bad them take some if they would. They believed he told them truly, and so bad him carie them in. After Cleapatra had dined, she sent a certaine table written and scaled vnto Casar, and commanded them all to go out of the tombes where she was, but the two women; then she shut the doores to her. Cafar when he received this table, and began to reade her lamentation and petition, requefling him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, found straight what she meant, and thought to have gone thither himselfe: howbeir, he sent one before in all hast that might be, to feewhat it was. Her death was very sodaine: for those whom Cafar sent vnto her, ran thither in of Cleopaall hast possible, and found the fouldiers standing at the gate, mistrusting nothing, nor understanding of her death. But when they had opened the doores, they found Cleopatra starke dead, laid vpon a bed of gold, attired and arrayed in her royall robes, and one of her two women, which was called Iras, dead at her feet; and her other woman (called Charmion) half dead, & trembling, ting women trimming the Diademe which Cleopatra wore vpon her head. One of the foldiers feeing her, angrily said vnto her: Is that well done Charmion? Very well, said she againe, and meete for a Printeffe descended from the race of so many noble Kings: she said no more, but fel down dead hard by the bed. Some report, that this Afpicke was brought vnto her in the basket with figs, and that the had commanded them to hide it under the fig leaves, that when the should think to take out the figs, the Afpicke should bite her before she should see her: howbeit, that when she wold have taken away the leaves for the figs, she perceived it, and said, Art thou herethen. And so her arme being naked, she putitto the Aspicke to be bitten. Other say againe, she kept it in aboxe, & that cleopatra hedid pricke and thrust it with a spindle of gold, so that the Aspicke being angred withall, leapt the bing out with great furic, and bit her in the arme. How beit few can tell the troth. For they report also, of an affi that she had hidden poyfon in a hollow razor which she caried in the haire of her head; and yet was there no mark feene on her body, or any figne differened that the was poyfoned, neither also did they finde this serpent in her tombe: but it was reported only that there was seene certaine fresh steppes or tracks where it had gone, on the tombe side toward the sea, and specially by the doore side. Some say also, that they found two litle prety bitings in her arme, scant to be discerned:the which it feemeth Cafar himfelfe gaue credit vnto, because in his triumph he caried cleopatraes image, withan Afpicke biting of her arme. And thus goeth the report of her death, Now Cefar, though he was maruellous forie for the death of cleopatra, yet he wondered at her noble mind and courage, and therefore commanded the should be nobly buried, and layed by Antonius and willed also that her two women should have honourable buriall. Cleopatra died being eight and thirty years old, after she had reigned two and twenty yeares, and gouerned about fourteene of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, some say that he lived three and fifty yeares: and others fay, fixe and fiftie. All his statues, images, and mettals, were plucked downe and ouerthrowne, fauing those of Cleopatra, which stood still in their places, by meanes of Archibius Cleopatra one of her friends, who gaue Cafar a thousand talents that they should not be handled as those of Antonius were. Antonius left seuen children by three wives, of the which, Cafar did put Antyllus (the eldest sonhe had by Faluia) to death. Ostauia his wife tooke all the rest, and brought them vp with hers, and maried Cleopatra, Antonius daughter, vnto king Iuba, a maruellous courteous & goodly Prince. And Antonius (the fon of Fuluia) came to be fo great, that next vnto Agrip- of Antonia ps, who was ingreatest estimation about Cafar; and next vnto the children of Linia, which were " The the second in estimation: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octavia having had two daughters perours, by her first husband Marcellus, & a fon also called Marcellus, Cafar maried his daughter vnto that Marcellus, and so did adopt him for his son. And Octavia also maried one of her daughters vnto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was dead, after he had bene maried awhile. Octavia perceiving that her brother Cafar was very busie to chuse some one among his friends, who he trusted best to make his sonne in law, she perswaded him, that Agrippa should marie his daughter (Marcellus widow) and leave her owne daughter. Cafar first was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and so she afterwards tooke away her daughter and maried her vnto Antonius; & Agrippa maried Iulia, Cafars daughter. Now there remained two daughters more of Octavia and Antonius: Domitius Anobarbus maried the one; and the other, which was Antonia, so faire and vertuous a young

Ladie, was maried vnto Drusus the sonne of Liuia, and sonne in law of Casar. Of this mariane came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwards came to be Emperor. And of the sonnes of Germanicus, the one whose name was Caius, came also to be Emperour: who after he had licentiously reigned a time, was flaine, with his wife and daughter. Agrippina also (hauing a fonne by her first husband Anobarbus, called Lucius Domitius) was afterwards maried vnto Cledins, who adopted her fonne, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperour in our time, who slue his owne mother, and had almost destroyed the Empire of Rome, through his madnesse and wicked life, being the fifth Emperour of Rome after Antonius.

Demetrius with Antonius.

The power of Demetrises and AnOw, sithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them. much like to the other, hauing fortune alike divers & variable vntothe, let vs therfore come to confider their power & authority, and how they came to be so great. First of all, it is certaine that Demetrius power and greatnes fell vnto him by inheritance fro his father Antigonus: who became the greatest & mightiest Prince of all the successors of Alexander, and had won the most part of As IA, before Demetrius came of fullage. Antonius in contrary manner, borne of an honest man, who otherwise was no man of war, & had not left him any meane to arife to fuch greatnesse, durst take vpon him to contend for the Empire with Cafar that had no right vnto it by inheritance, but yet madehimfelfe successor of the power, the which the other by great paine and trauell had obtained, and by his own industry became so great, without the helpe of any other, that the Empire of the whole world being deuided into two parts, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greatest countenance and power. Antonius being absent, oftentimes ouercame the PARTHIANS in battell by his Lieutenants, and chased away the barbarous peopledwelling about mount Caucasus, vnto the sea Hyrcanium, insomuch as the thing they most reproue him for, did most witnesse his greatnesse. For, Demetrius father made him gladly marie Phila, Antipaters daughter, although she was too old for him: because she was of a nobler house then himselfe. Antonius on the other fide was blamed for marying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for her power and nobility of bloud, excelled all other kings in her time, but Arfaces: & morcouer, made himself so great, that others thought him worthy of greater things, then he himselfe required. Now for the desire that moved the one and the other to conquer Realmes, the defire of Demetrius was vnblameable and iust, desiring to reigne ouer people which had bene gouerned at all times, and desired to be gouernedby Kings. But Antonius defire was altogether wicked and tyrannicall, who fought to keepethe people of Rome in bondage and subjection, but lately before rid of Casars reigne and government. For the greatest and most famous exploite Antonius ever did in warres (to wit, the Demetrisus and Antonius ambition to gowarre, in the which he ouerthrew Cassus and Bratus) was begun to no other end, but to deprive his countrimen of their liberty and freedome. Demetrius in contrary manner, before fortune had offerthrowne him, neuer left to fet GRECE at liberty, and to drive the garrifons away, which kept the cities in bondage; and not like Antonius, that boafted he had flaine them that had fet ROME at liberty. The chiefest thing they commended in Antonius was his liberality and bountie in the which Demetrius excelled him fo farre, that he gaue more to his enemies, then Antonius did to his friends: although he was maruellously well thought of, for the honourable and Denetrius fimptuous funerallhegaue vnto Brutus body. Howbeit Demetrius caused all his enemies to be of amoniburied that were flaine in battell, and returned vnto Ptolomie all the prisoners he had taken, with great gifs and presents he gaue them. They were both in their prosperity, very riotously and licentionfly given: but yet no man can ever fay, that Demetrius did at any time let flip any oportunity or occasion to follow great matters, but onely gaue himselse indeed to pleasure, when he had nothing elfe todo. And further, to fay truly, he took pleafure of Lamia, as a man would have adelight to heare one tell tales, when he hath nothing elfe to do, or is defirous to fleepe; but indeed when he was to make any preparation for war, he had not then Iuie at his darts end, nor had his helmet perfumed, nor came out of the Ladies closets picked and prince to go to battell: buthe let all dancing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides saith:

But to conclude, he neuer had ouerthrow or misfortune through negligence, nor by delaying time to follow his owne pleasure; as we see in painted tables, where Omphale secretly stealeth away Hercules clubbe, and tooke his Lyons skinne from him: euen fo Cleopatra Oftentimes ynarmed Antonius, and enticed him to her, making him lose matters of great importance, and very needfull iournies, to come and be dandled with her, about the rivers of Canobus, and Taphofiris. In the end, as Paris fled from the battell, and went to hide himselfe in Helens armes: even so f. did he in Cleopatraes armes; or to speake more properly, Paris hid himselfe in Helens closer, but Antonius (to follow Cleopatra) fled and lost the victory. Furthermore, Demetrius had many Demetrius wises that he had maried, and all at one time: the which was not disallowable or not forbidden by the kings of Mac E DON, but had bene vsed from Philip and Alexanders time; as also king Lysimathus and Ptolomy had; and did honour all them that he maried. But Antonius first of all maried twowiues together, the which neuer Romaine durst do before, but himselfe. Secondly, he the first put away his first Romaine wife, which he had lawfully maried, for the loue of a strange woman, he fondly fell in fancie withall, and contrary to the lawes and ordinances of ROME. And therefore Demetrius mariages neuer hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his wives: but Antonius contrarily, was vindone by his wines. Of althe lascinious parts Antonius played, none were foabhominable, as this only fact of Demetrius. For the Historiographers write, that they would Demetrius notluffer doggestocome into the castle of ATHENS, because of all beasts he is too busie with lasensians bitcherie: and Demetrius, in Mineruaes temple it felfe lay with Curtifans, and there defiled many citizens wines. And befides all this, the horrible vice of cruelty, which a man would thinke fefficial in were least mingled with these wanton delights, is joyned with Demetrius concupiscence: who file, because fuffered (or more properly, compelled) the good lieft young boy of ATHENS, to die a most piti- of buthery. full death, to faue himselfe from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinencie, did no hurt but to himselse, and Demetrius did hurt vnto all others. Demetrius neuer impiery, the hurrany of his friends: but Antonins suffered his Vncle by his mothers side to be flaine, that he fath and might have his will of Cicero to kill him: a thing to damnable, wicked, and cruell of it felfe, that Demetring he hardly deserved to have bene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, to have faued his Vncles and Annone, life. Now where they falfified and brake their oaths, the one making Artabazus prisoner, and the ". other killing of Alexander, Antonius out of doubt had best cause, and instest colour: for Artabazus had betrayed him, and forfaken him in MEDIA. But Demetrius (as divers do report) devised afalle matter to accuse Alexander, to cloke the murther he had committed: and some thinke, he didaccuse him, to whom he himselfe had done iniurie vnto : and was not reuenged of him, that pemetrini would do him iniurie. Furthermore, Demetrius himselfe did noble feates of warre, as we have and daterecited of him before; and contrarily, Antonius, when he was not there in person, wanne mahy famous and great victories by his Lieutenants: and were both ouerthrowne being personally in battel, but yet not both after one fort. For the one was for saken of his men being MACE-DONIANS, & the other contrarily for sooke his that were ROMAINBS: for he fled, and left them that ventured their lives for his honour. So that the fault the one did, was, that he made them his enemics that fought for him: and the fault in the other, that he so beastly left them that loued him best. & were most faithfull to him. And for their deaths, a man cannot praise the one or the other, but yet Demetrius death was the more reprochfull for he suffered himself to be taken prifoner, and when he was fent away tobe kept in a strange place, he had the heart to line yet three yeares longer, to serue his mouth and belly, as brute beafts do. Antonius on the other side, some himselfe (to confesse a troth) cowardly, and miserably, to his great paine and griefe; and yet was it before his body came into his enemies hands.

Artaxerxes.

The baren . sage of Are Baxerxes Alnemon.

Rtaxerxes, the first of this name of all the kings of Persia, anobleand courteous Prince as any of all his house, was surnamed Long-hand because his right hand was longer then his left; and he was the son of king Xerxes. But the second, whose life we presently intend to write, was surnamed Mnemo, as much to fay, Great memory: & he was the fon of the daughter of the first Artaxerxes. For king Darius, and his wife Parysaus, had foure sons, of the which, the eldest was this Artaxerxes, the second Cyrus, and two other yonger, Oftanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning barethe name of the former ancient Cyrus, which in the PER-

SIAN tong fignifieth the Sun. But Arraxerxes was called before Arficas, although Dinon writeth, that he was called oarfes. Howbeit it is vnlikely, that Ctesias (although his bookes otherwisebe full of fables, and as vntrue as they are fond) should forget the name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he ferued, and continually followed, both him, his wife and children. Cyrus from his cradle was of a hot stirring mind, and Artaxerixes in contrary manner, more mild and gentle in all his actions & doings. He was maried to a very faire Ladie, by his father & mothers commandement: and afterwards kept her against their wils, being forbidden by them. For king Darius his father, hauing put his sonnes wives brother to death, he would also have put her to der h: but her husband with teares made such humble suite to his mother for her, that with much ado, hedid not onely get pardon for her life, but grant also that she should not be put from him. This notwithstanding, his mother alwaies loued Cyrus better then him, and prayed that he might be king after his fathers death. Wherefore Cyrus being in his prouinces of Asia by the sea side, when he was sent for to come to the Court, at what time his father lay sick of the disease he died he went thither in good hope his mother had prevailed with his father, that in his will he would make him his heire of the realme of Persia. For his mother Pary sailedged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did helpe king Xerxes in the like case, through Demaratus counsell. She said that Arsicas was borne before her husband Darius was king, and Crus after he was crowned king. All this could not prevaile: for her eldeft fon Arficas, furnamed Cyrus after he was crowned king. Allthis could not preuante: for never ton any two series of Artaxerxes, was affigned king of Persia, and Cyrus gouerhor of Lydia, and the kings Lieutenantgeneral of allthe low-countries of Asia toward y fea fide. Shortly after king Darius death, affigued to be king of Perfia. the new king Artaxerxes went vnto Pasargades, there to be consecrated and annointed king by the Priests of y country of PERSIA. The place of this Pasargades, is a temple dedicated vnto Minerua the goddesse of battels, as I take it, where the new king must be consecrated; and when he nerna the goddene of Dattels, as I take it, where the new king mult be conferrated; and wheth the cometh into the temple, he putteth off his gowne, and putteth on that which the old ancient Cyting of the rus wore before he was king. Furthermore, he must eate of a certain tart or fricacie made of figs kings of with turpentine; and then he must drinke a drinke made with vineger and milke. There are also certaine other secret ceremonies which they must keepe, & none do know, but the very Priests themselues. Now Artaxernes being ready to enterinto all these ceremonics, Tisaphernes came vnto him, and brought him one of the Priests that had bene Cyrus schoolemaster in his youth, and had taught him Magicke; who by reason should have bene more offended then any man else, for that he was not appointed king. And this was the cause why they beleeved him the better, when he accused Cyrus; for he said: That Cyrus had conspired treason against the king his brothers owne person, and that he meant traiter ously to kill him in the temple, when he should put fed with him off his gowne. Some do report, that Cyrus was appreheded vpon this simple accusation by word ofmouth. Others write also, that Cyrus came into the temple, and hiding himselfe, he was taken with the maner, and bewrayed by the Priest. So, as he was going to suffer death, his mother took Cyrus in her armes, and wound the haire of her head about his necke, and tied him straightly to Note the her: and withall she wept so bitterly, and made such pitifull mone vnto the king her sonne, that fixtery and through her interceffion, the king granted him his life, and fent him againe into his country and sinn of a gouernment. But this satisfied not Cyrus, neither did he so much remember the king his brothers woman. fauour vnto him, in granting this his life, as he did the despite he had offered him, to be made prisoner. Insomuch that for this grudge and cuill will, he euer after had a greater desire then before to be king. Some writers alledge, that he entred into actuall rebellion against his brother by force of armes, because he had not sufficient reuenue to defray the ordinarie expence of his house: howbeit it is a meere folly to say so. For though he had had no other helpe but his mother, he might have had of her what he would have taken and defired. Againe, to shew that of himselfe he had ability enough, we need but alledge the souldiers and strangers he gaue pay vnto in divers places, (as Xenophon writeth.) For he brought them not all together into one army, because he desired to keepe his enterprise as secret as he could: but he had friends and servants that leauied them in diverfe places, and vnder diverfe colours. And furthermore, he had his mother alway about the king, that cleared all suspitions conceived against him. He himselfe also on the other fide, whilest he made these preparations, wrote very humbly vnto his brother, fometime asking fomewhat of him, and another time accusing Tisaphernes: all to blind the king, tomake him thinke that he bent all his malice and spite against him; besides that, the king of his ownenature was somewhat dull and slow, which the comon people thought to proceed of his courtesie & good nature. At his first coming to the crown, he followed the first Artaxerxes good- Artaxerxes nesse and courtesse, by whom he had his name. For he gaue more easie audience vnto suiters : he and esse to didalfo more honorably reward and recompence those that had deserved well: and he vsed sich have accepted moderation in punishing of offenders, that it appeared he did it not of any malicious mind & defire of reuenge, nor yet of will to hurt any man. When he had any thing given him, he took it as thankfully, as they offered it him, and did as willingly and frankly also give againe. For, how litle athing soeuer was offered him, he took it wel. And it is reported, that one Romifes on a time prefenting him a maruellous faire pomegranate: By the Sun(faid he) this man in a short time, of a litle towne would make a great city, if he were made gouernor of it. Another time there was a poore labourer feeing enery man give the king a present, some one thing, some another, as he passed by them : he having nothing at hand to give him, ranto the rivers side, and tooke both his hands full of water, and came and offered it him. King Artaxerxes was so glad of it, that he sent him in a cup of massie gold, athousand Dareckes, which were peeces of gold so named, because the image of Darius was stamped vponthem. And vnto one Euclidas a LACED EMONIAN, that presumed to giue him bold words, it pleased him to answer by one of his Captaines: Thou maist fay what thou list; and I as king, may fay and do what I list. Another time as he was an hunting; Tiribazus shewedthe king his gowne that was all to tattered: Well, said the king, and what wouldest thou haue metodo: Tiribazus answered him, I pray your Grace take another, and giue me that you have on. The king did so, and told him: TiribaZus, I give thee my gowne, but I command thee not to weare it. Tiribazus tooke it, and cared not for the kings commandement that he should not weare it; not that he was any cuill disposed man, but because he was a fond lightheaded fellow that cared for nothing: thereupon hestraight put the kings gowne on his backe, and not contented therewith, he did besides set on many iewels of gold which kings onely are wont to weare, and womens trinkets and ornaments. Therewith all euery man in the Court mur. mured at him, because it was a presumption, directly against the lawes and ordinances of P_{BR} s 1 A. Howbeit the king but laughed at it, and told him: I give thee leave Tiribazus to weare those womens gawds as a woman, & the kings robe as a foole. Furthermore, where the maner wasin PERSIA, that no person sate at the kings boord, but his mother & wife, of the which, his mother fate vppermost, and his wife lowermost: Artaxerxes made his two brethren Ostanes and Oxathres fit at his own boord; but yet he pleased the Persians best of al, because he was content his wife Statyra should sit openly in her chariot, and that she might be seene and reverenced by the other Ladies of the countrey. And this made him fingularly beloued of the people. Now, such as defired innovation & change, & that could not away with quiet life, gaue out, that the Realme of PERSIA required such a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberall of nature, giuen to armes, and greatly rewarded his fernants; and that the greatnesse of the Empire of PERSIA stood in need of a king, whose mind was bent to high attempts and noble enterprises. So Cyrus thereupon began to make warre vpon his brother, not only trusting vnto them that were of the low countries about him, but hoping of those also in the high provinces neare vnto the king. Furthermore, he wrote also vnto the LACED &MONIANS, to pray them to send him men of warre, promising to give the footmenthey fent, horses; and the horsemen, coaches; landed men, whole villages; and to those that had villages, to give them cities: besides all this, that for the ordinarie wages of them that should serue him in this war, he would not pay them by account, but by full measure. And boafting largely of himselse, he said he had a greater mind then his brother; that he could better away with hardnesse then he, that he understood Magicke better then he; and that he could drinke more wine then he, and carie it better: and that the king his brother in contrary manner was so womanish and fearefull, that when he went an hunting, he durst scarce get vp vpon his horse backe: and when he went to the wars, he would hardly take his chariot. When the LACED EMONIANS had read his letters, they fent a litle ferole vnto Clearchus, commanding him to obey Cyrus in any thing he would command him. So Cyrus did set forward to make war against his brother, having leavied a great number of fighting men of barbarous nations, and of GRECIANS, litle lesse then thirteene thousand ment sometime aduertising one cause, sometime another, why he leavied such a multitude of men. But his purpose could not be long dissembled: for Tisaphernes went himselfe vnto the Court, to bring newes of his attempt. Then al the Court was straight in an vprore withall. Many men also did accuse the Queene mother, for the practise of this war, and all her friends and feruants were vehemently suspected to be conspirators with Cyrus: but the greatest thing that troubled Parysatis most, was Queene Statyra her daughter in law, who stormed maruellously to see this war begun against king Artaxerxes her husband, and incessantly cried out on her: O, where is the faith thou vowedst by oath: whereto are thy intercessions come thoumadest for the pardon of his life, who now conspireth his brothers deather By fauing of his life, art not thou now the cause of this war and troubles we see at hand. After this reprochand shame received by Statyra, Parysatis being a cruell and malicious woman of nature, so hated her, that from thenceforth she fought all the waies she could to put her to death. And Dinon the Historiographer saith, that during this war, she did execute her wicked purpose vpon her: but Ciesiphas writeth, that it was after the warre. And therefore it is liker that he being daily in the king of Persiaes court, should certainly know the time when she did execute her treason against her; and also there is no cause why he should rather write in any other time. then in that in which the fact was done: although in many other places he commonly viethto feine, and to write deuices of his owne head. Therefore let vs leave the report of this fact to the felfe same time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew neare vnto his brothers countrey, he had newes, and a rumor ran through his campe, that the king was not determined to come and fight with him fo soone; and that he meant first to go further into Persia, and to tary there till he had gathered his army together out of all parts. And for proofe herof, the king having cast a great trench of ten yards broad, and as many high, the space of source hundred furlongs in length: he left it without guard, and let Cyrus win it, who came on further without any refiftance, even to the very city it self of BABYLON. Howbeit in the end, Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the first man that durst tel the king, that he shold not flie fight in that fort, nor hide himfelf in the farthest part of Persia, leaving his enemy y realmes of Media, Babylon, & Sysa: confidering also that he had many moe foldiers in readinesse then his enemy, & an infinite number of Captaines more skilfull, and able to give counfell, and to fight, then he was. These words of TiribaZ ## made the king alter his mind, and to determine to give battell as foone as he could. Thereupon he marched forward against his enemie, with nine hundred thousand fighting men, excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That maruelloufly aftonied Cyrus bundred men, and made them afraid at the first when they saw them in so excellent good order before thousand them; for that they were dispersed straggling here and there without any order, and men vnaragainst bis med, trusting too much in themselues in despising of their enemie: so that Cyrus had muchado to fet his men in battel ray, and yet was it with great noise and tumult. But the GRECIANS WOIL dred most of all other, when they saw the kings army march in so good order of battel without any noise: for they thought to have seene a wonderfull great disorder and confusion, in such an infinite multitude of people, and supposed they would have made such a noise, that one of them should not have heard another. Where indeed to the contrary, all was so well martialled, specially because he had placed before his battel the best carts he had, armed with sithes, & drawne with the strongest and biggest horse he had in all his army: hoping by the siercenesse and surie of their careire, to breake into the rankes of the enemies, before they could come to io yne with theirs. But fith this battell is discribed by divers Historiographers, and specially by Xeno- xemphon phon, who hath as (a man would fay) lively fet it out to the eye; and fetteth it forth to the Reader. not as a battell already fought, but presently a fighting, stirring vp their mindes, as if themselues were in the action and instant danger (he hath so passingly set it downe,) it were but a folly therefore of me to take vpon me to make any further description of it, saving to touch some speciall points worthy of note, which he peraduenture hath left out. As, the place where the battel was fought, is called Counaxa, fine hundred furlongs from Babylon: and how that before the battell, Clearchus gaue Cyrus counsell to keepe behind the squadron of the GRECIANS, and not to hazard his person among the first: and that Cyrus answered him, What sayest thou Clearchus? wouldest thou have me that strives to be king, to shew my selfe ynworthy to be a king. But Cyrus having made this fault, not standing vpon his safety and guard, but ouer-rashly thrusting safety in a himselse into great danger, Clearchus selse also committed as great a fault (if it were not worse) when he would not fet his men in order directly against the battell of the enemies, where the kings person stood, but went and pent them up by the rivers side, being asraid lest they should clear that have bene compassed in behind. For if he would have looked so straightly to himselfe, and have prouided enery way for his fafety, that no man might come to hurt him, he should have kept himselse at home and not have stirred one foot out of the doores. But sith he had come so farre, as from the low countries of Asia, vnto the place where the field was fought, & vncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his fathers feat and Imperiall crowne to go chuse a place in the battell, not where he might do his Lord best service that had hired him, but rather where he might fight more at his ease, and at lesse danger, it was even as much, as if through cowardlinesse his wits had bene taken from him when he should have fought, or that through treason he had forsaken his enterprise. For, to proue that the troupes which were about the kings person, had nenor bene able to have received the charge of the Grecians, and that those being overthrowne, the King had bene slaine in the field, or else forced to slie, and that cyrus had wonne the field, and by this victory hadbene king, the fuccesse of this battell doth plainely shew ir. And therefore Clearchus ouer-curious respect, deserved more blame for the losse of Mmmm4

this battell, then Cyrus ouer hardinesse. For if king Artaxerxes would have chosen or wished place where the GRECIANS might have done him lesse hurt, he could not have devised a sitter place that was fo farre from him, and from whence the GRECIAN'S could neither fee nor heare what was done where he was, as it fell out in fequele. For Cyrus was flaine before he could preuaile by Clearchus victory, he was so far from him : and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meeteft to be done. For he commanded Clearchus to place himselfe with his company in the middest of the battell: who answered him, he should take no thought for any thing, for he would fee all things well ordered. And when he had faid fo, he marred all afterwards: for where the GRECIANS were, they ouerthrew the barbarous people that made head against them, and had them in chase while they were wearie of following them. Cyrus being mounted vpon a hot stirring horse, that had a hard head, and was very sierce and dogged, called Pasacas, as Ctefias writeth, Artagerfes, the gouernor of the province of the CADV SANS, spied him a farreoff, and when he had found him, clapped spurres to his horse, and came with full cariere vnto him, and cryed out: O traytor, and most vnfaithfull and desperate man, thou now dishonourest the name of Cyrus (which is the goodlieft and most honorable name of all the Persians,) for that thou hast brought so valiant GRECIAN'S hither to so wicked an enterprise, to spoile & Per-SIANS goods, in hope to destroy thy soueraigne Lord and onely brother, who hath an infinite number of slaues and servants farre honester menthen thou wilt be while thou livest; and that thou shalt presetly know by proofe, for thou shalt die before thou see the king thy brothers face: & therewithall he threw his dartathim withall the force he had. But Cyrus armour was fo good, that it pierced him not: yet the blow came with fuch good will, that it made him stagger on his horse backe. When Arragerses had given him that blow, he presently turned his horse. But Cyrus therewithall threw a dart at him fo happily, that he flue him right in the place about the bone that joyneth the two shoulders together: so that the head of his dart, ran quite through his neck. Now, that Cyrus flue Artagerses with his owne hands in the field, all the Historiographers doagree vpon it: but for the death of Cyrus, because Xenophon toucheth it but a little by the way, for that he was not present in the very place where he was slaine, it shall not be hurtfull particularly to set downe the maner thereof, both according to the report of Dinon, and also of Ctessas. First, Dinon writeth, that after Cyrus had flaine Artagerfes, he went with great furie, & flew in amongst the troupe of them which were nearest vnto the kings person, and that he came so neare the king, that he flue his horse starke dead under him, and the king fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, straight mounted the king againe vpon another horse, and said vnto him: Your Grace will remember this battel another day, for it is not to be forgotten. And cyrus clapping spurres againe to his horse, threw another dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the kingtold them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather diethen suffer it: so therewithall he spurring his horseto charge Cyrus (who came siercely and desperatly, having an infinite number of blowes with darts throwne at him on every side) threw his dart at him alfo. So did all those that were about his person: and so was Cyrus slaine in this conflict. Some say, that he was slaine with the wound the king his brether gaue him. Others say, that it was a man at armes of the countrey of CARIA, vnto whom the king for reward of his good service, gauethe honor in all battels to carie before the first ranke, a Cocke of goldon the top of a speare: for the Persians do call the Carians Cockes, because in the wars they vse to weare creasts in the top of their head-peeces. And this is Dinons report. But Ctessias, to couch in few words that which Dinon reporteth at large, faith: that Cyrus after he had flaine Ar. tagerses, gallopped on the spurre against the king himselfe, and the king against him, and not a word betweene them both. Ariam one of Cyrus flatterers, threw the first dart at the king, but killed him not: and the king with all his force againe threw his dart, thinking to have hit Cyrus, but he missed him, and slue Tisaphernes, one of the valiantest and stoutest men Cyrus had about him, who fell downe dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes so sorea blow on his breast, that he pierced his armour, and entred into his flesh two fingers deepe. The king with this blow fell downe to the ground: therewithall the most part of his men about him were so afraid, that they forfookehim and fled. Howbeit he got vp againe, with the helpe of others that were about him, amongst whom Ctessas said he was one, and so recouered a little hill a farre off, to take a little breath. In the meane time, Cyrus horsethat was hot in the mouth, and hard headed, as we have told you, caried his mafter spite of his heart farre from his men, among his enemies, and no man knew him, because it was night, and his men were very busie in seeking for him. But Cyrus hoping he had wonthe victory, being of a hot stirring nature, and valiant, he went vp and downe in the thickest of his enemies, crying out in the Persian tongue: Saue your selues poore men, faue your felues. When they heard him fay fo, some made a lane for him to passe by them, and did him reuerence: but by enill fortune his Tiara (which is the high royall hat after the Persian maner)fell off from his head. Then a yong PERSIAN called Mithridates, passing by him, hit him ablow with his dart vpon one of his temples, hard by his eye, not knowing what he was. His corm buts. wound straight fellon a maruellous bleeding. Whereupon, Cyrus staggering at it, fell on the ground in a swound, and his horse ran away from him: but the caparison he had vpon him fell tothe ground all bloudied, and his page that had hurt him; tooke it vp. Shortly after Cyrus being come to himselfe againe, some of his Eunuches (which were men gelt, and groomes of his chamber) that were about him, did lift him vp, thinking to fet him vpon another horse, and to get him out of the preasse: but he was notable to sit on his horse. Thereupon he proued if he could better go on foote, and the Eunuches held him vp by the armes, and led him amazed as he was, not able to stand on his feete; although he thought he had won the battell, because he heard his enemies flying about him crie, The gods faue king Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receive them to mercie. But in the meane time, there came certaine poore men of the city of CAVNVs, who followed the kings campe, getting their liuing as drudges and flaues, to do most vile service. They ioyned with the troupe where Cyrus was, supposing they had bin thekings men: but when they perceived in the end by the red coates they wore vpon their armors, that they were enemies, for that the kings men wore white coats, there was one among the restthat valiantly strake at Cyrus behind with his partizan, not knowing indeed that it was Cyrus. The blow lighted full on the hamme of his legge, and cut his finewes fo, that Cyrus fell withall; cyrus miss & falling, by misfortune fell vpon a great stone with his brow, where he had bene hurt before, rable dethat he died forthwith. Thus doth Cresias report it, where me thinketh he cutteth his throat with adull edged knife, he hath fuch ado to bring Cyrus to his end. Now after Cyrus was deads Artafirm one of king Artaxerxes Eunuches (whom they called the kings Eye in the Court) passing by on horse-backe, knew Cyrus Eunuches that mourned very pitifully, lamenting the death of their master. So he asked the Eunuch whom Cyrus loued best: Who is that that is dead, ô Pariscas, that thou weepest so bitterly ? Pariscas answered him againe, Seest thou not Artasyras. that it is Cyrus but newly dead? Arta (yras wondered much when he saw him. So he comforted the Eunuch, and willed him in no case to go from the body, and in the meane time he gallopped apace to the king, who thought he had loft all, and was very ill besides, both for the great thirst he suffered, as also for the wound he had on his breast. Now when the Eunuch came vnto theking, and told him with a fmiling countenance the newes, how he had seene Cyrus dead: the king was so ioy full at the newes, that he was desirous himself forthwith to go vnto the place where he lay to see him, and commanded Artasyras to bring him thither. But after he had considered better of it, he was counselled not to gothither himself for feare of the GRECTANS, who they faid wonne all, and were yet chafing and killing them in the field, that fled : but rather that he should send a good company of men thither, to bring him iust report, whether the newes were true of his death or not. Vpon this aduice he staied, and sent thirtie men, enery man with torches in their hands. In the meane time, one of the Eunuches called Satibarzanes, ranne vp and downero see if he could get any water for the king, that was almost dead for thirst for there was no water neare vnto him where he was, and besides, his campe was far from him. His Eunuch having runne vp and downe agreat way to feeke it, met by chance with these poore flaues and porters the CAVNIANS, among the which one of them caried in an old ragged goates skinne, about eight glasse-fuls of naughtie stinking water. So he presently caried the fame to the king, who dranke it vp euery whit. When the king had drunke it, the Eunuch afked him, if that naughtie water did him no hurt. The king sware by the gods vnto him, that he king drneuer dranke better wine, nor sweeter water then that was, nor that pleased him better then that did: and therefore, said he, I beseech the gods, if it be not my hap to find him that gaue thee dranke this water to reward him, yet that it will please them to send him good fortune. As the king finking was talking thus with the Eunuch, the thirtie men with their torches returned vnto him, who ter, & faid altogether with joyfull countenance, confirmed the good newes he looked not for: and then be never there were come together againe a greater number of fouldiers about him, and still came moe ser.

one after another, that he began againe to be couragious. Then he came downe into the plaine, with a world of lights and torches about him, and went straight to the place where his brother Cyrus body lay. There, following the ancient manner of the Persians against traytors to the king, he caused his head and right hand to be striken off, and then made his head be brought vnto him, the which he tooke by the haires of his head (for Cyrus wore them long and thicke) and did him selfe shew it vnto them that fled stil & were afraid, to encourage them againe. They wondering to see it, did him humble reverence, and so gathered by companies about the king, that in a small time there were gathered together about him, threescore and ten thousand fighting men, with the which he tooke his way againe towards the campe. Indeed Ctesias saith, that he had but foure hundred thousand fighting men in all: but Dinon and Xenopbon say more. And for the number of them that were flaine, Ctessas saith, that word was brought to the king, that there were not aboue nine thousand slaine, how beit that to sight they seemed to be no lesse then twenty thousand: but for that point, he might be talked withall, in either of both. And furthermore, where he faith that the king did fend him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN vnto the GRE-CIANS, and others with him, that is a flat lie. For Xenophon knew right well, that this Cielias waited vpon the king, because he speaketh of him in diverse places of his history: if he had beneappointed by the king to cary report vnto the GRECIANS of so weighty a matter, it is like enough Xenophon would not have concealed it, when he nameth Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN. But Ctefias (asit appeareth by his writings) was a very ambitious man, & partial vnto ý LACED EMONIANS, but specially vnto Clearchus: and is glad when he can get any occasion to speake of himselfe for his glory, of LACED AMON, & of Clearchus. Now after this battel, king Artaxerxes fent goodly rich gifts vnto Artagersis son, whose father Cyrus had flaine with his own hands; & (as it is reported) did also greatly honor Cresias, and many others: and did not forget also to cause the poore Cav-NIAN slaue to be fought our, that had given him the water to be caried to him, which saued his life; and when he had found him out, of a poore wretch vnknowne before, he made him arich mobleman. He seuerely punished those also that had offended the martial law, as amongst others Arbazes, one of the MEDES: who (when the battell was joyned) fled first to Cyrus side, and, then, when he vnderstood he was slaine, he returned againe to the kings side. For, supposing that it was rather timorousnesse & cowardly nature, then for treason or ill will he bare him, he compelled him to carie a whore on his backe starke naked, all day long about the market place. And to another (who besides he had yeelded himself to his enemies, falsily boasting that he had slaine two)he made his tongue to be bored through in three scuerall places with a cordiners aule. Now the king being of opinion that it was himselfe that had slaine his brother Cyrus with his owne hand, and being defirous that enery man should so thinke and say, he sent presents vnto Milhri. dates, that had hurt him first in the forehead, and commanded him that caried the gifts vnto him, to tell him from the king. The king doth fend thee these presents, because thou finding first the caparifon of Cyrus horse, diddest bring it vnto the king. The CARIAN also, that had cut the ham of his legge wherewith Cyrus fell downe, asked his gift likewise: which the king gaue him, and bad the messenger tell him, The king doth give thee this, because thou wast the second perfon that brought him the good newes: for Artafyras was the first, and thou the second, that brought him newes of the death of Cyrus. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleased in his mind with these words, he went his way, and said nothing then, nor made any thing ado; but the vnfortunate CARIAN fondly fell into a foolish veine, common vnto me. For, the sudden ioy he felt (asit feemeth) to fee fuch a goodly rich present before him, as y king sent him, made him fo forget himselfe, that he began to aspire, and to pretend greater things then became his estate and calling. And therefore he would not take the kings gift, as in respect that he had brought him word of Cyrus death: but began to storme, and to rage, calling the gods to witnesse, that it was he onely, and none other, that flue Cyrus, and that they did him great wrong, to take this honor from him. The king being told of it, tooke it so angrily, that he presently commanded them to strike off his head. But Parysatis (the Queene mother) being present when the kinggaue this commandement, she prayed him not to put him to death in this fort: for the villaine (said she) let me alone, I will chastise him well inough for his presumption and rash speech. The king was contented she should have him. Thereupon she sent the Sergeant to take this cursed Cartan, and made him be hanged upon a gibber ten daies together, and at the ren daies end caused his eyes to be pulled out of his head: and last of all, poured molten mettall into his cares, and so

billed the villaine with this kind of torment. Mithridates also shortly after, died miserably by a like folly. He was bidden to supper at a feast, whither came also the king & Queene mothers Eunuches: and when they came, Mithridates fate downe at the boord in the kings golden gowne he gaue him. When they had supped, and that they began to drinke one to another, one of Paris fatis Eunuches faid vnto Mithridates. The king hath indeed given thee a goodly gowne Mithridates, and goodly chaines and carcanets of gold, and so is the sword very rich and good he gaue thee, so that when thou hast that by thy side, there is no man (I warrant thee) but will thinke thee a happy man. Mithridates the, the wine fuming into his braine, answered straight: What meanest thou by that, Sparamixes? I deserved better then this when the battell was fought. Then Sparamixes laughing on him, answered, I do not speake it for any hurt or cuill will I bearethee, Mithridates: but to speake frankly among our selues, because the GRECIANS have a common prouerb. that Wine tellethtrue, I pray thee tell me, what valiat act was it to take vp a caparison of a horse that fell on the ground, and to carie it to the king? which the Eunuch ipitefully put forth vnto him, not that he was ignorant who did it, but to prouoke him to speake, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a hasty man of nature, and could not keepe histongue, and least of all when he had drunke so well as he had done; and so it fell out indeed. For Mithridates could not bite it in, but replied straight: You may talke as long as you list of the caparison of a horse, & such trash, see the pe but I tell you plainly, that Cyrus was flaine with mine own hands, & with no mans elfe. For I hit vill of half him not in vaine as Artagerses did, but full in the forehead hard by the eye, & strake him through rash answ and through his head againe, and so ouerthrew him, of which blow he died. He had no sooner spoken these words, but the rest that were at the boord, cast down their eies, foreseeing the death of this poore and vnfortunate Mithridates. But then the master of the feast began to speake, and faid vnto him: Friend Mithridates, I pray thee let vs drinke and be merrie, and reuerence and thanke the good fortune of our king; and for the rest, let this talke go, it is too high for vs. When the Eunuch went from thence, he told Parysatis (the Queene mother) what Mithridates had said beforethem all: and the went and told the king of it. Who was maruellously offended with all to be so belied, and to lose the thing that was most honourable, and best pleased him in his victory. For it was his mind, that all the world (both GRECIANS and barbarous people) should certainly beleeue, that in the battell betwixt him and his brother he was hurt, but yet that he flue Cyrus with his owne hand. So the king commanded that Mithridates should suffer the paines of The terrible death in boates, the which is after this manner. They take two boates made of purpose so euen, death in boates, the which is after this manner. that the one is neither broader nor longer then the other, and then lay the offender in one of boates or them upon his backe, and so couer him with the other, and do sow both boates together: so troughes, 4. that the feete, hands, and head do come out at holes made of purpose for him, the rest of his ressaus. body is all hidden within. Now they gine him meate as much as he will eate, and if he will not eate, they force him to it, by thrusting aules in his eyes: then when he hath eaten, they give him honey to drinke mingled with milke, and they do not only poureit into his mouth, but also all his face ouer, turning him full into the Sun, so that his face is all couered ouer with flies; and furthermore, being driven to do his needs in that trough, of his excrements there ingender worms that cate his body to the very prinities. Then, when they fee the man is dead, they take off the vppermost boate, and find all his flesh denoured with vermine ingendred of him, even to his very intrails. So, when Mithridates had miserably languished in this maner, seventeene daises together, The miseraat length he died in extreme torments. Now Pary satis (the Queene mother) lacked no more bledeath of to accomplish her wicked desire, but Mesabates, one of the kings Eunuches that had cut off Cyrus head and hand; and feeing that he was very wary and circumfpect in his hehauior, that she could not take him at any advantage, in the end she denised a fine way to intrap him. She had a maruellous wir, and among other things could play passingly well at all games at dice, and did many times play with the king her son before the warres; and after the warres also, when he had made the rerest and after the warres also, when he had made the rerest and after the warres also, when he had made the rerest and after the warres also, when he had made the rerest and after the warres also, when he had made the rerest and after the warres also, when he had made the rerest and after the warres also and did many times play with the king her son before the warres; and after the warres also and did many times play with the king her son before the warres; and after the warres also and did many times play with the king her son before the warres; and after the warres also and did many times play with the king her son before the warres; and after the warres also and did many times play with the king her son before the warres; and after the warres also and the son before the warres. peace, she did play at dice with him as she had done before, in so much as she knew all his secret skill and loue, and suffered him to enjoy it. To be short, she would never be out of his sight but as little as country at she could, and would let his wife Statira have as little time with him as might be, that she might gouerne and rule him as she would: both because she hated her of all creatures living, & also for that she would beare the greatest sway and credit about him. When she saw the king one day at reifure, not knowing how to passe the time away, she inticed him to play a thousand Dareckes at dice, and was contented to lose them willingly, and played the thousand Dareckes downe, feeming notwithstanding to be angry with her losse. So she prayed him also to play one of his Eunuches with her: and the king was well contented with it. But before they would play, they agreed betweene them that they should both name and except fine of the trustiest and chiefest Eunuches they had:and then, which of them loft, should prefently deliuer vnto the winner his choise of all the other Eunuches he would demand. Thus they fell to play, and she imploying all the cunning she had, and playing as warily as she could possible, besides that the dice ran on her fide, her lucke ferued her fo, that she wan: and then she required Mefabates for her winnings, being none of those the king had excepted. When she had him delivered her, she gave him to the hangman, & willed him to flea him aliue, and then that they should crucifie him, & naile him to a croffe, and hang his skin vpon another peece of timber by hims the which was done accordingly. The king was maruellous angry withall when he knew it, and gricuously offended with his mother. Howbeit she sported it out, and laughing told him: Indeed it becomes thee well to beangry for lofing an old gelded villaine, where Host a thousand Darecks quietly, and said neuera word. So there came no other thing of it, fauing that the king was a litle angry, & repented him that he had played fo fondly, & was fo finely mocked. But Queene Statira on the other fide(be. fides that the was against her in all other things) spared not to tell Queene mother plainly that it was wickedly done of her, to put the kingsgood & faithfull feruant focuelly to death, for Cyret fake. But now, after that Tifaphernes (king Artaxernes Lieutenat) had deceived Clearchin, & other Captaines of GRECE, detestably falfifying his word he had given them, & that he had sentthe bound vnto the king, Ctefias faith, that Clearchus praied him to help him to a combe; and that hauing had one by his means, & fo combed his head, it pleased him so wel, that to requite his good will, he gaue him his scale of armes from his singer wherewith he scaled his letters, for a witnes of the great friendship that was betweene them two. He saith also, that in the stone of this ring there was grauen the dance of the CARYATIDES. And furthermore, that the other fouldiers which were prisoners with Clearchus, did take away & most part of the victuals that were sente him, & left him litle or nothing; & that he did remedy all this, procuring a greater quantity to be fent vnto the, and that they should put Clearchus portion apart, and all the other soldiers parts by theselues. This he did, as he saith, by Parysatus consent and commandement, who knowing that amongst other victuals they daily fent Clearchus a gamon of baco, she told him one day he should do well to hide a litle knife in this gammon of bacon, & to fend it him, to the end that the life of fo noble & valianta man as he was, should not fal to the cruelry of the king. Howbeit, that he was afraid to meddle withal, & durst not do it; and that the king sware, and promised his mother (who was an earnest futer to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him to death. This notwithstanding, the king being afterwards procured, and perswaded to the contrary, by Queene Statira his wife, he put the all to death, but Menon. Therfore Pary satis (Queene mother) after that time (saith Ctefias) denifed all the waies she could to poy son Queene Statira, & to make her out of the way. But me thinketh this finelleth like a lie, that Parylatis should intend so wicked and dangerous an act, as to put the kings lawfull wife to death, by whom he had sonnes that were to inherit the Crowne, onely for the loue & respect of Clearchus: and it is too plaine that he coined that, to honour and magnific Clearchus memory the more. But to proue it, a man may eafily find it by the lies he addeth afterward vnto it: faying, that after the Captaines were flaine, all the bodies of the rest were torne in peeces by dogs and fowles: and also that there came a boisterous wind, and couered all Clearchus body with a great hill of dust; and that out of this hill of dust shortly after there sprung vp many palmetrees, which made a pretie thicke groue, that it shadowed all that place. Infomuch that the king himfelf did afterwards maruelloufly repent him for putting him to death, for that he was an honest man, & beloued of the gods. This was not for Clearchus sake, but for an old cankred malice Pary fatis had long time borne in her heart against Queene Statira: because she saw well enough, that the credit and authority her selfe had with the king, was in respect of a sonnes duty and obedience to his mother; and in contrary maner, Statiraes credit and authority had a better ground and foundation, because it came of the love and goodwill the king did beare her. And this is the only cause that made her to practise the death of Queene Statira, having determined that her felfe, or daughter in law, must needs die. Now Queene mother had one of the women of her chamber called Gigis, that was of great credit about her, & whom the only trufted. Dinon writeth, that this Gigis did helpe Pary fatis to make the poyfon: but Ciefias writerh contrarily, and faith, that she only knew it, but otherwise that it was against her will:

and that he that made the poy son, was one Belitaras, but Dinon called him Melantas. Now. though in outward semblance and shew Queene mother and Statira seemed to have forgotten all malice between them, & that they began again one of them to keep company with the other. and did eate and drinke together yet one of them mistrusted the other, and tooke great heed to themselves, both of them eating one selfe meate, and in one dishtogether, and were both scrued with one selfe officers and men. In PERSIA there is a little bird, of the which all the parts are excellent good to eate, and are full of fat within; fo that it is thought it liueth by aire and dew, and birdof Perin the PERSIAN tongue they call it Ryntaces. Pary (atis, as Ctefias faith, tooke one of these birds, hath no and cut it in the middeft with a little knife, the which was poyfoned onely on one of the fides, extrement. and gaue that halfe which was poisoned vnto Statira. Yet Dinon writeth, that it was not Parysatis tra was her selfe that gaue ither, but her caruer Melantas that carued her meate, and still gaue Queene possoned. Statira of that meate which the fide of his poyfoned knife had touched. So Queene Statira prefently fell ficke of the difease whereof she died, with grieuous pangs and gripings in her bowels, and found plainely that she was poysoned by Parysatis meanes: whereupon she told the King as much, who was of the same opinion, and thought it was his mother, because he knew her cruell revenging mind, that never pardoned any, against whom she conceived any grudge. The king therefore to know the troth, when his wife Statira was dead apprehended all his mothershoushold servants and officers, and did put them to torments, to make them confessethe troth, fauing Gigis whom Queene mother kept close in her chamber a long time, and would neuer fuffer the king to have her, who earnestly requested her to deliuer her vnto him. Not withstanding, Gigis herselfe at length prayed Queene mother to give her leave one night to go home to her house. The king vnderstanding it, laid waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when the was taken, he condemned her to fuffer the paines of death ordained for poyfoners, the which in P B R S I A is executed in this maner. They make them put their head ypon a great plaine flone, and with another flonethey preffe and flrike it follong, till they have dashed the braines of the male factor out of their head. After this fort was Gigis put to death. Now for Parysatis his The punish. mother, the king did her no other hurt, nor faid any more vnto her, but coffined her to Barylon ment for flate flood the affaires of the king. But now, Artaxerxes having done the vimost he could to have overcome the GRECIANS which came to make war with him in the heart of his Realme, and wold have beene as glad of that, as he was to have overcome Cyrus, and to keepe his crowne and Realme: he could neuer prevaile against them. For though they had lost Gyrus that gave them entertainment, and all their private Captaines that led them: they faued themselves notwithstanding, being in the heart of his Realine, and shewed the Persians by experience, that their doings was nothing but gold and filuer, curiofitie, and faire women, or otherwife, nothing but pompeand vanity. Hereupon all the GRECIANS became couragious, and despised the barbarous people:infomuch that the LACED EMONIANS thought it a great shame and dishonor vnto them, if they did not deliuer the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the flauery & bondage of the Persians, & keep them from the open violence & cruelty of the barbarous people. For they having at other times attempted to do it by their Captaine Timbron, & afterwards also by Dereillidas, whom they fent thither with an army, and having done nothing worthy memory, at Agefilaus length they determined to fend their king Agefilans thither in person, who passing through As IA king of La. with his ships, began presently to make hote war against the Persians as soone as ever he had edimon. landed his armie. For, at the first conflict he ouerthrew Tisaphernes (the king of Persiaes Lieu-with the tenant) in battell, and made the most part of the cities of GRECE that are in As Instorebella. Persians. gainst him. Artaxerxes looking into this warre, and wisely considering what way and meanes he wastotake, tomake warre with the Grecian's, he fent into Grece one Hermocrates a RHODIAN (Of great credit about him) with a maruellous fumme of gold and filter, bountifully to bestow in gifts among the nobility and chiefe rulers of the cities of GRECE, to make all theother GRECIANS to rife against the LACED EMONIANS. Hermocrates wisely executed his commission, for hemade the chiefest cities of GRECE to rebell against LACED # MON: so that all PELOPONNESUS being up in armes, and in great garboile, the Ephori at LACED AMON were enforced to fend for Agesilans home againe. Agesilans being fory to depart out of As 14, sayd vnto The Perhis friends, that the king of PERSIA had driven him out of his Realme with thirty thousand archers: because that the Persian coyne is stamped with an archer, having a bow in his hand. stamped.

Axtaxerxes also draue & LACED EMONIANS out of all their iurisdiction by sea, by the means of Conon Generall of the ATHENIANS, whom Pharnabazas (one of his Lieutenants) had wont to take his part, For Conon, after he was ouerthrown in battel at a place called the Goates river, kept euerafter in the Ile of Cyprvs, not so much for the safetie of his person, as also for that it was a meete place to stay in while the warres of GRECE were appealed. He, knowing that the deuicehe had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution; and on the contrary fide, that the power of the king lacked a man of deepe judgement to be employed: wrote letters vnto him of hisaduice what he thought to do, straightly charging him who he deliucred his letters vnto that ifhe could possibly, he should cause the same to be delivered vito the king by Zenon the CRETAN one of the kings dancers, or by one Polycritus his Phisitian, borne in the citie of MENDE; and in both their absences, then to give it vnto Ctelias, to deliver it vnto the king. It chanced so, that this letter came to the hands of Cresias who (as it is reported) added moreover vnto the contents of the letter, that the king should send him to Conon, because he was a necessary man to be imploied in his feruice, but specially by sea. Ctefias faith not so: but writeth that the king of his own voluntary motion gaue him this charge. Now, after Arraxeryes had through the leading of Cononand Guidus Inf. Pharnabazus, won the battell by fea neareto the Ile of GNIDVs, and that thereby he had driven all the LACED AMONIANS from their iurisdictio by sea, al GRECE had him in maruellous green estimation: so that he gaue vnto the GRECIAN's with such coditions as he would that so famous peace, called Antaleidas peace. This Antaleidas was a citizen of Sparta, the fon of one Leon, who fauoring king Artaxerxes affaires, procured by thetreaty of this peace, that the LACED EMONI-ANS left vnto Artaxerxes al the cities of GRECE in ASIA & althe Iles cotained in the fame, to enioy quietly, making them pay tribute at his pleasure. This peace being concluded with the Gra-CIANS (if fo shamefull a treason, reproach & common infamy to al GRECE may be called peace. as neuer war fell out more dishonorable and infamous for the vanquished) king Artaxerxes, that otherwise hated the Laced Amonians to the death, and that esteemed them (as Dinon writeth) the impudentest men living, did notwithstanding love Antalcidas passing well, and entertained him very honourably when he came into PERSIA vnto him. It is reported, that the king one day tooke a garland of flowers, and did wet it with the most precious and sweetest oile of persume that was prepared for the feast, & sent the same vnto Antalcidas: insomuch as every man marvel. led to fee the king fet fo much by him. Indeed he was a meet man to follow the vanity and curiofitie of the Persians, and had well deserved such a garland to be sent him: who was so bold to dance a dance before the Persians, mocking and counterfetting Leonidas & Callicratidas, two of the valiantest menthat euer were in GRECE. Therfore one said at that time in the presence of king Agefilaus: O how vnhappy is poore Grece at this day, whe the Laced Emonians come to follow the Persians: But Agefilaus prefently answered him againe, Not so, said he: but rather the Persians follow the Laced Emonians. Notwithstading this wife answer Agesslaus made, aid not take away the shame of the fact and shortly after the LACEDEMONIAN'S lost the battell of Levernes, and therewith also the fignoritie and principalitie they had kept of long time ouer all GRECE, although they had lost their estimation before, for consenting to so shamefull and dishonorable peace. When Sparra florished most, and was chiefe of all the other cities of GRECE, folong did Artaxerxes continue still to make much of Antalcidas, and called him, his friend. But after that the LACED EMONIAN's had lost the battell of LEVCTRES, having receiued so great an ouerthrow, and wanting mony, they sent Agesilaus into ÆGYPT, and Antalcidas into PERSIA vnto king Artaxerxes, to pray him to aide and helpe the LACED EMONIANS. Howbeit, the king made fo small account of him, and disdained him so much, denying him and his requests, that he returned backeto Sparta, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the king. And there also seeing that his enemies mocked him: and fearing that the Ephori would comit him to prison, he killed himselse with famine. About that time also, the THE-EAN'S after they had won the battel of LEVCTRES, Sent Ismenias & Pelopidas into PERSIA, VIIIO king Artaxerxes, where Pelopidas did nothing vnworthy of himselfe. Howbeit, Ismenias being commanded to kneele to the king, he let fall his ring at his feet, and stouped to take it vp: whereby it was thought of some, that he did it to kneele to the king. Another time Artaxerxes liking afecret aductifment very well, fent him from Timagoras the ATRENIAN, he gaue him tenne thousand Daricks by his Secretarie called Belluris. And because he had a fickly body, and was driuento drinke cowes milke to reftore him, the king therefore fent foure fore milch kine with him, to give milke to the paile, to have fresh milke every day. Furthermore, he sent him a bed throughly furnished with althings necessary, & groomes of the chaber to make his bed, saying, harrhe GR B CIAN'S could not tel how to make it and did also let him have men to cary him vpon their armes to the fea fide because he was ficke; and whilest he was at the Court, he entertained him very honorably and bountifully. So Oftanes the kings brother, fayd one day vnto him: Timaggras, remember how honourably thou art ferued at thy boord, for it is for no small matter thou art thus made of. This word was rather to cut him for his treason, then for any remembrance of the benefit received. So the ATHENIAN'S afterwards condemned the same Timagoras was parte to die, because he had taken bribes and money of the king of Persia. But Artaxerxes in recompence of fo many other things that he had done to despite the GRECIANS with, did one thing bibes and that pleased them maruellously, when he did put Tisaphernes to death, who was the dreadfullest gifts of the enemie the Grans had. Pary (atisthe Queene mother did helpe to bring this to passe, aggrauating the accusations brought in against him: for the king kept not his anger long against his King at mother, but felin againe with her, & fent for her, knowing that she had an excellent wit & noble killeth Ticourage to gouerne a great kingdome; and besides, that there was nothing now to let them to Japharues. come rogether as much as they would, to give any occasion of icalousie or malice to any person. So ever after his mother Pary fath endeuored her felfe to feed the king her fonnes humour everiemanner of way, seeming to mislike nothing that he did: whereby she grew in so greateredite himmsher with him that he denied her nothing what he denied her nothing when the state of the with him, that he denied her nothing what soeuer she asked him. So she perceived that the king and sent for was extremely in loue with one of his own daughters, that was called Atofa: howbeit that he dif- her to come fembled his love the best he could, & kept it secret, chiefly for feare of her, although some write, sothe Court that indeed he had already had her maiden-head. Now Paryfatis having found his love, the began to make more of his daughter then she did before, and talking with her father, sometime she praised her beautie, another time her grace and good countenance, saying that she was like a Queene and noble Princesse: so that at length by litle and litle she perswaded him to marry her openly not passing for the lawes and opinions of the GRECIANS, considering that God had giuen him vnto the Persians, to stablish lawes vnto them, to decide right from wrong, and the good from the bad. Some Hiftoriographers do write; and among ft them Heraelides of CVMES, that Artaxerxes did not onely marry the eldest of his daughters, but the second also called Amethis, of who we will speake hereafter. Now when he had maried the eldest, Atossa, he loued her smarted foentirely well, that though the fell ficke of the difease commonly called Vitiligo, that ran ouer biseds fi all her bodie, he loued her not the worse for it, but praied continually for her vnto the goddesse dessa. Ium, honouring no other goddesse but her onely, and fell downe on his knees before her image. and lent by his friends and Lieutenants fo many offerings, that althe way from his Court gates vato the temple of Iuno (which was fixteene furlongs off) was full of gold, filuer, rich purple. filles, and horse that were sent thither. He began to make warre also with the ÆGYPTIANS, and made Pharnabazus and Iphicrates ATHENIAN, his Licutenants, who did no good, because they fellat variance the one with the other. But afterwards, Artaxerxes himselfe went in personto conquer the Capysians with three hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand horsemen, taxers to So he inuaded their country, which was a very rude country, alway darke and cloudie: the earth bringeth forth nothing that man foweth, but doth only feed the inhabitants with peares, apples. and fuch like fruite, and yet the men be very strong and valiant not with standing. So when he was Thereumen entred farre into the country before he was ware, he fel into great want of victuals, and was also duffam very ingreat danger. For his fouldiers found nothing in all the countrey that was good to eate; and barren. worst of all, no victuals could come vnto them from any place, because of the hardnesse and naughty water of the countrey: fo that his campe lived onely with the fielh of their beafts of cariage, and yet they fold it dearely; for, an Asses head was fold for threescore silver Drachmaes. Greatse Toconclude, the famine was fo great, that prouision failed for the kings owne mouth, and there taxernee were but few horseleft, for all the rest were eaten. Then Tiribazus, that had oftentimes been armie. chiefe about the king because he was a valiant man, and that through his folly was many times alfo out of fauor, as at that prefent time, when he had no authority nor estimation, he denised a ftratageme, whereby he faued the king and all his campe. In this countrey of the CADVSIANS, fratageme there were two kings in the field with their armies, both of them camped afunder, one from the faued at. other. Tiriba Tus, after he had spoken with king Artaxernes, and had told him what he meant to have not as do, he went vnto one of the kings, and at the felfe fame time also secretly fent his sonne vnto the armie.

other king, and told either of them, that the other king had fent Ambaffadors vnto Artaxerxen to make peace with him, vnwitting to his companion; and therefore he counselled them, if they were wife, one of them to seeke to preuent another with all the possible speed he could; and promised them both, one after another, to helpe them the best he could. Both the one and the other of the kings gaue credite to his words, either of them both mistrusting one another: fa that the one speedily sent his Ambassadours vnto king Artaxerxes, with Tirebaxus; and the o. ther alfo his Ambassadours with his sonne. But Tiribazus tarying long in his journey, king Artaxerxes began somewhat to suspect him: his enemies also didaccuse him in his absence, and the king grew very cholericke, and repented him that he had trufted him fo farre, and was willing to heare every man that spake against him, Howbeit, Tiribazus at length returned, and his sonalso. and either of them brought with them the Ambassadours of the CADVSIANS, and so peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiribazus aloft againe, and in greater credit then ever he was. for appared and so departed with the king. The king then showed plainly, that cowardlinesse proceedeth and riches, not of pompe and curiofitie, as some take it, beleeuing that it doth effeminate mens hearts; but rather of a vile base mind, that commonly follower heuill, and the worst counsell: for neither the by and offer iewels of gold, the kingly robe, nor other fuptuous ornaments which the king ener wore about him, worth twelve thousand talents (as it is reported) did not hinder him at that time to travell. and to take as much paine as any man in all his army. For he himself marched on foote the forefollowerbe. most man, carying his owne truste in a scarfe upon his shoulders, and his target on his arme and trauailed through high stonie mountaines. So that, his fouldiers seeing the courage and paine The courage the king himselfe tooke, they marched so nimbly that it seemed they had wings: for hedayly marched about two hundred furlongs. Now the king at length by fore trauell came to one of his owne houses where there were goodly arbors & parks, with goodly trees passingly set forthe but all the country besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a tree a great way from thence, and it was maruellous cold. The king suffered his fouldiers to hew downe the goodly pines and cyprestrees in his parkes; and because they durst not presume to touch them, he himfelfe as he was tooke an axe in his hand, and began to hew downethe goodlieft tree there. The fouldiers feeing that, fel every man of them also to hewing: so that in a very short time they had provided themselves well with wood, and made them great fires in every place, and so past ouer the night quietly by the fire fide. This not with standing, he lost a great number of valiant men in this voyage, and almost all his horses. Therefore, thinking his men would mockehim becar se he did faile of his purpose, he began to grow mistrustfull, and to suspect the chiefest noble men he had about him, so that in a rage he put many of them to death; but much more of them remained whom he mistrusted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloudfucker, then a cowardly tyrant: as in contrary maner, nothing is more courteous, and leffe suspitious, then a valiant and hardie man. And therefore brute beafts, that be never made tamenor maffered, are commonly cowardly and timorous, and the other on the contrary, that are noble and couragious, are bold, and do come straight to know a man, because they have no feare, neither do they flie from their clapping and making much of them as they doe. Afterwards, king Artaxerxes being growne very old, heard that there was great stirre and contention betweenchis fonnes, which of them should be heire after his death, and that this contention fell out also among his friends and men of great calling. The wifeft of them wished, that as he himselfe came vnto the crowne, as his fathers eldeft fonne; fo, that he likewife should after his death leaueit vnto his eldest some called Darius. But the yonger, which was called ochus, being a valiant man, and of a hote stirring nature, had some in the Court also that tooke his part, and hoped to attaine to his purpose, by the meanes of his fister Atosa, whem he loued and honoured, promifing to marry her, and to make her Queene, if he might come to be king after his fathers deceale. And besides, there went a report abroad, that in their fathers life time he secretly kept her howbeit Axtaxerxes neuer vnderstood it. Now, because he would betimes put his some Ochus out of all hope to fucceed him in his kingdome, lest this expectation might make him goe about to practife that which Cyrus did, and that by this meanes his Realme should grow into faction and civill warres: he proclaimed his eldest fonne Darius (being fiftie yeares old) king after his death; and furthermore, gaue him leave from thenceforth to weare the point of his hat right up. In Persia the custome is, that when any commeth to bee proclaimed succeffour and heireapparent to the crowne, he should require a gift of him that proclaimeth him fucceffor. The which the other doth grant him, what foeuer it be that he asketh fo it be not impossible. Darius then asked his father a concubine called Aspasia, who was first with Cyrus. and in greatest fauour with him about all the rest, but then was for the kings owne bodie. She was borne in the countrey of Ionia, of free parents; and being vertuoufly brought up, the was brought one night vnto Cyrus as he was at supper, with other women, who sate them downe without too curious bidding hard by him, and were very glad when Cyrus offered to play and he merry with them, giving every one of them some pleasant word: and they made it not coy. But Affasia stood on her feete by the table, and said neuer a word; and not with standing that Cyrus called her the would not come at him. Moreouer, when one of the groomes of his chamher would have taken her to have brought her to him: The first, saith she that layeth hands on me shall repent it. Thereupon all those that were present, said, she was a foolish thing, and simply brought vp, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it paffed it ouer with laughing, and told him that had brought them vnto him: Doeft thou not fee, that of all these thou hast brought me there is not an honest woman but she? After that, Gyrus began to make much of her, and loued her better continually then all the rest, and called her Afpallathe wife. This Afpalia was taken among the spoiles of Cyrus campe after he was ouer- The barbathrowne; and Darius as we have told ye, did beg her of his father, who was very angry with it in reds people his mind. For the barbarous people of all other things are maruellous icalous of their women, to that not onely he should be put to death, that durst but speake to, or touch any concubine of the tinality is kings but in sport; but also who so euer came neare them, or neare their coaches as they trauelled. The kings daughter Atoffa, whom he had maried against the law, was yet liuing, & besides her he had also three hundred and threescore passing faire concubines; and yet when his sonne Darius asked Apalia of him, the king answered, she was a free woman borne, and therfore if she wold. he was content he should have her: but if she were vnwilling to go to him, then he would not haue him force her by any meanes. So Apalia was tent for, and the was asked with whom the had rather be. Sheanswered, With Darius: contrary to king Artaxerxes expectation, who both by the custome, & also the law, was compelled to let him have her. But shortly after he took her from him againe, saying that he would place her in a Nunry of Diana, in the country of Echa-TANE, where they call her Anitis, there to ferue the goddeffe, and to line chaft all the daies of her life: fuppofing by this means to punish his for, not rigoroufly, but moderatly, with griefe mixt with sport and earnest. How beit his son tooke it not so patiently, either because he was deeply in love with Afpafia, or elfe for that he faw his father mocked him in that point. Tiribazus finding this, and perceiving that Darius tooke it very grieuously, he aggrauated his anger against his father, knowing the passion of loue in Darius, by his owne vpon the like occasion. King Artaxerxes had many daughters, & had promised Pharnabazus one of the called Apama: vnto Orontes, Darius a-Redogoune, and to Tiribazus, Amefira. The king performed the other two mariages, and did put saing his Tiribazus by his wife. For the king himselfe maried his owne daughter Amestras; and for her, he promifed Tiribazus the yonger, Atoffa: with whom also he himselfe fell in love, and maried here Tiribazus hereupon was in such a rage with the king, that he hated him to the death; not because hewas any traitor or feditious man in nature, but a mad hare-brain'd felow. For fomtime he was Tiribates aloft, and in as good credite and authority as the best; suddenly agains he would play some mad mineriand parts to anger the king, and then he was in as much differed, and out of countenance; and could away with neither fortune. For when he was in authority, he made every man hate him for his pride, and being in difgrace, he could not humble himfelfe, but looke bigger then before. Now there was fire and brimstone met, when Tiribazus tooke part with Darius. For he daily blew into his cares, that it was to no purpose for him to weare his hat right vp, if his affaires also went not rightly forward: and that he deceived himselfemuch, if he did not know that his brother (by meanes of the women he kept) fecretly aspired to the crowne and that his father being so vnconstant as he was, he must not rust in any fort to succeed him in the kingdome, what Proclamation soeuer he hath made in his behalfe to the contrary. For, said he, he that for a GRES CIAN woman hath broken & violated the holiest law that was in PERSIA, thou must not looke that he will performe that he hath promifed thee. And furthermore, he perfwaded him, that it was not alike repulse vnto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for, as it was for him to be turned out of all that euer he had gotten. For faid he, if it please ochus to liue like a private man, he may fafely do it, and no man will trouble him : but for himfelfe that was already proclaimed

Ill counsell easily takes place. For the way is large and plaine for a man to believe as he lift, and men commonly are given rather to beleeue the euill then the good, because most men know not what goodnesse meaneth. But now befide these perswasions, the greatnesse of the kingdome, and the teare Darius stood in of his brother Ochus, tooke great force & effect with him and it may be also, that Venus her felfe did somewhat in the matter, for the malice & spire that Aspassa was taken from him. But whatsoeuer the cause was, thus was it handled, that Darius flatly cospired against his father Artaxerxer. together with Tiriba Zus. Now, they having gotten many conspirators to joyne with them, one of the kings Eunuchs perceiving it, ran and told the king of it, & how they had fuddenly determined to affaile him, knowing certainly that it was agreed among themselues, that they should kill him in his bed in the night. Artaxerxes receiving this advertisement; thought it was not good to be carelesse of a matter of so great importance, as his life; and also that it were too great light. nesse in him so sodainly to believe his Eunuch, without better proof or knowledge. So he took this way with himselfe. He commanded the Eunuch that had given him this information, to keepe company still with the conspirators, and to follow them wheresoener they went, to see their doings : and in the meane time he beate downe his wall behind his bed, and made a doore through and fet vp a hanging of tapestry before it. When the time was come, as the Eunuchhad aduertifed the king that the traitors meant to do their feate, Artaxerxes being laid on his bed. rose not up till he had seene energy traitor of them in the face that came to kill him. Then, when he faw them comming towards him with their fwords drawne, he fuddenly lift up the hanging and got into his inner chamber, & flut the doreafter him, making an out-cry, murder, murder, So, the traitors being plainely feene and knowne by the king, fled the fame way they came, and failed of their purpose, and bad Tiribazus saue himselse, because he was known. So they disperfed themselves, & scaped by flying. But TiribaZus was taken tardie, although he had flaine divers of the kings guard, valiantly defending himselfe: yet they tooke him not, till he was striken with a dart a good way off, which flue him. Darius was also taken and apprehended, and brought prisoner with his sous; and the king referred him to be judged by his Peeres. For the king himself would not be present to give judgement of him, but deputed others in his place to accuse him. howbeit, he commanded his Secretaries to fet downe in writing, the opinion and fentence of euerie one of the Judges, and to bring it to him. In fine, they all cast him, and condemned him to die. Then the officers laid hold on him, and brought him into a chamber of the prifon, where the hangman came with a razor in his hand, with the which he yied to cut mens throats fo condemned to die. So the hangman coming into the chamber, when he faw it was Darius; he was affraid, and came out of the chamber againe, his heart failing him, and durft not lay hands ypon the perfon of the king. But the Judges that food without the chamber, bad him goe and do it, vnleffe he would have his owne throate cut. So the hangman then came in , and tooke Darins by the haire of the head, and made him hold downe his head, and so cut his necke with his razor he had in his other hand. Others do write, that this sentece was given in the presence of king Artaxerxes felfe, and that Darius feeing himselfe connicted by manifest proofes brought in against him, he fell downe at his fathers feete, and befought him to pardon him and then, that his father being angrie, rose vp, and drew out his curtelax and wounded him in so many places withall, that at length he flue him. Then returning into his Court, he worshipped the Sunne, & turning him to his Lords that were about him, he faid vnto them: My Lords, God be with you, and be merry at home in your houses, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oremazes hath taken reuenge of them that practifed treason against me. This was the end of Darius treason. Now Darins being dead, ochus his brother stood in good hope to be next heire to the crowne, and the rather through the meanes and friendship of his fifter Atolia: but yet of his legitimate brethren, he scared Ariaspes, who was only lest of all the rest that were legitimate: and of his bastard brethren, Arfames not because Ariaspes was elder then he, but for that (he being of a fost and plaine name) the PERSIANS therefore defired he might be their king. On the other fide Arfames was wise, and valiant: and Ochus saw that his father loued him dearely. So he determined to intrap them both. Now Ochus being a subtileand malicious natured man, he first shewed his crueltievpon Arfames, and his malice vpon Ariaffes his legitimate brother. For, because he knew he was but fimple and plaine, he fent daily fome of the kings Eunuchs vnto him, who brought him threatning words and meffages, as from the king: telling him, that he had determined to put him to a shamefull and cruell death. So, forging these newes continually as things very secret, they did foterrifie poore Ariaspes, telling him, that the king was fully bent to put some of his threats in execution out of hand; that he was put in such feare and dispaire of his life, that he prepared himselfe a poison, and dranke it, to rid himselfe of his life. King Artaxeries vnderstanding of his death took it very heavily, & began to mistrust the cause that made him to make himselfeaway: howbeit, he could not seeke the proofe of it, for his extreame age. But this chance made him loue Arfames betterthen before, shewing plainely that he trusted him better then Ochus, and did makehim privie to all things. Ochus could no longerabide to deferre his intent; and therefore inticed Harpaces Tiriba Zus fonne, to kill his bastard brother Arsames; the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was so extreme old, that he was as good as done with age: but after he heard his sonne Arlames was murthered, he could beare it no longer, but tooke it so to his heart for sorow, that when he had lived fourescore and foureteene yeares, and raigned threescore and two, he died. When he was dead, they then found that he had beene a gracious and courteous Prince; and one yeares eldate that loued his people and subjects; when they saw the proofe of his successor ochus, that passed his death; all menliuing, in cruelty and severitie.

THE LIFE OF Dion.

Ike as Simonides (O Sosius Senecio) faith, that the citie of ILIVM was not offended with the Corint Hians, for that they came to make war with the with other GRECIANS, because Glaucus (whose first ancestors came from Coring H) had taken armes, and louingly fought for the fame : even so methinks, that neither the GRECIANS, nor ROMAINS haue cause to complaine of the Academie, sith they be both alike praifed of the same in this present booke, in the which are contained the Plato de liues of Dion and Brutus. Of the which, the one of them having beene virtue. very familiar with Plate himselfe, and the other from his childhood actisshould brought vp in Platoes do Ctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one selfe schoole-house to befamousing attempt the greatest enterprises amongst men. And it is no maruell if they two were much like the common wealth. in many of their doings, prouing that true, which their schoolemaister Plate wrote of vertue: that to do any noble act in the government of a common wealth, which should be famous and of credit; authoritie, and good fortune, must both meet in one selfeperson, joyned with justice

A wicked Spirit apand wisedome. For as a certaine fencer called (Hippomachus) saith, that he knew his scholers fatte off if he did but see them coming from the market with meate in their hands: so it must need follow, that men having beene vertuously brought vp, must needs be wise in all their doings; and beside that it bringeth them to civilitie and honestie, it also frameth their conditions much like one to another. Furthermore, their fortunes having also falle out both alike, more by chance then by any reason, do make their lines very like to each other, for they were both of the slain. before they could bring their enterprises to passe which they had determined. But the greatest wonder of all is this, that their deaths were foreshewed vnto them both, by a wicked spirit that visibly appeared vnto either of them: albeit there be some that cannot abide those opinions, and do maintaine, that these sights and euill spirits do neuer appeare to any man that hath his right wits, but that they are fancies of little children, or old women, or of some men whose wits are weakened by fickneffe; and so have a certain eimagination of such strange sights, being of this fuperstitious mind, that they have a wicked spirit, and an euill angell in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them graue and learned Philosophers, and very constant men, not ouercome by any fodaine passion or imagination of mind, have been moved by such sights & spirits, and have also told it vnto their friends: I cannot tell whether we shall be enforced, to grant the most strange and old opinion of them which fay: That there be euill spirits, which enuying the vertue of good men, to withdrawthem from their godly minds, do make them afraid with these feareful fights. inciting them to forfaketheir godlinesse, lest that persisting therein, they should be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let vs referre this disputation to someother booke; and now in this twelfth couple of these famous mens lives compared, let vs first begin to write of the life of him that is the elder of these two men we speake of. Diony sus the elder, after he had the government of Sicilia in his hands, he maried the daughter of Hermocrates, a citizen of Syra evsa. But yet not being throughly fetled in his tyrannie, the Syracusans did rebell against him, and did so cruelly & abominably handle the body of his wife, that the willingly poisoned her felte. So, after he had established himselfein his gouernment with more suretie then before, he maried againe two other wives together, the onea ftranger of the citie of Lock & s, called Doride; and the other of the country it selfe, called Ariflomache, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefest man of all Syracvsa, and that had been companion with Dionysius, the first time he was chosen Generall. It was faid that Dionysius maried them both in one day, and that they could neuer tell which of them he knew first: but otherwise, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly fate together with him at his table, and did either of them lie with him by turnes, though the Syrac vsans would have their owne countriwoman preferred before the stranger. Howbeit, the strange woman had this good happe, to bring forth Dionysius his eldest sonne, which was a good countenance to defend her, being a forriner. Aristomaché in contrary manner, continued a long time with Dionssius without fruit ofher wombe, although he was very desirous to hauechildren by her: so that he put the Localian womans mother to death, accusing her that she had with sorceries and witchcraft, kept Aristomache from being with child. Dion being the brother of Aristomache, was had in great estimation at the first, for his sisters sake: but afterwards the tyrant finding him tobea wise man, he loued him then for his owne sake. Infomuch, that among many sundrie things and pleasures he did for him, he commanded his Treasurers to let him have what money heasked of them, so they made him acquainted withall the felfe same day they gaue him any. Now, though Dion had euer before a noble mind in him by nature, yet much more did that magnanimitie increase, when Plato (by good fortune) arrived in Sicile. For his coming thither surly was no mans deuice, (as I take it) but the very prouidence of some god: who (bringing farre off the first beginning and foundation of the liberty of the Syracvsans and to ouerthrow the tyrannicall state) sent Plato out of ITALIE vnto the citie of Syracvsa, and brought him acquainted with Dion, who was but a yong man at that time, but yet had an apter wit to learne, and readier goodwill to follow vertue, then any yong man else that followed Plato; as Plato himselfe writeth, and his ownedoings also do witnesse. For Dion having from a child beene brought vp with humble conditions vnder a tyrant, and acquainted with a feruile timorous life, with a proud and infolent reigne, with all vanity and curiofitie, as placing chiefe felicitie in couctoufnesse: neuerthelesse, after he had felt the sweet reasos of Philosophy, teaching the right way to vertue, his hart was inflamed ftraight with an earnest desire to follow the same. And because he foud that he was foeafily perswaded to loue vertue and honesty, he simply thinking (being of an honest plain nature) that the selfe same perswassons would moue a like affection in Dionysius; obtained of Diorefins, that being at leifure, he was contented to fee Plato, and to speake with him. When Plato Dionyfins came to Dionyfius, all their talke in maner was of vertue, & they chiefly reasoned, what was fortitude : where Plato proued that tyrants were no valiant men. From thence passing farther into inflice, he told him, that the life of infl men was happic; and contrarily, the life of vniust men, vnfortunate. Thus the tyrant Diony sus perceiving he was ouercome, durst no more abide him, and was angry to feethe standers by make such estimation of Plato, and that they had such delight toheare him speake. At length he angrily asked him, What busines he had to do there? Plato answered him, he came to seeke a good man, Dionysius then replied againe; What, in Gods name, by thy speech the it seemeth thou hast found none yet. Now Dion thought that Dionysius anger wold proceed no further, & therfore at Platoes earnest request, he fent him away in a galley with three bankes of oares, the which Pollis a LACED EMONIAN Captaine caried backe againe into GRECE. Howbeit, Dionysius secretly requested Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as ever he wold do him pleasure: if not, yet that he would fell him for a slave, how soeuer he did; for, said he, he shall malies unto benothing the worle for that, because, if he be a just man, he shall be as happie to be a slave, as a Plato. freeman. Thus (as it is reported) this Pollis caried Plato into the Ile of ÆGINA, & there fold him. For the EGINETE's having war at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a decree, that all the A. Plato 6'd THENIANS that were taken in their Ile, shold be fold. This not with stading, Diony fins refused not in the le of to honor & trust Dion, as much as euer he did before, & did also send him Ambassador in matters ofgreat weight: as when he fent him vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaued himselfe so well, that he wan great reputation by his journey; and the tyrant could well away with his plain freech. For no man but he, durst fay their minds fo boldly vnto him, to speake what he thought Dions boldgood: as on a time he reproued him for Gelon. One day when they mocked Gelons gouernment nes in speabefore the tyrants face, and that Dionysius himself said (finely descanting on his name, which signisseth laughter) that he was euen the very laughing stocke it selfe of Sicile, the Courtiers tyrant. made as though they liked this encounter and interpretation of laughter passing well; but Dion Gelon figuri. notbeing well pleased withall, said vnto him: For his sake men trusted thee, whereby thou camest whetyrant: but for thine owne fake they will neuertrust any man: for (to say truly) Gelon shewed by his gouernment, that it was as goodly a thing as could be, to see a city gouerned by an absolute Prince: but Dionysius by his gouernment on the other side, made it appeare as detestable athing. This Dionysias had by his Locaian wife, three children; and by Aristomache, foure; of the which, two were daughters, the one called Sophrofyne, and the other Arete. Of them, Dionyfius el- Sophrofyne dest son maried Sophrosyné, and Areté was maried vnto his brother Thearides: after whose death Dion maried her, being his Necce. Now when Diony fins her father fell ficke, not likely to escape, ters of Dio-Dionwould have spoken with him for his children he had by his sister Aristomache. Howbeit the mysely Philitians about him, to curry fauor with the next heire and fucceffor of the tyranny, would ne uer lethim have any time or oportunitic to speake with him. For (as Timens writeth) they gave Dionmari-Dionysius the elder (as he had comanded them) a strong opiat drinke to cast him in a sleepe, and fotherby they took from him all his fenfes, and ioyned death with his sleepe. Notwithstanding te, the in the first counsell and affembly holden by his friends, to consult about the state and affaires of daughter of the yonger Dionysius, Dion moued matter so necessarie and profitable for that present time, that and glim by his wisedome he shewed they were all but children, and by his bold and franke speech made filter dithem know, that they were but flaues of the tyranny: because they beaftly and cowardly gaue flomeshe. such counsell and aduice, as might best please and feed the young tyrants humour. But, he made of Dion sius them most to wonder at him, when they fearing aboue all other things, the danger Dionysius the elder. flate was in, by reason of CARTHAGE, he did promise them, that if Dionysius would have peace, he would then go forthwith into Africke, and finde the meanes honourably to quench the warres: or, if otherwise he better liked of warre, that he would furnish him at his owne proper costs and charges, fifty gallies ready to rowe. Dionyseus wondred greatly at the noble mind of Dien, and thanked him much for the goodwill he bare vnto him, touching his effate. But all men else taking Diens noble offerto be a reproach of their auarice; and his credit and authority, Courtiers do an impaire vnto theirs: they presently vponthis liberall offer tooke occasion to accuse him, not incense piosparing any reprochfull words against him, to move Dionyfins to be offended with him. For they complained of him, and faid, that he cunningly practifed to possessive tyranny, making himselfe strong by sea, going about by his gallies to make the tyranny fall into the hands of the children of Aristomache his sister. But the chiefest cause of al why they did malice and hate him was his strange manner of life, that he neither would keepe company with them, nor live after their manner. For they that from the beginning were crept in favour and friendship with this young ill-brought-up tyrant, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleafures, fludied for no other thing, but to entertaine him in loue matters, and other vaine exercises, as to riot and banquet, to keepe light women companie, and all fuch other vile vicious pastimes and recreations: by the which the tyranny became like iron formed by fire, and feemed to be very pleafant vnto the subjects, because the ouer-great maiestie and severity therof was somwhat milder, nor fo much by the bounty and goodnetic, as by the folly and reichlesnesse of the Lord. Thus, this little care and regard increasing more and more, still winning way with the yong tyrant, didn length meltand breake afunder those strong Diamond chaines, with the which Dienysius theel. der made his boast that he left his Monarchie and tyranny chained to his son. For sometime he would be three daies together without intermission, still banqueting and being drunke; and all that time his Court gates were kept shut vnto graue and wise men, and for all honest matters. was then ful of drunkards, of common playes, dancings, masks, and mummeries, & ful of al fuch trumperie and dissolute pastimes. And therefore Dion vndoubtedly was much enuied of them. because he gaue himselfe to no sport and pleasure: whereupon they accused him, and missianed his vertues, vices, being somewhatto be refembled vnto them; as in calling his grauitie, pride. his plainneffe and boldnesse in his oration, obstinacie; if he did perswade them, that he accused them; and because he would not make one in their fond pastimes, that therfore he despised them. For to fay truly his maners by nature had a certaine haughtinesse of mind and seueritie, and he Disimaner was a fowre man to be acquainted with wherby his company was not only troublesome, but al. fo unpleasant to this yonger Dionysius, whose cares were so fine, that they could not away to heare any other thing but flatterie. And furthermore, divers of his very friends & familiars (that did like and commend his plaine manner of speech and noble mind) did yet reproue his sternenesse, and austere conversation with men; for it seemed vnto them, that he spake too roughly,& dealt ouer hardly with them that had to do with him, and more then became a civil or courteous man. And for proofe hereof, Plato himselfe sometime wrote vnto him (as if he had prophesied what should happen) that he should beware of obstinacie, the companion of solitarinesse, that bringeth a man in the end to be for faken of every one. This not with standing, they did more reuerence him at that time, then any manelle, because of the state and government, and forthat they thought him the onely manthat could best prouide for the safety and quietnesse of thetyranny, the which flood then in tickle flate. Now Dion knew wel enough, that he was not fowell taken and esteemed through the goodwill of the tyrant, as against his will, and for the necessitie of the state and time. So Dion supposing the ignorance, and want of knowledge in Dionysius was the cause, he denised to put him into some honest trade or exercise, & to teach him the liberalsia ences, to frame him to a civill life, that thenceforth he should no more be afraid of vertue, and should also take pleasure & delight in honest things. For Dionysius of his owne nature, was none of the worst fort of tyrants, but his father fearing that if he came once to hauea feeling and conceit of himselse, or that he companied with wise & learned men, he would go neare to enter into practife, & put him out of his feate he euer kept him locked up in a chamber, and wouldfuffer no man to speake with him. Then the yonger Dionysius, having nothing else to do, gaue himself to make little chariots candlesticks, chaires, stooles, and tables of wood for his father Dionysius was fo scareful and mistrustfull of every body, that he wold suffer no man with a paire of Barbers sizers to poule the haire of his head, but caused an image-maker of earth to come vnto him, and with a hote burning coleto burne his goodly bush of haire round about. No man came into his chamber where he was with a gowne on his backe, no not his owne brother nor fon, but he was driven (before he could come in) to put off his gowne, and the guard of his chamber to strip him naked, what focuer he was : and then they gaue him another gowne to cast vpon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptine: going about to describe vnto him the fituation of some place he tooke a halbard from one of the guard, and with the point thereof beganne to drawe out a plot of the same vpon the ground. Dionysius was terribly offended with him, and didput the fouldier to death that gaue him his halbard. He faid, he was affraid of his friends, yea and of the wifest of them; because he knew that they desired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to command, then to obey. He flue one of his Captaines called Marsias (whom he had preferred and had giuen him charge of men)because he dreamed, that he killed him: saying, that he dreamed of this in the night, because that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Diony- dreame, first that was fortimorous; and whose mind through fearefulnesse was still miserably occupied, was notwithstanding maruellously offended with Plato, because he did not judge him to be the noblest and valiantest man aliue. Dion therefore feeing (as we have faid) the yonger Dionysius cleane marred, and in manner cast away for lacke of good education, perswaded him the best Dion perhe could to give himselfe vnto studie, and by the greatest intreaty he could possibly make, to swades the pray the Prince of all Philosophers to come into Sicile And then, when through his intreaty mylin to fall hewerecome, that he would refer himselfe wholly vnto him, to the end that reforming his life to studie. by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby, (the best example that can be possible, and by whom the whole world is ruled and gouerned, which otherwise were out of all order and tonfused,) he should first obtaine great happinesse to himselfe, & consequently vnto all his citizens; who ever after through the temperance & inflice of a father, wold with good will do the se things, which they then vn willingly did for the feare of a Lord. And in doing this from a tyrant heshould come to be a king: for, the chaines of a Diamond to keepe a Realme in safety, were not force and feare, as his father Dionysius held opinion heither the great multitude of yong foldiers, northe guard of 10000 barbarous people:but in cotrary maner, that they were the loue & good will of their subjects) which the Prince obtaineth through vertue and justice the which chaines the lone of though they be flacker then the other that are so hard and stiffe, yet are they stronger, & will last their interior longer time, to keepe a realme and kingdome in fafety. And furthermore, the Prince (faid he) is not desirous of honor, neither is a man that descrueth greatly to be praised & commended, that only studieth to weare sumptuous apparel, & that glorieth to see his Court richly furnished, and himselfe curiously served: and in the meanetime doth not frame himselfe to speake better, to be wifer, and to carry agreater maiesty then any other meane or common person, not esteeming to adorne and beautifie the princely pallace of his mind, as becometh the royall Maiestie of a king. Dion oftentimes rehearling these exhortations vnto Dionysius, and otherwhile enterlacing betweene, some reasons he had learned of Plato, he graffed in him a wonderfull and (as it were) a vehement desire to haue Plato in his company, and to learne of him. So, sundry letters came fro Dionyflus vinto ATHENS, divers requests from Dion, & great intreatie made by certain Pythagorian Philosophers, that praied & perswaded Plato to come into SICILE, to bridle y light dispostion of this yong man, by his grave & wife instructions who without regard of reason, led a dissolute and licentious life. Therfore Plato (as himselfe reporteth) blushing to himselfe, and fearing kethe shold give men cause to think, that it was but the opinion men had of him, & that of him. felfe he was vnwilling to do any worthy act and further hoping that doing good but vnto one the yonger. manalone, who was the only guide of all the rest, he shold (as it were) recouer all Sicile from her corruption and ficknesse, he performed their requests that sent vnto him. But Dions enemies fearing the change and alteration of Dionysius, they persuaded him to call Philistus the Historiographer home againe fro banishment, who was a learned man, & had bin brought vp & acquainted with the tyrants faction: to the end he shold serve as a counter-poise, to withstand Plato and his Philosophy: for this Philistus, fro the first time that the tyranny began to be established, did shew himselfe very willing & cofnormable to the stablishment therof, and had of long time kept the castle: & the voice went, that he kept the mother of Dionysius the elder, & as it was supposed, not altogether without y tyrants knowledge. But afterwards, Leptines having had two daughters by one woman, whom he enticed to folly, being another mans wife, he maried one of these his daughters vnto Philistus, and madenot Dionysius prinie to it before. The tyrant therewith was so offended, that he put Leptines woman in prison fast locked vp, and draue Philistus out of Si-CILE. Hebeing banished thus, repaired vnto some of his friends that dwelt about the Adriaticke sea, where it seemeth, he wrote the most part of all his historie, being then at good leasure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionysius the elder : but after his death, the malice the Courtiers bare vnto Dion, caused them to procure Philistus calling home againe (as we have told you) as the man they thought would flicke flourly in defence of the tyranny. So, Philistus no sooner returned, but he stoutly began to defend the tyranny: and others in contrary manner, deuised accusations to the tyrant against Dion, accusing him that he had practised with Theodotes & Heraclides, to ouerthrow the tyranny of Dionysius. For Dion (in my opinion) hoped by Platoes coming to bridle and leffen a little the ouer-licentious and imperious tyranny of Die wyfius, and thereby to frame Dionyfius a wife and righteous governour. But on the other fide if he saw he would not follow his counsell, and that he yeelded not to his wife instructions, he then determined to put him downe, and to bring the gouernment of the comonwealth into the hands the govern of the Syrac vsans: not that he allowed of Democratia; (to wit, where the people governe) but yet certainly thinking that Democratia was much better then the tyranny, when they could not come vnto Aristocratia, (to wit, the gouernmet of a few of the Nobility.) Now things being in this state, Plate arrived in Sicile, where he was maruellously received & honored by Dionyllus. For when he landed on the shore, leaving his gally that brought him, there was ready for him one of the kings rich and sumptuous chariots, to convey him to the castel: & the tyrant mades. crifice to give the gods thanks for his coming, as for fome wonderfull great good hap chanced vnto his feigniorie. Furthermore, the wonderfull modesty and temperance that was begun to be observed in feasts and banquets, the Court cleane changed, & the great goodnes & clemency of the tyrant in althings, in ministring instice to enery manidid put the Syracvs ans in great good hope of change, and euery man in the Court was very defirous to give himselfe to learning and Philosophy: so that (as men reported) the tyrants pallace was full of fand & dust, with the not ber of students that drew plattes and figures of Geometry. Shortly after Plato was arrived, by chance the time was come about to do a folemn facrifice within the castellat which facrifice the herald (as the maner was) proclaimed aloud the folemne prayer accustomed to be done: That it would please the gods, long to preserve the state of the tyranny. Wherat, Dionysius being hardby him, faid vnto him. What, wilt thou not leaue to curfe me? This word grieved Philift is and his companions to the hart, thinking that with time, by litle and litle, Plato wold win such estimation and great authority with Dionylius, that afterwards they should not be able to refist him: confidering that in fo short a time as he had been with Dionysius, he had so altered his mind and courage. And therefore they now began, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mouth together to accuse Dion; and said, that it was easie to be seene, how he charmed and inchanted Diony sins through Platoes eloquence, to make him willing to refigne his government, because he would transfer it to the hands of the children of his fifter Aristomache. Others seemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIAN'S having come before into SICILIA with a great armie. both by fea and land, they were all loft and caft away, and could not win the citie of Syracvsa; and that now by one onely Sophister, they veterly destroyed and overthrew the Empire of Dioaryfus perfivading him to discharge the ten thousand souldiers he had about him for his guard, to forfake the foure hundred gallies, the ten thousand horsemen, and as many mo footmen, togo to the Academy to feeke an viknown happinesseneuer heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, refigning his prefent happinesse and felicity (to be a great Lord to have money at will, and to liue pleafantly,) vnto Dion and his Nephew. By fuch like accusations and wicked tongues, Dionyfius began first to mistrust Dion, and afterwards to be openly offended with him, and to frown evpon him. In the meane time they brought letters that Dion wrote fecretly vitto the Gouernors of the city of CARTHAGE, wishing them, that when they would make peace with Diony fins, they should not talke with him valesse he stood by affuring them that he would helpe them to fetthings in quietnesse, and that all should be well again. When Diomysius had read these letters with Philistus, and had taken his aduice and counfell what he should do as Timeus faid, he deceived Dion vnder pretence of reconciliation, making as though he meant him no hurt, and faying that he would become friends againe with him. So he brought Dion one day to the sea fide vnder his castell, and shewed him these letters, burdening him to have practised with the CARTHAGINIANS against him. And, as Dion went about to make him answer to cleare himself, Dionyfius would not heare him, but caused him to be taken vp as he was, and put into a pinnase, and commanded the mariners to fet him a land vpon the coaft of ITALY. After this was done, and that it was knowne abroade in the citie, every man thought it a cruell part of Diony fus: infomuch that the tyrants pallace was in a maruellous pecke of troubles, for the great forow the women made for the departure of Dion. Moreouer, the citie felf of Syracvs a began to look about them, looking for fome fodeine great change & innouation, for the tumult and vprore that wold happen by meanes of Dions banishment, and for the mistrust also that all men wold have of Dionyssius. Dionysius considering this, and being afraid of some misfortune, he gaue his friends and the women of his pallace comfortable words, telling them that he had not banished him, but was contented contented that he should absent himselfe for a time; being afraid, that in his sudden angry mood he might paraduenture be compelled to do him some worse turne if he remained because of his obstinacie and selfe-will. Furthermore, he gauevnto Dions friends two ships, to carrie as much goods, mony, and as many of Dions servants as they would, and to convey them vnto him into PELOPONNESUS. Dion was a maruellous rich man, and for the pompe of his seruice, and sumptuous moueables of his house, they were like vnto the person of a tyrant. All these riches Dions friends brought aboord vpon those ships, & caried them vnto him; besides many other rich gifts which the women and his friends fent vnto him : fo that by meanes of his great riches, Dien was maruellously esteemed among the GRECIANS; who by the riches of a banished citizen, conieaured what the power of a tyranny might be. But now concerning Plato. When Dion was exiled. Dionylius caused him to be lodged in his castle, and by this means crastily placed (vnder cloke offriendship) an honorable guard about him, because he shold not returne into GREECE to seek Dion, to tell him of the iniurie he had done vnto him. Howbeit, Diony fines often frequenting his company, (as a wild beaft is made tame by companie of man) he liked his talke so well, that he became in loue with him, but it was a tyrannicall loue : for he would have Plato to loue none but Dionyfine him, and that he should esteeme him about all men living, being ready to put the whole realme lough into his hands, and all his forces, fo that he would thinke better of him then of Dion. Thus was Plate. this passionate affection of Diony lius gricuous vnto Plato: for he was so drowned with the loue of him, as men extremely iealous of the women they loue, that in a moment he would fodainly fall out with him, and straight againe become friends, and pray him to pardon him. And to say truly, he had a maruellous defire to heare Platoes Philosophie: but on the other side, he reuer eced them that did disswade him from it, and told him, that he wold spoile himself, if he entred ouer-deeplv into it. In the meane time fell out warre, and thereupon he fent Plato againe away, promising him, that the next Spring he would fend for Dionhome. But he brake promise therein, and yet fent Plato fent him his reuenues : and praied Plato to pardon him, though he had not kept promife at his from him. time appointed. For he alleadged the warre was the cause, and that so soone as he had ended his war, he would fend for Dion; whom in the meanetime he prayed to have patience, and not to attemptany stir or alteratio against him, nor to speak euil of him among the GRECIANS. This Plato Dionilife fought to bring to passe, and brought Dion to study Philosophy, and kept him in the Academy at ATHENS. Dion lay in the city of ATHENS with one Calippus, whom he had known of long times howbeit, he bought him a house in the country, to lie there sometime for his pleasure; the which hegaueafterwards(at his returne into Sicile) vnto Speulippus that kept him company, and was continually with him more then with any other friend he had in ATHENS, through Platoes counfell who to foften & recreate Diens manners, gaue him the company of some pleasant conceited man, knowing that this Speusppus could modestly observe time & place to be pleasant & mery: for which respect, Timon in his satyricall leasts, calleth Spensippus, A good leaster. Now Plato himfelfe having vindertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dancing of yong children, Dion tooke the paines to teach: and exercise them; and moreouer, himselfe was at the whole charge of these playes, Plato suffering him to bestow that liberality and courtesse vpon the A-THENIAN s: the which wan Diona great deale more good wil, then Plato honor. Dion kept not still at ATHENS, but went also to see the other good cities of GRECE, passing his time away. He bc. ing at common fealts and affemblies with the chiefest men, and best learned in matters of state and gouernment, and neuer shewing any light parts, nor signe of tyrannical pride in his manner of life, nor of a manthat had been brought vp with all pompe and pleasure, but like a graue vertuous man, and well studied in Philosophy, whereby he grew to be generally beloued and estecmed of all men the city granted him publike honours, and fent him degrees of his glory, made Dioni verin their councels and affemblies. Furthermore, the LACED EMONIANS made him a SPARTAN & tues and ho Burgesse of the city, not passing for Dionysius displeasure, thoughat that time he had given them now bir by great aide, in the war they made against the Thebans. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Ptaodorus Me GARIAN, to come and see him at his house, and Dion went thither. This Ptaodorus was a maruellons great rich man, and therefore Dion feeing a great number of people standing at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and speake with him, he had such great busines: he turned vnto his friends that did accompany him, who were angry they made him tariefo long at the gate, and faid vnto them: What cause have we to think e cuill of him, fith we did the like when we were at Syracvsa? But Dionysius being incensed with enuicagainst him, and fearing the good will the GRECTANS bare him, he kept backe his revenue, and would no more fend it him; and seized all the goods, the which he gaue to his receivers to keepe. Furthermore, because he would cleare himself of the infamie he had gotten amongst the Philosophers for Platoes fake, he fent for divers wife and learned men, and vainly covering to excell them all in wifedome, he was driven improperly, and out of time, to alledge many wife fayings he had learned of Plato. Thereuponhe began againe to wish for him, and to condemne himselfe, for that he had no wit to vie him well when he had him at his commandement, and that he had not heard him fo much as he should have done: and like atyrant as he was, madly caried away with light defires, and eafily changing mind from time to time, a fodaine vehement defire tooke him in the head, to have Plato againe. So he fought all the meanes and waies he could devise, to pray Archytas the Pythagorean Philosopher, to tell him that he might boldly come; and to be his furety vnto him for that he would promife him : for first of all, they were acquainted together by his meanes. Therfore Archytas sent thirher Archidamus the Philosopher. Dionyfius also sent certaine gallies, and some of his friends thither, to pray Plato to come to him, and he himselfe wrote specially and plainly, that it should not go well with Dion if Plato came not into Sicile; but if he would be perfivaded to come, that then he would do what he would have him. Many letters and requests came vnto Dion from his wife and fifter, infomuch as Dion so vsed the matter, that Plato obeyed Dionysius without making any excuse at all. So Plato writeth himselfe, that he was driven to come againe the third time into the streight of Sicile;

To tries if once he could Charybdis dangers paffe. Now Plato being arrived in Sietle, he made Diony sus a great toy full man, and filled all Siet-LE, againe with great good hope: for they were all very defirous, and did what they could, to make Plato overcome Philistus and the tyrannie with his Philosophie. The women of Dionysus Court did entertaine Plato the best they could: but about all, Dionysius seemed to have a maruellous trust and affiance in him, & more then in any other of all his friends. For he suffered Plato to come to him without fearching of him, and oftentimes offered to give him a greatfumme of money:but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Aristippus Cyr Enian being at that time in the tyrants Court in Sicile, faid, that Dionysius bestowed his liberality surely: for, to vs that aske much, he giueth little, and much vnto Plato, that requireth nothing. After Diony fins hadgiuen Plato his welcome, he beganne to moue him againe of Dion. Dionysius on the other side, at the first did vie him with fine delayes, but afterwards he shewed himselfe angry indeed, and at length fellout with Plato, but yet so couertly that others faw it not: for Diony sins diffembled that; but otherwise in all other things he did him as much honour as he could deuise, practifing thereby to make him to forfake Dions friendship. Now Plato found him at the first, that there was no trust to be given to his words, and that all were but lies and devices he either faid or did: howbeit, he kept it to himselfe, and ener patiently bare all things, hoping for the best, and made as though he beleeved him. They two thus finely diffembling with each other, thinking to deceine all men, and that none should understand their secrets: Helycon CYZICENIAN, one of Platoes friends, did prognosticate the cclipse of the Sunne. The same falling out as he had prognofficated, the tyrant effected maruelloufly of him, and gaue him a filuer talent for his labour. Then Ariflippus sporting with other Philosophers, said, he could tell them of a stranger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognofticate (faid he) that Plato and Dionysius will be enemies ereit belong. In the end it came to passe, that Diozysius made port-sale of all Dions goods, and kept the money to himselfe, and lodged Plato (that before lay in the next court to his pallace) among the fouldiers of his guard, whom he knew maliced him of long time, and fought to kill him, because he did perswade Dionysius to leave his tyrannie, and to live without his guard, Plate being in this instant danger, Archytas sent Ambasfadours forthwith vnto Dionysius, in a galley of thirty ores, to demaund Plato againe: declaring that Plato came againe to Syracvsa vpon his word and caution. Dionyfius to excuse himselfe, and to shew that he was not angry with him, at his departure from him, he made him all the greatcheare and feafts he could, and fo fent him home with great shewes of good will. One day among the rest, he said vnto Plato: I am afraid Plato (said he) that thou wilt speake enill of me when thou art among thy friends and companions in the Academie. Then Plate smiling, answer red him againe: The gods forbid, that they should have such scarcity of matter in the Academie, as that they must needs talke of thee. Thus was Platoes returne, (as it is reported) although that which he himselfe writeth, agreeth not much with this report. These things went to Dions heart, fo that fhortly after he shewed himselse an open enemie vnto Dionysius, but specially when he heard how he had handled his wife. Plate under couert words fent Dienyfius word of it by his letters; and thus it was. After Dion was exiled, Dionyfins returning Plato backe again, he willed him fecretly to feele Dions mind, whether he would not be angry that his wife flould be ma- Dionyfin ried to another man; because there ranne a rumour abroad, (whether it were true, or invented by pions enemies) that he liked not his mariage, and could not live quietly with his wife. There- another me, fore when Plate was at ATHENS, and had told Dien of all things, he wrote a letter vnto Dienvilus the tyrant, and did fet all other things downe fo plainly, that every man might vnderstand him. butthis one thing onely fo darkly, that he alone and none other could vinderstand him, but he to whom he had written: declaring vnto him, that he had spoken with Dion about the matter he world of, and that he did let him vnderstand he would be maruellous angrie if Dionylius did it. So at that time, because there was great hope of reconciliation betweene them, the tyrant did nothing lately touching his fifter, but fuffered her still to remaine with Dions sonne. But when they were so farre out, that there was no more hope to returne into fauour againe, and that he had also fent home Plato in difgrace and displeasure, then he maried his fifter Areie (Dions wife) against her will, vnto one of his friends called Timocrates, not following therein (Dions wife) against her will, vitto one or his friends cauca 1 mourales, not following therein his fathers infice and lenity. For Polyxenus that had maried his fathers fifter Theffa, being also manied his fathers fifter Theffa, become his enemie, fled out of Sicile. Diony flus the elder fent for his fifter Theffa, and tooke Habis faher vp very sharply, for that she knowing her husband would slie, did not come and tell him of ther Dioit. Thesta nobly answered him againe, and neuer was afraid nor abashed: Why, Dionysius, doest thou thinke me a woman fo faint-hearted and beaftly, that if I had knowne my husband would hauegone his way and left me, I would not haue taken fea with him, and both haue runne one Theftarnto her breiber fortune together? Truly, I knew not of his departure till he was gone : for it had been more for Dionylus mine honour, to have been called the wife of the banished Polyxenus, then the fifter of thee a tyrant. Diony fius maruelled to heare his fifter speake thus boldly, and the Syracy sans wondred ather noble courage: infomuch, that when the tyranny was vtterly destroyed, they did not refuscto do her all the honor they could deuise, as vnto a Queene. And when she was dead also, all the citizens of Syracvsa by a common decree, did accompany her body at her buriall. This litledigreffion from our history, is not altogether vnprofitable. But now again to our matter. Dian from thenceforth disposed himself altogether vnto war against Platoes counsell and aduice: who did his best endeuour to perswade him from it, both for the respect of Dionysius good entervain- make warre ment he had given him, as also for that Dion was of great years. Howbeit, on the other fide, Seeuspens and his other friends did prouoke him vnto it, and perswaded him to deliuer Sicil E from the flauery and bondage of the tyrant, the which held vp her hands vnto him, and would receine him with great loue and goodwill. For whilest Plato lay at Syracysa, Spensippus keeping the citizens copany more then Plate did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the first, hey were afraid to open themselues vnto him, and frankly to speake what they thought, mistrusting he was a fpie vnto the tyrant, fent among it them to feele their minds; but within short time they beganto trust him, and were all of one mind; for they praied & perswaded Dionto come, and not The Philiolo. to care otherwise for bringing of ships, souldiers, nor horses with him, but only to hire a ship, & pheriadus. tolend the Sicilians his body and name against Dionysius. Speusippus reporting thesenewes ced Dions vnto Dion, did put him in good heart againe: wherupon he began fecretly to leavy men by other mens meanes, to hide his purpose and intent. The Philosophers do set forward Dions wars many diffuses citizens dealing in the affaires of the comonwealth, did aid him, & divers of them also that only dialogue, de gaue their minds to the studie of Philosophy: and among them, Eudemus Cyprian (on whose death Ariffotle wrote his Dialogue of the foule) and Timonides LEVEADIAN went with him. Furthermore, there iouned also with him Milias THESSALIAN, a Soothsayer, and that had bin his companion in study in the Academie. Now, of all them whom the tyrant had banished. (which were no leffe then a thousand persons) there were but only flue and twenty that durft accompany him in this war: for all the other were such dastards, that they for sooke him, and durst not go with him. The place where they appointed to meet, was the Ile of ZACINTH, where they leauled all their fouldiers, that were not aboue eight hundred in all, but all of them braue foul. Dious army diers and valiant men, and excellently well trained in warres and to conclude, fuch luftic men, as wold encourage althe army Dion hoped of at his arrivall in Sicils, to fight like valiant men with them. These hired souldiers, the first time that they understood it was to go into Sicilia. to make warre with Diony sius, they were amazed at the first, and misliked the journey, because it was vndertaken rather of malice and spight that Dien had to be reuenged, then otherwise of any good cause or quarrell; who having no better hope, took evpon him desperate and impossible enterprises. Therfore the souldiers were offended with their Captains that had pressed them, because they had not told them of this warre before. But, after that Dien by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies have enill foundations, and are subject vnto ruine; and that he led them not into Sicile for much for fouldiers, as he did to make them Captaines of the Syracy sans and the other Sicilians, who of long time defired nothing more then occasion to rife; and when after him also Alcimenes (a companion with him in this warre, and the chiefest man of all the ACHAIANS, both for nobility and estimation) did speake vnto them in like maner; then they were all contented to go whither they would leade them. It was then in the heate of Sommer. and the wind blew, called the GRECIAN wind, the Moone being at the full; and Dion having prepared to make a fumptuous facrifice vnto the god Apollo, he led al his men armed with white corflets in procession into the temple : and after the facrifice done, he made them a feast in the parke or shew-place of the ZACINTHIANS. There the tables were laid, and the fouldiers wondered to fee the great state and magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and filuer, & such other furniture & preparation as paffed a private mans wealth: then they thought with themselves, that a man being fo old, and Lord of fo great a good, would not attempt things of fuch danger, with out good ground, and great affurance of his friends aid and help. But, after his oblations of wine & common praiers made to the gods at feasts, sodainly the Moone eclipsed. Dion thought it not strange to see an eclipse, considering the revolutions of the eclipses, and knowing wery well it is shadow that falleth upon the body of the Moone, because of the direct interposition of the earth betwixt her & the Sun. But because the soldiers that were afraid & astonied withal, stood inneed of some comfort & encouragement, Militas the Soothsayer standing up in the midst among the faid vnto them. My fellow foldiers, be of good cheare, & affure your felues that we shal prosper. for God doth foreshew vs by this fight we see, that some one of the chiefest things now in highoft place & dignity shalbe eclipsed. And at this present time, what thing carieth greater glory and fame, then the tyrany of Dionysius? Therfore you must think, that so soone as you arrive in Sici-LE, your selues shal put out his light & glory. This interpretation of the eclipse of the Moone, did Miltas the foothfayer make before all the whole company. But touching the swarme of Bees that lighted on the poope of Dians fhip, he told him and his friends prinatly: That he was afraid his acts (which should fall out famous and glorious) should last but a while, and slourishing a few dayes, would straight consume away. It is reported also, that Dionysius in like manner had many strange signes and wonderfull tokens from aboue. Among others, there came an Eagle, that snatched a partifan out of a foldiers hand, and caried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the fea. The fea also beating against the walles of the castle, was as sweete to drinke a whole day together, as any conduit or running water as those that tasted of it, found it true. Furthermore, a Sow farrowed Pigges that lacked no part of their body but onely their eares. This the Soothfayers faid, did fignifie rebellion and disobedience of his subjects: and that the Citizens would no more heare him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they toldalfo, that the fweetnesse of the falt water prognosticated to the Syracy sans change of cruell and cuill time, vnto good and ciuill gouernment; and that the Eagle, Iupiters minister; and the partisan, the marke and token of the kingdome and empire; did betoken, that Iupiter (the chiefe of all the gods) had determined to destroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So, Dions souldiers were embarked into two great ships of burden, and another third ship that was not very great, and two pinnaces with thirty oares, followed them, For their armourand weapon, befide those the foldiers had, he caried two thousand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pikes, and plenty of victuals: that they should lack nothing all the time they were vpon the sea, confidering that their iourney flood altogether at the courtefie of the winds & fea; and for that they were affraid to land, understanding that Philistus rode at anker in the coast of Apvolia, with a fleete of shippes that lay in waite for their coming. So having a pleasant gale of wind, they failed the space of twelve dayestogether, and the thirteenth day they came to the foreland of Sicile called Pachynus. There the Pylotthought it best they should land presently: for if they willingly looffed into the sea, and lost that point, they were sure they should lose also many nights and daies in vaine in the midst of the sea, being then Sommer time, and the wind at the South. But Dion being affraid to land so neare his enemies, he was defirous to go farther, and so past by the foreland of PACHYNVs. Then the North wind rose so bigg and great, that with great on the sea violence it draue back their ships from the coasts of Stetle. Furthermore, lightning and thunder mingled withall, (because it was at that time when the starre Arcturus beginnethto shew) it made fo terrible a tempest, and powred down such a fore shower of raine vpon them, that all the mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whither the wind would drive them, til that suddenly they faw the storm had cast them upon the Ile of CERCINA, (which is on the coast of LyBIA)& specially where it is most dangerous to arrive for the rocks; for their ships were like to hauerun voon them, and to haue made shipwracke. But with much ado they bare off the ships with their great long poles, and wandred vp and downe the fea, not knowing whither they went untill the storme ceassed. Then they met a shippe, whereby they knew that they were in the flat. which the mariners cal, The heads of the great Syrte. Thus they wandring vp and downe, being maruellous angry that the sea was calme, there rose a little South wind from the land, although they least looked for any such wind at that time, and litle thinking it would so have changed but feeing the wind rife bigger and bigger, they packed on all the failes they had, and making their prayers vnto the gods, they croffed the fea, and failed from the coast of Lybia, directly vnto Sicile, and had the wind fo luckie, that at the fifth day they were neare vnto a litle village of Sicile, called Minon, the which was subject to the Carthaginians. Synalus Carthagi- Synalus NIAN, being at that time Captaine and gouernour of the towne of MINOA, and Diors friend, Captaine of wasthere by chance at this prefent, who being ignorant of his enterprise and coming, did. Minea for what he could to keepe Dions fouldiers from landing. But they not with standing sodainly leapt simen. onland armed, but flue no man: for Dion had commanded them the contrary, for the freindship pion wan hebare the Captaine; and they following the townsmen hard that fled before them, entired the towne hand ouer head amongst them, and so wan the market place. When both the Captaines met, and that they had spoken together, Dion deliuered the towne into Synalus hands againe, without any hurt or violence offered him. synalus on the other fide, did endeuour himfelfeall he could to make much of the fouldiers, and holpe Dion to prouide him of all things necessary. But this did most of all encourage the soldiers, because Dionysius at their arrivall, was not then in S1-CILE: for it chanced so, that not many daies before he went into ITALY with fourescore faile. Therefore when Dion willed them to remaine there a few daies to refresh themselves, because they had bin fo fore sca-beaten a long time together, they the selues wold not, they were so glad to imbrace the occasion offered them, and prayed Dion to leade them forthwith to Syracysa. Distribution all his superfluous armor and provision in the hands of Synalus, and praying him to fendthem to him when time served, he tooke his way towards Syracvsa. So by the way, two hundred horsemen of the Argentines, which dwell in that part called Ecnomy scame first to joyne with him, and after them, the Geloians. The rumour of their coming ran straight to Synacys A: thereupon Timocrates that had maried Areté, Dions wife, and Dionyfius the fathers fifler, and to whom Diony sus the yonger had left the charge and government of all his men and friends in the citie:he presently dispatched a post with letters, to aduertise Dionysius of Dions coming. He himself also in the meanetime had taken such order, that there rose no tumult nor mutime in the city, though they all of them lacked no goodwil to rebel; but because they were vncertaine whether this rumor were true or false, (being afraid) enery man was quiet. Now there chancedastrange misfortune vnto the messenger which caried the letters vnto Dionysius. For after he had passed the straight, and that he was arrived in the citie of RHEGIO of ITALIE side, pered anto making hasteto come to the city of CAVLONIA, where Dionysius was, he met by the way one the meginof his acquaintance that caried a mutton but newly facrificed. This good fellow gaue him a Dienifia. pecce of it, and the messenger spurred away withalthe speed he could possible but when he had ridden the most part of the night, he was so wearic and drowsie for lacke of sleepe, that he was drinen to lye downe: so he lay downe vpon the ground in a wood hard by the high way. The fauour of this fleshbrought a Wolfe to him that caried away the flesh and the portmantle it was wrapt in, and in the which also were his letters of aduertisement, which he carried vnto Dionysius. When he awoke out of his sleepe, and saw that his portmantle was gone, he enquired for it, and went wandring vp and downe along time to seeke it: howbeit, all in vaine, for the me flenhe could neuer find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to go to the tyrant without his letters, but rather to flie into some vnknowne place, where no body knew him. Thus of uerlate received Dionysius advertisement by others of this war, which Dion made in Sicile In the meane time, the CAMARINIANS came & joyned with Dions army, in the high-way towards Syracy sa: and still there came vnto him also a great number of the Syracy sans that wereyn in armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other fide, certaine CAMPANIANS and LEON. TINE s, which were gotten into the castle of Epipoles with Timocrates, of purpose to keepeir. vpon a false rumour Dion gaue out (and which came vnto them) that he would first goe against their townes: they for sooke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dian vnderstanding that, being lodged with his army in a place called MACR #, he presently removed his camp, being darke night, and marched forward till he came vnto the river of Anapus, which is not from the city aboue ten furlongs off:& there staying a while, he sacrificed vnto the riue, and made his prayer, and worshipped the rising of the Sunne. At the selfe same instantalso, the Soothsayers came and told him, that the gods did promise him assured victorie. And the souldiers also seeing Dion weare a garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremonie of the facrifice, all of them with one selfe good will tooke every man one of them, being no lesse then fine thousand men that were gathered together by the way, and but slenderly armed with such things as came first to hand, how beit, supplying with good will their want of better furniture and armor:) and when Dion commanded them to march, for ioy they ranne, and encouraged one another with great cries, to shew themselves valiant for recovery of their libertie. Now for them that were within the citie selfe of Syraevsa, the Noblemen and chiefe Citizens went to receive them at the gates, in their best gownes. The common people on the other fide, ran and fet vpon them that tooke part with the tyrant, and spoiled them that were called the PROSAGOGIDES (as much to fay, The common Promooters of men) the detectablest villaines, hatefull to the gods and men: for they like Sycophants and buffetale-bearers, would ict vp and downethecity, and mingle among the Citizens, having an oare in enery mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and busie headed, to know what every man said and did, and then to go carie it to the tyrant. These men were they that had their payment first of all, for they killed them with drie blowes, beating them to death with states. When Timocrates could not enterinto the castell with them that kept it, he tooke his horse backe, and sled out of the city; and slying, made all men afraid and amazed where he came; enlarging Dions power by his report, because ir should not seeme, that for feare of a trifle, he had for saken the city. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the citie with his men, and was come so neare, that they might see him plainly from the citie, marching foremost of all, armed with a faire bright white corfelet, having his brother Megacles on the right hand of him, & Calippus ATHENIAN On the left hand, crowned with garlands of flowers: and after him also there followed an hundred souldiers that were strangers, chosen for his guard about him, and the rest came marching after in good order of battell, being led by their Captaines. The Syracvsans faw him coming, and went out and received him as a holy & bleffed proceffion, that brought them their liberty and popular state againe, the which they had lost the space of eight and fortie yeares. When Dion was come into the city, by the gate called Menitide, he caused his trumpeter to sound, to appease the rumor & tumult of the people. Then he commanded an Herald to proclaime aloud: That Dion and Megacles, who were come to put down the tyranny, did set all the Syracus and all the other Sicilians also from the bondage and subjection of the tyrant. And because Dion himself was desirous to speake vnto the people, he went to the vpper part of the towne, called Acradina. The Syracysans, all the streetes through as he passed by, had on either hand of him prepared sacrifices, and set up tables and cuppes vpon them : and as he passed by their houses, they cast slowers and fruites on him, and made prayers vnto him, as if he had beene a god. Now, vnder the castell there was a place called Pentapyla(a clocke, to know by the Sunne how the day went) the which Dionysius had caused to be made, and it was of a good pretie height. Dien got vp vponit, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perswading his countrimen to doe their endeuour to recouer their liberty againe; and to maintaine it. They being in a maruellousiey withall, and defirous to please Dion, did choose him and his brother Megaeles their Lieurenants generall, with absolute power and authoritie. Afterwards also, by the consent of Dion himselfe and his brother, and at their requests in like manner, they choic twenty other Captaines, of the which the most part of them had beene banished by the tyrant, and were returned again with Dion. The Sooth fayers and Prognofficators liked it well, and faith it was a good figne for Dion, that he trode that sumptuous building & workmanship of the tyrant under his feete, when he made his Oration: but because the hand of the Diall did shew thought the courfe of the Sunne, which neuer leaveth going, vpon the which he got vp when he was Southairs chosen Lieutenant generall with absolute power and authoritie, they were afraid againe, that irwas a figne Dions affaires should have a sudden change of fortune. After this, Dion having taken the castle of Epipoi Bs, he set al the citizens at liberty, which were kept there as prisoners incaptiuity by the tyrant, and environed the castell round about with a wall. Within seuen daies after, Diony flus returned by sea to the castell of Syracvsa,, and therewith all also came the carts loaden with armour and weapon to Syracvsa, which Dien had left with Singlus: the which Dien caused to be distributed among the citizens of Syracys a that had none. Others did furnish themselues as well as they could, and shewed that they had courage and goodwill to fight for the maintenance and defence of their liberty. In the meanetime, Dionyfius sent Ambassadors, first vnto Dion privately, to see if he would yeeld to any composition. But Dion would not heare them, but bade them tell the Syracusan's openly what they had to fay, being pionyjuis menthat were free, and enjoyed liberty. Then the Ambassadors spake in the behalfe of the tyrant, vnto the people of Syracvsa, promising them with mild and gentle words, that they mio Dien. should pay no more subsidies and taxes, but very little, and should be no more troubled with warres, other then fuch asthey themselves should like of. The SYRACV SAN'S made a mockeric arthose offers, and Dion also answered the Ambassadours, and willed Dionysius to send no more to the Syra cvs ans, before he had disposses himself of his tyrannie: &, so that he would leave in he would be his meane to obtaine all things iust and reasonable of the people. Dionysius liked very well of this good offer; and therfore fent his Ambaffadors again to pray the Syracvsans; that they would appoint some amongst them to come to the castell, to talke with him for the benefit and commodity of the commonwealth, that he might heare what they would alledge, and they also what answer he would make. Dien chose certaine whom he sent vnto him. Now there ranne a rumor in the city among the Syracy sans, which came from the caftell, that Dionysus would willingly of himselfe, rather then by reason of Dions coming, depose himselfe of thetyranny. But this was but a falfe allarme, and crafty fetch of Dionysius, to entrap the Syracysans by. For those that were sent him from the city, he kept them prisoners every man of them, and one morning having made his fouldiers drinke wine luftily, which he kept in pay to guard his person, he sent them with great fury to assault the walthe Syracvsans had built against the castel. Now, because the Syracy san's looked for nothing lesse then for the sudde assault, & for that these barbarous people with a wonderfull courage and great tumult ouerthrew the wal, and others of them also did set upon the Syracus ans, there was not aman of them that durst make head to fight with them, fauing the fouldiers that were strangers, whom Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard the noise, ranne straightto repulse them, and yet they themselucs could not well tell what they should do vponthat sudden. For they could heare nothing for the great noise and hurly burly of the Syracvsans, which fled with great disorder, and came and mingled themselues amongst them. Till at length, Dion perceiving he could not be heard to shew them by deed what they should do he went first himselfe against these barbarous people, and about him there was a cruell and bloudy fight for his enemies knew him as well as his bloody by owne men, and they all ranne vpon him with great cries. Now for Dion himselfe, indeed because of his age, he was heavier then was requisite for one that should away with the paines of Dion hurt. fuch battels; but he had fuch a valiant courage in him, that he went through with all lustily, and flue them that did affaile him. Yet he had his hand also thrust through with a pike, and very hardly did his curaces hold out the blowes of the darts and thrufts by hand which he received on them, they were fo mangled & hacked with fuch a number of dams and pikes passed through his shield and broken on him, that in the end he was beaten downe: howbeit his fouldiers refeued him straight. Then he made Timonides their Captaine, and he himselfe tooke his horsebacke; and went vp and downe the citie, staying and quieting the slying of the Syracvsans. Then he fent for his fouldiers the strangers, which he had put in garrison in that part of the city called the Ackading to keepe it; and brought them being fresh, against the barbarous people of the castle that were wearied, and almost all of them discouraged to attempt any further enterprise. For they had made this fallie out, in hope to have taken all the city at the first onset, onely running vp and downerbut when contrary to their expectation, they met these valiant fouldiers, and tresh supply, they then began to retire againe into the castell. And the GRE. CIAN fouldiers on the other fide, perceining they gave backe, they came the faster vpon them, fo that they were compelled to turne their backes, and were driven within the wals, after they had flaine threescore and foureteene of Dions men, and lost a great number of their owne. This was a noble victorie, and therefore the Syracvsans gaue the foldiers that were strangers, an hundred filuer Minaes, in reward for their good feruice; and they gaue Dion their Generallia crown of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a trumpet from the castle, written from the women of his house; and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed, To my father. the which Hipparinus wrote vnto him. For that was Dions fonnes name, though 2 imais writeth he was called Areteus, after his mothers name Areie. But in fuch matters, me thinks Timonides is better to be credited, because he was his friend and companion in armes. All the other letters that were fent, were openly read before the affembly of the Syracysans, and did onely concerne requests of these women vnto Dion. The Syracvsans would not have the sunposed letter of his sonne to be openly read: but Dion against their minds opened it, and found that it was Dionysius letter who by words, made the direction of it vnto Dion, but in effect, he spake vnto the Syracvsans. For in fight, it seemed a manner of request and instification of him: but intruth, it was written of purpose to accuse Dion, First of all, he remembred him of the things he had done before, for the establishing and preservation of the tyranny: and afterwards, of cruell threats against those whom he should loue best, as his wife, his sonne, and sifter and last of all, full of most humble requests and intreaties, with sorow and lamentation. Butthat which most moued Dien of all other, was, that he required him not to destroy the tyranny, but rather to take it for himselfe, and not to set them at liberty that hated him, and would alwaies remember the mischiefe he had done vnto them; and that he would himselfe take vpon him to be Lord, faving by that means the lives of their parents & friends. When these letters had biaread before the whole affembly of the people, the Syracvsans thought not how to reuerence (as they ought; with admiration, the inflexible constancy & magnanismity of Dion, that stood firme and fast for inflice and vertue, against such vehement intreaty & perswasion of his kinsfolke and friends: but they contrarily began to be afraid, and to mistrust him, as he that of necessity should be forced to pardon the tyrant, for the great pledges and hostages he had of him. Wherfore, they beganne to chuse them new governors, and the rather, because they heard that Heraelides was coming vnto them, whom they loued fingularly well. This Heraclides was one of them that had been banished, a good souldier and Captaine, and well esteemed of for the charge and office he bare under the tyrants howbeit, a very unconstant man in every thing, and would not continue long in a mind, and lest constant in warres where he had great charge of honor in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in Peloponnesus; wherefore he determined to come with a powerby himselfe, and with his owne fleet against the tyrant. So he arrived at length in Syracis, with feuen gallies, and three other ships: where he found Dionysius againe shut vp into his castell with a wall, and the Syracysans alfoto haue the better hand of him. Then he began to curry fauor with the common people all the waies he could possibly deuise, having by nature a certaine pleafing maner to win the comon people, which feek nothing else but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the easier for him to win them, because the people did already mislike Dions seucrity, as a man too seuere and cruell to gouerne a common wealth. For they had now their will so much, and were growne fo strong headed, because they saw themselves the stronger, that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free cities, where they only be Lords, and do rule) before they were fully fet at liberty. Therefore first of all, not being called together by the authority of the governours, they ranne in a fury, of their owne light heads, vnto the place of common affemblies, and there chose Heraclides Admirall. Then Dion vnderstanding this, came to complaine of the iniurie they had done him, declaring vnto them, that to give this power now vnto Heraclides, was to take that away which they had first given vnto him: because he should no more be Generall, if they chose any other Admirall by iea then himselfe. The SyracvsANs then, as it were against their wils did renoke the power they had given vnto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion sent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a little, and told him, it was not honeftly, nor profitably done of him, to fue to the people, and to contend for honour against him in so dangerous a time, when the least occasion in the world was inough to haue marred al. Afterwards, Dion himself called an affembly againe of the city, and established Heraclides Admirall ; and perswaded the citizens to give him souldiers, as he had indeed. Heraclides outwardly feemed to honour Dion, and confeiled openly that adiffinhe was greatly bound vnto him, and was alwaies at his heeles very lowly, being ready at his beneath commandement: but in the meane time; fecretly he inticed the common people to rebell, and the people to stirre up those whom he knew meete men to like of change. Whereby he procured Dion fuch ribiliatrouble, & brought him into fuch perplexity, that he knew not wel which way to take. For, if he Dion. gaue them advice to let Diony fus quietly come out of the castle, then they accused him, & faid, he did it to faue his life: if on the contrary fide, because he would not trouble them, he continued fiege still, and established nothing; then they thought he did it of purpose to draw out the warsin length, because he might the longer time remaine their Chieftain generall, & so to keepe the citizens longer in feare. At that time there was one Softs in Syracysa, a man of no name, education but noted among the Syracy sans for his villanie and wickednesse, esteeming that full and weeks sedicion ample liberty, when he might vnchecked licenciously speake what he would, as indeed he did. For he feeking to do Dion a displeasure, first of all one day at a common councel he stood up on hisfeete, and called the Syracus and beafts (among ft many other vile words he gaue them) if they did not perceive, that being come from a fond and drunken tyrannie, they had now receiueda sober maister, and a wife warie tyrant. So, when he had thus openly shewed himfelfe an enemy vnto Dion, he came no more that day into the market place: but the next morning he was seene running vp and downe the city naked, his head and face all of a goare-bloud. asifhe had been followed of men to have flaine him. Thus Sofis, coming in this manner into the middest of the market place, cried out that Dions strangers had lyen in wait for him, and had handled him in this fort, shewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this mattervery grieuoufly, and cried out vpon Dion, and fayd it was vilely and tyrannically done of him, by feare of murther and danger, to take away the libertic from the citizens to speake. Now, though the whole affembly hereupon fell into an vprore withall; Dion not with standing Diencleacame thither to cleare himselfe of these accusations, and made them presently see, that this solis was brother to one of Diony suard: who had put into his head, in this fort to put the citie of again shim. Syracy sa in an vproare, because Dionysius had no other hope nor meane to escape, but by stirring vp faction and sedition among them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgeons were fent for foorthwith to fearch the wound of this Sofis: who found, that it was rather a little feratch, then any violent wound given him. For the wounds or cuts of a fword, are ever deepelt in the middeft; and Sofis cut was but wery litle, and nowdeepe, having had many beginnings, Egiuen him (as it feemed) at fundry times, but for very paine, the party that cut him, was driuen to leave off, & came to cut him at diverse times. Furthermore, there came certaine of his friends in the meane time, that brought a razor before the affembly, and reported that as they came, they met sofis by the way all bloudied: who faid, that he fled from Dions fouldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereupon they prefently followed them, but found no man; and onely they faw a razor, which fome body had cast vpon a hollow stone thereabouts, where they first faw him coming vnto them. Thus, softs device had but cuill successe. For besides all these proofes and tokens, Dions houshold feruants came to be witnesse against him, that very early in themorning he went abroad alone with a razor in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuse Dion, knew not what to say to the matter, but shrunke away: whereupon the people condemning Sofis to death, they were quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwaies afraid of these souldiers that were strangers, specially when they saw the greatest cossicts they had with v tyrant, was by fea, after that Philiftus was come from the coast of Apv GLIA with a great number Soft conofgallies to aide the tyrant. For then they thought, that these souldiers (the strangers) being demned to armed at all parts to fight by land, they would do him no more feruice by fea: because the citi- death. zensthemselues were they that kept them in safety, for that they were men practised to fight by sea, and were also the stronger by meanes of their ships. But beside all this the onely thing that made them to be couragious againe, was the good fortune they had at the battell by fea, in the which when they had ouecrome Philistus, they cruelly and barbarously vsed him. Truly Epho- Philistus, russaith, that Philistus slue himselfe, when he saw his galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was Gaine. alway with Dion from the first beginning of this warre) writing vnto Speusippus the Philosopher, faiththat Philiftus was take aliue, because his galley ran aland: & that the Syracus ans first these fignes, they chose flue and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one; and secretly they sent to feele the hired souldiers, to see if they could entice them from Dion, to cause them to take their part, and made them large promises to make them free men (as them selucs) of

Syracy sa. The fouldiers would not be entired from him; but faithfully and louingly tooke number. & because they did not first set upon them, but trusting on the other side to themselves, for that they were the greater number, they came to affaile them, supposing they should easily ouercome them in the city, and kill enery man of them. Dion being thus in a straight, that of ne-cellity he must fight against his owne countrimen, or else be slaine himselfe with his foldiers, he held yp his hands to the Syracvsans, and very earnestly prayed them to be content, pointing them with his finger to the castell that was full of their enemies, which shewed themselues upon the wals & faw what they did. In the end, when he faw that he could not pacific their fury & tumult, and that all thecity was in an vprore with the prittle prattle of these seditious people, who were carried like the fea with the winde, he did yet forbid his fouldiers to give any charge vpon ifthey had meant to runne on the. Then the Syracvsan's durst not abide by it, but ran away like sheepe through the streets no man chasing them. So Dion called backe againe his men, and ledthem directly into the country of the LEONTINES. Then the new officers and governors of Stracysa, perceiuing that the women laughed them to fcorne: because they would recouer the fame they had loft, they armed their men anew; and marched after Dien to fight with him:

whom they ouertooke at a river, as he was ready to passe ouer. Then began their horsemen a litle toskirmish with Dions company: but when they saw he did no more beare with their faults for countries fake but frowned indeed vpon them, and fet his men in battell ray against them: then and sent Ambassadors also vnto the Syracvsans, to will the to let the strangers haue their pay.

The Syracy sans on their fide also, sent Ambassadors unto the Leontines to accuse Dion.

So,all their confederates were affembled in the city of the Leontines 3&in that affembly, after both parties had bin heard, to heare what they would fay it was indged. That the Syracy sans were to blame. Howbeit, they would not stand to the judgement of their confederates, for they were now grown proud & careles, because they were gouerned by no ma, but had Captains that fudied to please the, and were afraid also to displease the. After that, there arised certain gallies of Dionysius at Syracy sa, of the which Nypsius Neapolitan was Captaines which brought victuals&mony, to helpe them that were befreged within the castle. These galleys were fought with, and the Syracv sans obtained victory, and tooke foure of the tyrants gallies with three banks ofoares a peece: howbeitthey fondly abused their victorie. For they having no body to combuibib and drinke drunke, dancing after their pipes and howboyes; and that the Gouernours themselues were very glad also to see such feastling, or else for that they dissembled it, and durst not command and compell them that were drunke: he wifely tooke the occasion offered him, and scaled the wall which had shut vp the castell, and wanne it, and ouerthrew it. Then he sent the barbarous fouldiers into the city, and commanded them to do with them they met, what they would or could. The Syracvsans then too late found their fault, and hardly gaue prefent remedy, they were fo amazed and fuddenly fet on: for indeed they made a right facke ofthe citie, Here men were killed, there they ouerthrew the wall; in another place they caried away women and litle children prisoners into the castell, weeping and crying out; and lastly, they made the Captaines at their wits end, who could given o present order, nor have their men to ferue them against their enemies, that came hand ouer head on every side amongst them. The city being thus miserably in garboile, and the ACRADINE also in great hazard of

tooke of his curaces, and stripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villany and fairs they could, they cut off his head, and gaue his body vnto boyes, commanding them to dragge it into that part of the city called ACRADINE, and then to cast it into the common priny. Timens also to spite him the more, saith that the boyes tied the dead body by his lame legge, and so dragged him vp and downe thecity, where all the Syracysans did what villany to it they could being glad to fee him dragged by the legge, that had faid: Dionysius should not flie from the tyranny vpon a light horse, but that they should pull him out by the legge against his will. Now Philistus reporteth this matter thus: not as spoken to Dionysius by himselfe, but by some other. But Timeus taking a just occasion and colour to speake euill of the good will, sidelity, & care that Philistus had alwaies feemed to shew in the confirmation and defence of the tyranny, doth li berally bestow injurious words on him in this place. Now for them, whom he had indeed offen ded, if they of malice and spite to be reuenged, did offer him cruelty, peraduenture they were not much to be blamed : but for them that fince his death haue written the gefts, who were never offended by him in his life time, and who ought to shew themselves discreet in their writing; me thinks that if they had regarded their owne credite and estimation, they should not so fondly and outragiously have reproued the adversities and misfortunes, which by fortune may as well chance to the honestest man, as you him. Thus fondly did Ephorus praise Philistus, who although he have an excellent fine wit to counterfeit goodly excuses, and cunningly to hide wicked and dishonest parts, and eloquently to denise by honest words to desend an enill cause: yet cannot he with all the fine wit he hath, excuse himselfe, that he hath not been the onely man of the world that hath most fauoured tyrants, and that hath ener loued, & specially defired power. wealth, and allyance with tyrants. But he (in my opinion) taketh the right course of an Historiographer, that neither doth commend Philistus doings, nor yet casteth his adversities in his teeth to his reproch. After Philistus death, Dionysius sent vnto Dion, to make him an offer to deliver him the castell, armour, munition, and fouldiers that were in it, with money also to pay them for fue moneths space. For himselfe, he prayed that he might be suffered to go safely into ITALY, and to lie there, to take the pleasure of the fruits of the country called Gyarra, which was within the territory of Syracvsa, & lieth out from the seatowards the mainland. Dion refused this offer, & answered y Ambassadors, that they must move the Syracus ans in it. They supposing they should easily take Dionysius aliue, would not heare the Ambassadors speake, but turned them away. Dionyfius seeing no other remedy, left the castell in the hands of his eldest sonne Apollogrates, and having a lustic gale of wind, he secretly imbarked certaine of his men he loued best, with the richest things he had, and so hoised faile, vnwares to Heraclides, the Admirall of Syracysa. The people were maruellously offended with Heraclides for it, and began to mutine against him. But Heraclides, to pacific this tumult of the people, suborned one Hippen an Orator, who preferred the law Agraria vnto the people, for the diaision of all the Iland amongst them: & that the beginning of liberty was equality, and of bondage pouertie, vnto them that had no lands. Heraclides giving his confencto this decree, and stirring the common people to sedition against Dion, that with flood it. perswaded the Syracvsans, not onely to confirme the law Hippon had propounded, but also to discharge the hired strangers, to chuse other Captaines and gouernours, and to ridthemselues of Dions seuere gouernment. But they supposing straight to have been rid from the tyrannie, as from a long and gricuous ficknesse, ouer-rashly taking vpor them, like people that of long time had been at liberty, they vtter!y vndidthemselues, and ouerthrew Diens purpose: who like a good Phisitian was carefull to see the citie well ordered and gouerned. So when they were affembled to chuse new officers in the middest of summer, there fell fuch horible thunders, and other terrible ftormes, and vnfortunate fignes in the element, that for the space of sisteeme dayes together, the people were still scattered and dispersed when they were affembled: infomuch, that being afraid of these signes aboue, they durst not at that time create any new Captains, Certain daies after, as the Orators had chosen a faire time to proceed to the election of officers, an Oxe drawing in a cart (being daily acquainted with eneric fight and noise) suddenly without any occasion offered, fell into a madnesse against the carter that draue him, and breaking his yoke afunder, ranne straight to the Theater, and there made the people runne into every corner, to flie and sauethemselves : and then flinging, and bearing all downe before him that stood in his way, he ranne through as much of the city, as the enemies afterwards wan of them. This notwithstanding, the Syracy sans making light account of all ashamed of their vnthankfulnesse and ouer great folly they had committed, in driving him as way. Yet necessity enforcing them vnto it, there were certaine of the horsemen and of their confederates that cried, that they must fend for Dion & the PELOPONNESIANS his fouldiers, which were with him in the territory of the LEONTINES. Assoone as the first word was heard, and that one had the heart to tell it to the people, all the Syracvsans cried out, There was the points they were fo glad of it, that the water stood in their eyes for ioy, and befought the gods it would please them to bring him vnto them, they were so desirous to haue him againe. For they called to mind how valiant and resolute he was in danger, and how that he was neuer afraid, but did encourage them with his manhood, in fuch fort, that being led by him, they were not a fraid to fer vpon their enemies. So the confederates of them, fent presently Archonides and Telesides vnto him: and the noblemen that served on horsebacke, they sent him also five amongst them . befide Hellanicus. Who tooke their horfes, and poafted for life, fo that they came vnto the city of the LEONTINES about Sunne-fet: & lighting offfrom their horses, they went first of al & knee. led downe at Dions feet, and weeping, told him the miserable state of the Syracvsans. Straight there came diverse of the LEGNTINE s, and many of the PELOPONNESIAN fouldiers vnto Dim (mistrusting then that there was some newes in hand,) to see the earnest and humble suite the Ambassadors of Syracvsa made vnto him. Wherefore Dion tooke them presently with him. and brought them himselfe vnto the Theater, wherethe common councels and affemblies of the citie were holden: thither ranne euery man to heare what the matter was. Then Archonides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, told openly before the whole affembly, the greatnesse of their miserie, and requested the hired souldiers to come and aide the Syracvsans, forgetting the iniurie they had received confidering, that they had more dearely payed for their folly then they themselues (whom they had so injured) would have made them to have suffered. When they had said their minds, there was a great filence through all the Theater: and then Dionrose vp, and began to speake. But the great teares that fel from his eyes would not suffer him to speak. wherefore the hired fouldiers being fory to fee him weepe, prayed him not to trouble himfelfe. but to be of good courage. Then Dion letting go the forow and griefe he had conceived, began to speake vnto them in this maner. My Lords of PELOPONNESTS, and you also the confederates: I have called you together to confult with you, what you should do. For my selfe, it were no honesty for me to consult what I should do now, when the citie of Syracysastan. deth in peril of destruction; and therfore if I cannot saue it from destruction, yet at the least I wil burie my selse in the fire and ruine of my country. But for you, if it please you once more to helpe vs vnaduised and most vnfortunate people, you shall by your meanes set the poore difireffed city of Syracvs againe on foot, which is your deed. Or if it be fo, that remembring the injuries the STRACV SANS have offered you, you will fuffer it to be destroyed: yet I besech the gods, that at the least they wil requite your valiantnesse, sidelity & good loue you haueborn me vntill this present beseching you to remember Dion, who neither for sooke you at any time when you have bene injured, nor his countriemen, when they were in trouble. So going on fill with his tale, the mercenary strangers stepped forth with great noise, and prayed him to leade the to aid Syracvsa. The the Ambassadors also that were sent from the Syracvsans saluted & imbraced them, and prayed the gods to bleffe Dion & them, with all the good hap that might be. So when al was whicht & quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to go & prepare themselues, and that they should be there ready armed after supper, determining the very same night to go to aid Syracvsa. But now at Syracvsa, while day light lasted, Dionysius fouldiers & Captaines did all the mischief & villany they could in the city, & when night came, they retired again into the castell, having lost very few of their men. Then the seditious governours of the Syracvsans took hart againe vnto the, hoping that the enemies wold be contented with that they had done: & therfore began a new to perswade the citizens to let Dion alone, and not to receive him with his mercenary fouldiers if they came to aide him; faying that they themselues were honester men then the strangers, to saue their citie, and to defend their liberty without help of any other. So, other Ambassadors were sent againe vnto Dion; some from the captains & gouernors of the city, to stay them that they should not come; and other also from the horsemen, & noble citizens his friends to hasten his journy: whereupon by reason of this variance, Dion marched very softly at his eafe. Now by night, Dions enemies within the city got to the gates, and kept them that nion should not come in. Nypsius on the other side made a fally out of the castell, with his merrenarie fouldiers, being better appointed, and a greater number of them then before : and with them he straight plucked downeall the wall which they had built before the castell, and ranne and facked the citie. At this fally out of the castell, they did not onely kill the men they met, but women and litle children also, and stayed no more to spoile, but to destroy and put all to hauock. For because Dionysius saw that he was brought to a straight and desperate case, he bare such mortall malice against the Syracvsans, that fith there was no remedy but that he must needs forgo his tyranny, he determined to bury it with the vtter destruction & desolation of their citie. And therefore to preuent Dions aid, and to make a quicke dispatch to destroy all, they came with burning torches in their hands, and did fet fire on all things they could come too: and farther off, Syracufafes they fired their darts and arrowes, and bestowed them in every part of the city. So, they that sled Dionys for the fire, were met withall, and flaine in the streets by the souldiers, and others also that ranne souldiers, into their houses, were driven out againe by force of fire: for there were a number of houses that were on fire, and fell downe vpon them that went and came. This miferie was the chiefest cause why all the Syracus and agreed together to fet open the gates vnto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, that Dionysius fouldiers were gone againe into the castell, he made no great hast to march forward: but when day was broken, there came certaine horsemen from Syracvs a vnto Dior, who brought him newes that the enemies had once again etaken the city. Then also came other of his enemics vnto him, and praied him to make haft. Now their mifery increasing still, and they being brought into hard state, Heraclides first fent his brother vnto Dion, and then Theodotes his vncle, to pray him to come quickly and helpe them: for now there was no man left to resist the enemies, because he himselfe was hurt, and the citie also was in maner cleane burnt and destroyed. When these men came to Dion, he was yet about threescore furlongs from the towne. So he fold his mercenary fouldiers the danger that the towne was in, and having encouraged them, he led them no more faire and foftly, but running towards the city, and meeting meffengers one in anothers neck as he went, that prayed him to make all the possible speed he could. By this meanes, the foldiers marching with wonderfull speed and good will together, he entred the gates of the city at a place called Hecatompedon. First of all, he sent the lightest armed he had against the enemies, to the end that the Syracvs ans seeing them, they might take a good heart again to them, whilest he himself in the meane time did set all the other heavy armed soldiers and chizens that came to joyne with them in battel ray, & did cast the into divers squadrons, of greater length & breadth; and appointed him that shold have the leading of them, to the end that setting vpon the enemies in divers places together, they shold put them in greater feare and terror. When he had fee al things in this order, and made his prayer vnto the gods, & that they faw him marching through the city again their enemies then there rose such a comon noise and rejoycing, and great shout of the souldiers, mingled with vowes, prayers, & perswasions of all the Sy-RACVSANS, that they called Dion their god & fauior, and the mercenary fouldiers their brethren and fellow citizens. Furthermore, there was not a Syracvs an that fo much regarded his owne lifeand person, but he seemed to be more afraid of the losse of Dion only, then of all the rest. For they saw him the formost man running through the danger of the fire, treading in bloud, & vpo in the citie dead bodies that lay slaine in the midst of the streets. Now indeed to charge the enemies, it was of Syracusa. amaruellous dangerous enterprise: for they were like mad beasts, and stood beside in battel ray along the wall which they had ouerthrowne, in a very dangerous place, and hard to win. Howbeit, the danger of the fire, did most of all trouble and amaze the strangers, & did stop their way for on which fide focuer they turned them, the houses round about them were all on a fire, and they were driuento march ouer the burnt timber of the houses, and to run in great danger of the wals of the house sides that fell on them, & to passe through the thicke smoke mingled with dust and befide to keepe their ranks with great difficulty. And whethey came to affaile the enemies, they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, because of the straightnes of the place: howbeit, the Syracus ans with force of cries and shouts, did so animate & incorage their men, that at length they draue Nypfius & his men to for fake the place. The most part pelled by of them got into the castle, being very neare vnto them: the other that could not get in in time, into the fled firaglingly vp and downe, whom the GRECIAN fouldiers flue, chafing of them. The extre-cafell. mity of the time did not presently suffer the conquerers to reap the fruit of their victory, neither the loyes and embracings meete for fo great an exploit. For the Syracus ans went every man home to his ownehouse, to quench the fire, the which could scarcely be put out all the night When day brake, there was none of these seditious flatterers of the people that durst tary in the citie, but condemning themselves, they sied to take their fortune. Heraelides and Theodoius came together of their owne good wils to yeeld themselves vnto Dion; confessing that they had done him wrong, and humbly praying him to shew himselfe better vnto them, then they had shewed themselves vnto him, and that it was more honorable for him, being every way vnmatchable for his vertues, to flew himfelfe more noble to conquer his anger, then his vnthankfull enemies had done who contending with him before in vertue, did now confesse themselves to be far inferior vnto him. This was the fumme and effect of Heraclides and Theodotus submiffion vnto Dion, But his friends did perfwade him not to pardon two fuch wicked men, who did malice and enuichis honor; and as ne would do the strangers his souldiers any pleasure, that he should put Heraclides into their hands, to roote out of the common-wealth of Syracvsa, his vile maner to flatter and curry fauor with the people, the which was as dangerous and great a plague to a citie, as § tyrannie. Dion pacifying them, answered: Other Generals of armies, faid he, do imploy al their wits in martiall exercises and wars; but for himselfe, that he had of long time studied and learned in the schoole of the Academie, to ouercome anger, enuie, and all malice and contention; the noble proofe whereof is most seene not in vsing honest men and his friends moderatly, but in shewing mercy also vnto his enemies, and forgetting his anger against them that have offended him; and that for his part, he had rather ouercome Heraclides, not in riches and wisedome, but in clemency and inflice; for therein chiefly confifted excellency, fith no man else in wars can chalenge power and government, but fortune, that ruleth most. And though Heraclides, said he, through envie hath done like a wicked man, must Dion therefore through anger blemish his vertue? Indeed by mans law it is thought meeter to reuengean iniurie offered, then to do an iniurie : but nature fleweth, that they both proceed of one felfe imperfection. Now though it be a hard thing to change & alter the cuill disposition of a man, after he is once nussed in villanie; yet is not man of fo wild & brutish a nature, that his wickednes may not be ouercome with often pleasures, when he feeth that they are continually shewed him. Dion answering his friends thus, he forgaue Hersclides: & beginning againe to flut vp the caftell with a wall round about, he commanded the Sy-RACVS ANS euery man of them to cut downe a stake, and to bring it thither. So when night was come fetting his fouldiers the strangers in hand withall, while st the Syracvs ans slept & tooke their case, by morning he had compassed the castell round about with a pale. The next day, they that faw the greatnesse and sudden expedition of this work, wondered much at it, as welthe enemies, as also the citizens: and when they had buried the dead bodies, & redeemed them that were taken prifoners (which were not much leffe then 2000 perfons) he called a common councell of the city, in the which Heraclides made a motion, that Dion should be chosen Generall of Syra. evs a, with absolute power and authoritie both by fea & land. The chiefest men of the city liked very wel of it, & wold have had the people to have passed it. But the rabble of the marrines, and other mechanicall people living by their labour, would not fuffer Heraclides to be put from his Admiralship, but fell to mutinie, thinking that though Heraclides did them no pleasure else, yethe would euer be a more popular man then Dion, and pleafe the common people better. Dion granted their defire, and made Heraelides Admirall againe of the sea: howbeit he did anger themas much another way, when he did not only reject the earnest suite they made to have the law Agraria passe for division of lands in equality amongst them, but did also cancell and revoke al that had been done before. Wherfore Heraclides remaining at MESSINA began thenceforth to enter into new practifes againe, and to flatter the fouldiers and fea-faring men he had brought this ther with him, and to stirre them vp against Dion, saying that he would make himselfetyrant: and himselfe in the meane time secretly practifed with Dionysius, by meanes of a Spartan called Pharax, The noblest men of the Syracy san's mistrusted it, and therupon there fel out great mutinie in their campe, whereby also followed great famine in Syrac cvsa: so that Dion was at fuch a straight, that he could not tell what to fay to it, and was reproued of all his friends for that he had againe preferred to great authority against himselse, so vitractable a man, and so malicious and wicked a person as Heraclides was. Now when Pharax lay in campe with an armic neare vnto the city of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTIMES, Dion did bring the army of the Syracysans into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him till an other time. But through Heraclides, and the fea-mens crying out, that faid, he would not trie. this warre by battell, but would draw it out in length, because he would be still Generall, he was forced to give battell, and lost it. Howbeit, the overthrow was not great, and happened rather. because his men were at a larre among themselves by reason of their faction and division, then otherwise. Dion therfore prepared to fight another battel, and gathered his men together against encouraging them, when even at twi-light word was brought him, that Heraclides with all his fleete was under faile towards Synacusa, meaning to take the city, and to flut Dion and his armie out of it. Wherefore he presently tooke with him the chiefest men of authoritie in the citie and the most willingest men, and rode all night with them in such haste, that they were at the gates of Syracvs a the next morning by nine of the clocke, having ridden feven hundred furlongs. Heraclides that had failed with all the possible speed he could, to prevent him with his hips, perceining that he came short, he turned faile, and taking seas at all adventure, by chance he met with Galylus LACED EMONIAN, who told him he was fent from LACED EMON, to be Ge- Galilus nerallto the Sicilians in this warre, as Gylippus was fent at other times before. He was glad he had met with him to haue fuch a remedie and defence against Dion, and boasted of it vnto the meth to Sy friends and confederates of Syracvsa, and fent an Herauld before vnto the Syracvsans, fummoning them to receive Gasylus LACED EMONIAN, who was sent to be their Generall. Dion of the Syramadeanswer: That the Syracvsans had gouernours enough; and though that their affaires enfant. did of necessitie require a LACED EMONIAN Captaine, yet that himselfe was he; for that he was madefree in Sparta. Then Gassilus perceiuing he could not obtaine to be Generall, he went unto Syracvsa, and came to Dion, and there made Heraclides and him friends againe by the greate and solemne othes he made; and because Gasylus also sware, that he himselfe would be reuenged of him for Dions fake, and punish Heraclides if ever after he did once more conspire a- en and the gainst him. After that, the Syracvsans brake up their army by sea, because it did them no feruice, and was befide chargeable keeping of it, and further did also breed sedition and trouble a- gaine. mongst their gouernors; and so went to lay straighter siege to the castell then euer they did; and built up the wall againe, which the enemics had ouerthrowne. Then Dionylous fonne feeing no aide to come to him from any part, and that victuals failed them; and further, that the fouldiers began to mutine being vnable to keepe them, he fell to a composition with Dion, and deliucred up the castell into his hands, with all the armor and munition in it: and so tooke his mother and his fifters of Dion, and put them aboord vpon fine gallies, with the which he went vnto his father, through the fafe conduct of Dion. There was not aman at that time in all Syracysa, but The caffell was there to fee this fight; or if by chance there were any abfent, the other that were there, called them thither as loud as they could crie, faying: That they did not feethe goodlyest day and Sunthine, which the city of Syracvsa might feether ather rifing, the same being now restored againe to her former liberty. If vntill this present day they do reckon the flying of Dionylius for one of the rarest examples of fortunes change, as one of the greatest and notablest things that euer was: what ioy (thinke we) had they that draue him out, and what pleasure had they with themselues, that with the least meane that could be possible, did destroy the greatest tyranny in the world. So when Apollocrates (Diony sus fonne) was imbarked, and that Dion was entred into The words thecastell, the women within the castell would not tarrie till he came into the house, but went to of arisoma. meete him at the gates; Aristomache leading Dions sonne in her hand, and Arete following her weeping, but very fearefull how she should call and salute her husband, having lyen with another man, Dion first spake to his fifter, and afterwards to his sonne and then Aristomache offering callell of him Arete, faid vnto him: fince thy banishment ô Dion, we have led a miserable and captive life, but now that thou art returned home with victorie, thou hast rid vs out of care and thraldome, and hast also madevs againe bold to lift up our heads, fauing her here, whom I (wretched creature) haue by force(thy felfe aline) feene maried vnto another man. Now then, fith fortune hath made thee Lord of vs all, what judgement givest thou of this compulsion . How wilt thou have her to falute thee; as her vncle or husband. As Aristomache spake these words, the water stood in Diens eyes: so he gently and louingly taking his wife Arete by the hand, he gaue her his sonne, his wife Aand willed her to go home to his house where he then remained, and so delinered the castell vnto the Syracvs ans. He having this prosperous successe and victory, would not reape any prefent benefite or pleasure thereby, before he had shewed himselfe thankfull to his friends, given maried to great gifts allo vnto the confederates of Syracv sa, and specially before he had given every one of his friends in the cirie, & his mercenary foldiers the strangers, some honorable reward according to their deferts, exceeding his hability with magnanimitie of mind: when he himselfe lived foberly, and kept a moderate diet, contenting him with any thing that came first to hand. Euerv man that heard of it, wondered at him, confidering that not onely all SICILE and CARTHAGE. but generally all GRECE looked vpon his great prosperity and good fortune, thinking no man liuing greater then he, nor that any Captaine euer attained vnto such fame and wonderfull fortune as he was comevnto. This notwithstanding, Dien lived as temperately and modestly in his apparell, and also in his number of feruants, and service at his boord, as if he had lived with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, and had not been conversant among souldiers and Captains. which have no other comfort nor pleasure for all the paines and danger they suffer continually but to eate and drinke their fill, and to take their pleasure all day long. Plato wrote vnto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Dion, in my opinion, had no respect but to one place. and to one city, to wit, the Academie, and would have no other Judges nor lookers into his do. ings, but the scholers of the same: who neither wondred at his great exploits, valiantnesse, nor victorie, but only confidering if he did wifely and modestly vse the fortune he had, and could so keep himselse within modest bounds, having done so great things, Furthermore, touching the grauitie he had when he spake to any body, & his inflexible seueritie which he vsed towards the people, he determined neuer to alter or change it not with standing that his affaires required him to shew courtesse and lenitie, and that Plato also reproved him for it, and wrote, that severitie and obstinace (as we said before) was the companion of solitarinesse. But it seemeth to me that Dian did vse it for two respects. The first, because nature had not framed him courteous and affable to winne men: secondly, he did what he could to draw the Syracvsans to the contrary; who were over licentious, and spoiled with too much flattery. For Heraclides began againe to behusie with him. First of all, Dion sending for him to come to councell, he fent him word, he would not come: and that being a private citizen, he would be at the common councell amongst others when any was kept. Afterwards he accused him, for that he had not ouerthrowne and razed the castle: and also because he would not suffer the people to breake open the tombe of Dionysius the elder, to cast out his bodie: and because he sent for counsellors to Coninin, and disdained to make the citizens his companions in the gouernment of the commonwealth. Indeed to confesse a troth, Dion had fent forcertain Corint Hians, hoping the better to Rablish the forme of acomon wealth, which he had in his mind when they were come. For his mind was vtterly to break the government of Democratia (to wit, the absolute government and authoritie of the people in a citie, not being as it were a comonwealth, but rather a faier and market where things are fold, as Plato faith) & to establish the LACONIAN or CRETAN comonwealth, mingled with a princely & popular gouernment: and that should be Aristocratia, to wir, the number of a few noblementhat should gouerne and direct the chiefest and weightiest matters of state. And for that purpose, he thought the Corinthians y meetest men to help him to frame this comonwealth, colidering that they gouerned sheir affaires more by chusing a few number of the nobility, then otherwise, & that they did not refer many things to the voice of the people. And because he was affured that Heraclides wold be against him in it al that he could, &that otherwise he knew he was a seditious, a troublesome, & lightheaded fellow: he then suffered the to kil him, who had long before done it, if he had not kept them from it, & fothey went home to his house, & sluc him there. The murther of Heraclides was much misliked of the Syracvsans, howbeit Dion caused him to be honorably buried, & brought his body to § ground, followed with al his army. The he made an Oration himself to the people, & told the that it was impossible to avoid seditio & trouble in the city, so long as Dion & Heraclides did both gouern together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato faith) came not acquainted with Dion through the occasion of his study in Philosophy, but because he had bin his guide to bring him to see the fecret my steries and ceremonies of the facrifices, and for such other like common talke and copany. This notwithstanding, Callippus did accopany him in all this war, & was very much honored of him, and was one of the first of all his friends that entred into Syracvsa with him, & did valiantly behaue himself in al the battels & conslicts that were fought. This Callippus seeing that Dions best and chiefest friends were all slaine in this war, & that Heraclides also was dead, that the people of Syracvsa had no more any head, and besides, that the soldiers which were with Dion did loue him better then any other man: he became the vnfaithfullest man, and the veriest villain of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his friend Dion, he should vidoubtedly come to have the whole gonernment of all Sicile; and as some do report, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies, of twenty talents, for his labor to commit this murther. So he began to practife, to bribe Note the and to suborne certaine of the mercenarie foldiers against Dion, and that by a maruellous crafty fabriley of and fubtile fetch. For vfing commonly to report vnto Dion certaine feditious words spoken peradventure by the fouldiers indeed, or else deuised of his owne head, he wanne such a liberty and holdnesse by the trust Dion had in him, that he might safely say what he would to any of the soldiers, and boldly speake euill of Dien by his ownecommandement : to the end he might therby understand the better, whether any of his foldiers were angry with him, or wished his death. By this policy , Callippus straight found out those that bare Dion grudge, and that were already corrupted, who he drew to his conspiracy. And if any man vinwilling to give eare vinto him, went & rold Dion, that Callippus wold have inticed him to conspire against him, Dion was not angry with him for it, thinking that he did but as he had comanded him to do. Now as this treason was prafiling against Dion, there appeared a great and monstrous ghost or spirit vnto him. By chance Application fitting late one evening all alone in a gallery he had, and being in a deepe thought with himfelfe, Pared and fuddenly he heard a noise, and therewith casting his eye to the end of his gallery (being yet daylight) he faw a monstrous great woman, like vnto one of the furies shewed in playes, and saw her fweeping of the house with a broome. This vision so amazed and affrighted him, that he sent for his friends, and told them what a fight he had feene and praied them to tarrie with him all night. being as it were a man befide himselfe, fearing lest the spirit would come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which not with standing he neuer heard more afterwards. Howbeit shortlvafter, his sonne being growne to mans state, for a certaine light anger he had taken when he was but a boy, he cast himselfe headlong downe from the top of the house, and so was slaine. Dien being in this state, Callippus went on stil with his treason, and spread a rumor abroad among the Synac vs Ans, that Dion leeing himselfe now destitute of children, was determined to send for Apollocrates, Dronystus son, to make him his heireand successor, being cosin germaine to his of Dious for wife, and his fifters daughters fonne. Then began Dion, his wife, and fifters to miftrust Callippus practifes, and they were told it by diverse and manifest proofes. But Dion being fory (as I fup. Apollorspose for Heraclides death, and inwardly taking that murther invery euill part, as a foule blot to his life and doings, he faid, he had rather die a thoufand deaths, and to offer his throat to be cutto any that would, rather then he would live in that miserie, to be compelled to take heed as well of his friends, as of his enemies, Callippus then feeing the woman for bufie and inquisitive of his doings, and fearing left he should be bewrayed, he came weeping vnto them, and told them, it was nothing, and that he was ready to affure them of it by any maner of way they would deuise. The women then willed him to sweare by the great oath, which was in this maner. He that must take The great this outh cometh into the temple of the goddeffes The mophores, which are, Ceres and Proferpi outh of the na: and after certaine facrifices done, he putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddesse Proferping holding a burning torch in his hand, and sweareth in this maner. Callippus having done all Dion states these commonies, and made the oath in forme as I hauc told you, he made folight account of the by calipgoddesses, that he taried no longer to do the murther he had determined, but til the very feast day of the goddeffe should come, by whom he had sworne and slue him on the day of the feast of Proferpina. Now, I do not thinke that he chofe that day offer purpose, knowing right well that hedid alwaies finne against her, what time soeuer he had killed his brother, being by his meanes specially admitted to the societie and brotherhood with him, of the fraternitie and mysteries of Ceres and Proferpina. Of this conspiracie there were divers. For, as Dion was set in his chamber talking with his friends, where there were many beds to fit on, some compassed the house round about, others came to the doores and windowes of his chamber, and they that should do the deed to dispatch him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN soldiers, came into his chaber in their coats without any fword. But when they were come in, they that were without did shut the dores after them, and locked them in left any man should come out, and they that were within, fell vpon Dion, and thought to have strangled him. But when they saw they could not, they called for a fword. Neuer a manthat was within, durft open the dores, though there were many with Dion. For they thought every man to faue their owne liues, by suffering him to be killed, and therefore durst not come to helpe him. So the murtherers taried a long time within, and did no. thing. At length there was one Lycona Syracvsan, that gaue one of the Zacynthian foldiers

a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throat, as a weather they had holden a long time in their hands, euen dead for feare. The murther being executed, they cast his sister, and wife great with child, into prison, and there the poore ladie was pitifully brought to bed of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring vp, then otherwise to do any thing with the child. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, because Callippus began then a litle to grow to some trouble for at the first, after he had slain Dion, hebere all the whole sway for a time, and kept the city of Syracvsain his hands: and wrote vnto A-THENS, the which next vnto the immortall gods he was most afraid of having defiled his hands in so damnable atreason. And therefore (in my opinion) it was not euill spoken, That ATHENS isacitie, of all other, that bringeth forth the best, when they give themselves to goodnesse; and the wickedest people also, when they dispose themselves to cuill: as their country also bringeth forth the best hony that is, and hemlocke in like manner that quickly dispatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit, the gods and fortune did not suffer this treason and wicked man to reigne long, having come to the government of a realme by fo damnable a murther: but shortly after they gaue him his payment he had deserved. For Callippus going to take a litle towne called * Catana, he lost the city of Syracusa: whereupon he said, That he had lost a city, & got a cheese. knife. Afterwards he went to affaile the MESSINIANS, and there he loft a great number of his men, and amongst them were slaine those that killed Dion. Now Callippus finding no city in all Sicile that would receive him, but that they all did hate and abhorrehim, he went to take the city of RHEGIO in ITALY. There being in great diffresse and need of all things, and not able to maintaine his fouldiers; he was flaine by Leptines and Polyperchon, with the felfe fame dagger wher with Dion before was flaine the which was knowneby the fashion, being short like the La-CONIAN daggers, and also by the workmanship vpo it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callippus. Now for Aristomache and Arete, they were taken out of prison and Icetes Synacvsan, that sometimes had been one of Diens friends, tooke them home to his owne house, and yied them very well and faithfully for a certain time, but afterwards was wonneand corrupted by Dions enemies. So he caused a ship to be prouided for them, and bare them in hand that he would fend them into Peloponnesvs: but he gauethem charge that caried them away, to kill them as they went, and to throw them oner boord into the sea. Somesay that the two women, and the litle yong boy, were cast aliue into the sea. But this reward of the finfull act that he committed, returned againe vpon himselfe, as it had done before vnto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death : and befides, the

Areus Brutus came of that Junius Brutus, for whom the ancient Ro-MAINES made his statue of braffe to be fet vp in the Capitoll, with The parenthe images of the kings, holding a naked fword in his hand because tageof he had valuantly put downe the TARQVINES from the kingdome of Britis. ROME. But that Iunius Brutus being of a foure sterne nature, no fofteaned by reason, being like vnto sword blades of too hard a temper, was of subject to his choler and malice he bare vuto the tyrants, that for their fakes he caused his owne sonnes to be executed. But this Marcus Brutus in contrarie manner, whose life we presently write, having fra. medhismanners of life by the rules of vertue, and fludic of Philosophy, and having couployed ly made and framed vnto vertue. So that his very enemies which wish him most hurt, because of his conspiracie against Iulius Casar, if there were any noble attempt done in all this conspiracie, they referre it wholy vnto Brutus; and all the cruell and violent acts vnto Coffins, who was Brutus me. Brutus familiar friend, but not so well given, and conditioned as he. His mother Servilia, it is there. thought, came of the bloud of Servilius Hala; who, when Spurius Melius went about to make himfelfeking, and to bring it to paffehad entited the common people to rebell, tooke a dagger, and hid it close vnder his arme, and went into the market place. When he was come this her, he madeas though he had formwhat to fay vnto him, and pressed as neare him as he could; wherefore Melius flouping downe with his head, to heare what he would fay, Sernilius flabbed him in with his dagger and flue him. Thus much all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father fome for the enill will and malice they bare vnto Brutus, because of the death of inlins C.efar, do maintaine that he came not of Iunius Brutus that draue out the TARQYINS: for there were none left of his race, confidering that his two fons were executed for confpiracy with the TARQVINS and that Marcus Brutus came of a meane house, the which was raised to honour and office in the common wealth but of latetime. Posidonius the Philosopher writeth the contrary, that Iunius famous men of that family, whose stature and countenance resembled much the image of Innius Brutus. And thus much for this matter: Marcus Cato the Philosopher was brother vnto son uilia, Marcus Brutus mother: whom Brutus studied most to follow of all the other Romaines, because he was his vncle, and afterwards he maried his daughter, Now touching the GRECIAN Philosophers, there was no sect nor Philosopher of them, but he heard and liked it; but aboue all the rest, he loued Platoes sect best, and did not much give himselfe to the new or meane Academie (as they call it) but altogether to the old Academie. Therefore he did euer greatly efleeme the Philosopher Antiochus, of the city of As CAL ON: but he was more familiar with his brother Artifon, who for learning and knowledge was inferior to many other Philosophers, but for wisedome & courtesic, equall with the best and chiefest. Touching Empylus, whom M. Brutue himselse doth mention in his Epistles, and his friends also in many places, he was an Orator. and left an excellent booke he wrote of the death of Iulius Cafar, and intituled it, Brutus. He was properly learned in the Latine tong, & was able to make long discourse in it: beside that he could also pleade very well in Latine, But for the Greek tong, they do note in some of his Epistles, that he counterfeited that briefe compendious maner of speech of the LACED EMONIANS. As when the war was begun, he wrot vnto the Pergamenians in this fort: I vnderstand you hauegiuen Dolabella moncy : if you have done it willingly, you confesse you have offended me; if against your wils, shew it then by giving me willingly. Another time againe vnto the Samians Your councels be long, your doings be flow, confider the end. And in another Epistle he wrote vnto ner of writ. the PATAREIANS. The XANTHIANS despising my goodwil, have made their country a graue of despaire, and the PATAREIANS that pur themselves into my protection, have lost no iot of their liberty; and therfore whilest you have liberty, either chuse the iudgement of the PATAREIANS, or the fortune of the XANTHIANS. These were Brutus maner of letters, which were honored for their briefnesse. So Brutus being but a yong stripling, went into Cypros with his Vnckle Cato. who was fent against Prolomy king of Agypt; who having flaine himself, Cato staying for certain necessarie busines he had in the He of RHODE's, had already sent * Caninius, one of his friends before to keepe his treasure and goods. But Caso fearing he would be light-singered, wrote vnto Brutus forthwith to come out of PAMPHILIA (where he was but newly recoursed of a ficknesse) into Cyprvs, the which he did. The which iourney he was fory to take vpon him, both for respect of Caninius shame, whom Cato (as he thought) wrongfully slandered: as also because he thought this office too meane and vnmcet for him, being a young man, and given to his booke. This notwithstanding, he behaved himselfe so honestly and carefully, that Cato did greatly commend him: and after all the goods were fold and converted into readie money, he tookethe most part of it, and returned withall to Rome. Afterwards, when the Empire of Rome was deuided into factions, and that Cafar and Pompey both were in armes one against the other, and that all the Empire of Rome was in garboile and vprore: it was thought then that Bruins would take part with Cafar, because Pompey not long before had put his father to death. But Brutus preferring the respect of his countrey and commonwealth before private affection, and perfivading him felfe that Pompey had infter cause to enter into armes, then Casar, he then tooke part with Pompey; though oftentimes meeting him before, he thought scorne to speake to him, thin. king it a great fin and offence in him, to speake to the murtherer of his father. But then submitting himselse vnto Pampey, as vnto the head of the commonwealth, he sailed into Sicile, Lieutenant under sestins that was Gouernor of that province. But when he saw that there was no way to rife, nor to do any noble exploits, and that Cafar and Pompey were both camped together, and fought for victory: he went of himself vnsent for, into Macedon n: to be partaker of the danger. It is reported, that Pompey being glad, and wondering at his coming, when he saw him come to him, he rose out of his chaire, and went & imbraced him before them all, and vsed him as honorably, as he could have done the noblest man that tooke his part. Brutus being in Pompeys campe, did nothing but study all day long, except he were with Pompey; and not only the daies before but the selfe same day also before the great battell was fought in the fields of Pharsalla, where Pompey was our come. It was in the middest of Sommer, and the Sunne was very hote, besides that the campe was lodged neare vnto marrishes, and they that caried his tent, taried long before they came: whereupon, being very wearie with travell, scant any meate came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others slept, or thought what would happen the morow after, he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long til night, writing a breuiary of Polybius.

Trisreported that Cafar did not forget him, and that he gaue his Captaines charge before the Inline cahattell that they should beware they killed not Brutus in fight, and if he yeelded willingly vnto for carefull them, that then they should bring him vnto him: but if he resisted, and would not be taken, then safety. that they should let him go, and do him no hurt. mother. For when he was a yong man, he had been acquainted with Seruilia, who was ex- Inline Caremely in loue with him. And because Brutus was borne in that time when their loue was ho- far loued reft, he perswaded himselfe that he begate him. For proofe hereof the report goeth, that when Brutas ino. the weightiest matters were in hand in the Senate, about the conspiracie of Catiline, which was far came to beliege his campe Brutus went out of the campe gates vnseene of any man, and leapt red by falling into a marish full of water and reeds. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went vnto the city of LARIS SA: from whence he wrotevnto Cafar, who was very glad that he had scaped, after the and sent for him to come vnto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onely pardon him, but Pharfalia, him which way he thought Pompey tooke. Cafar perceiuing by his talke that Brutus gueffed *This king certainly whither Pompey should be fled, he left all other wayes, and tooke his journey direct was leb: lytowards AGYPT. Pompey (as Brutus had coniccured) was indeed fied into AGYPT. bütthere he was villanously slaine. Furthermore, Brutus obtained pardon of Casar for Castus that British and defending alfothe King * of Lybian's cause, he was ourrlayd with a world of accusation made interonsagainst him howbeit, intreating for him, he faued him the best part of his Realme and Kingdome. They fay also, that Cafar fayd, when he heard Brutus pleade: I know not (fayd he) what this young man would; but what he would, he willeth it vehemently. For as Brutus gravitie and constant minde would not grant all men their requests that sued vnto him, but being modued with reason and discretion, did alwaies encline to that which was good and honeff, even so when it was mooued to follow any matter, he ysed a kind of forcible and yehement perswasion, that calmed nottill he had obtained his desire. For by stattering of him, a mancould neuer obtaineany thing at his hands, nor make him to do that which was vniuft. Further, he thought it not meete for a man of calling and estimation, to yeeld vnto the requests and intreaties of a shamelesse and importunate suter, requesting things vnmeete: the wore best to which not with standing some mendo for shame, because they dare deny nothing, and therefore he was wont to fay, That he thought them cuill brought vp in their youth, that could deny Beintaus. nothing. Now when Cafar tooke fea to go into A FRICK B against Cato and Scipio, he left Cafar made Brutus Gouernour of GAVLE in ITALIE on this fide of the Alpes, which was a great good HETHOR of happe for that Province. For where others were spoiled and polled by the infolencie and co- Gauleon uctousnesse of the Gouernors, as if it had been a country conquered, Brutus was a comfort and this side the

this contention betwixt them came by Cafar himselfe, who secretly gaue either of them both hope of his fauor. So their suit for the Prætorship was so followed and laboured of either party, that one of them put another into fuite of law, Brutus with his vertue and good name contended against many noble exploits in armes, which Cassius had done against the PARTHIANS. So Calar after he had heard both their objections, told his friends, with whom he consulted about this matter: Cassius cause is the inster (said he) but Brutus must be first preferred. Thus Brutus had the first Prætorship, and Cassius the second : who thanked not Casar so much for the Prætorshiphe had, as he was angry with him for that he had loft. But Brutus in many other things tafted of the benefite of Casars fauour in any thing he requested. For if he had listed, he might have been one of Cafars chiefest friends, and of greatest authoritie and credite about him. Howbeit, Casim friends did dissiwade him from it (for Casius and he were not yet reconciled together sithence their first contention and strife for the Prætorship) & prayed him to beware of Cafars sweete enticements, and to flie his tyrannicall fauors: the which they faid Cafar gaue him, nor to honor his vertue, but to weaken his constant minde, framing it to the bent of his bow. Now Casar on the other fide did not trust him ouermuch, hor was without tales brought vnto him again? him: howbeithe feared his greatmind, authoritie, and friends. Yet on the other fide also, he trusted his good nature, and faire conditions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conspire against him : be answered, That these fatlong-haired men made him cafars fay- not afraide, but the leane and whitely faced fellowes, meaning that by Brutus and Caffins. Ata. nother time also when one accused Brutus vnto him, and bad him beware of him: What, (saidhe againe clapping his hands on his breaft,) thinke ye that Brutus will not tary till this bodiedies meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to have such power as he had. And surely (in my opinion) I am perswaded that Brutus, might indeed have come to have beene the chiefest man of Rome, if he could have contented himselfe for a time to have been next vnto Casarand to have fuffered his glory and authority, which he had gotten by his great victories, to confume with time. But Cassius being a cholericke man, and hating Casar prinately, more then he did the tyrannie openly, he incensed Brutus against him. It is also reported, that Brutus could euillaway with the tyrannic, and that Caffins hated the tyrant: making many complaints for the injuries he had done him, and amongst others, for that he had taken away his Lions from him. Casing had provided them for his sports, when he shold be Ædilis, and they were found in the city of MEGARA, when it was wonne by Calenus; and Cafar kept them. The rumor went, that thefelions did maruellous great hurt to the MBGARIANS: for whethe city was taken, they brake their cages where they were tied vp. & turned the loofe, thinking they would have done great mischiefe to the enemies, and have keptthem from fetting vponthem: butthe Lions (contrarie to expediation) turned vpon themselves that fled vnarmed, and did so cruelly teare some in peeces, that it pitied their enemies to see them. And this was the cause (as some do report) that made cassius conspire against Casar. Butthis holdeth no water: for Cassius even from his cradle could notamyosiyiau. bide any manner of tyrants, as it appeared when he was but a boy, and went vnto the same schoole that Faustus the son of Sylla did. And Faustus bragging among other boyes, highly boafted of his fathers kingdom. Caffin's rosevp on his feet, and gaue him two good wirts on the eare. Fauftus gouernors would have put this matter in suite against Cassius : but Pompey would not suffer them, but caused the two boyesto be brought before him, and asked them, how the matter came to passe. Then Cassius (as it is written of him,) said vnto the other. Go too Faustus, speake againe and thou darest, before this Nobleman here, the same words that made meangry with thee, that my fifts may walke once againe about thine eares. Such was Cassius hote stirring nature. But for Brutus, his friends and countrimen, both by divers procurements, and fundrie rumours of the citie, and by many bils also, did openly call and procure him to do that he did. For vnder the image of his ancestor Iunius Brutus, (that draue the kings out of Rom #) they wrote; O, that it pleased the gods thou wert now alive, Brutus! and againe, That thou wert here among vs now! His tribunall or chaire, where he gaue audience during the time he was Prator, was full offuch bils: Brutus thou art afleepe, and art not Brutus indeed. And of all this, Cafars flatterers were the cause: who beside many other exceeding and vnspeakeable honours they daily deuised for him, in the night time they put Diademes vpon the heads of his images, supposing thereby to allure the common people to call him King, in stead of Dictator. Howbeit it turned to the contrarie, (as we have written more at large in tillus Colars life.) Now when

Calling felt his friends, and did stirre them vp against Cafar they all agreed, and promised to take part with him, fo Bentus were the chiefe of their conspiracie. For they told him, that so high an enterprise and attempt as that, did not so much require men of manhood and courage to draw their fwords, as it flood them vpon to have a man of fuch estimatio as Brutus to make every man Holdly thinke, that by his onely presence the fact were holy and just. If he tooke not this course, then that they should go to it with fainter hearts; and when they had done it, they should be more fearefull, because every man would thinke that Bruius would not have refused to have made one with them, if the cause had been good and honest. Therefore Cassius considering this matter with himselfe, did first of all speake to Brutus, since they grew strange together for the Brutus first fuite they had for the Prætorship. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had selection in the prætorship. embraced one another, Cassius asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate house the first day of the moneth of March, because he heard say that Casars friendes should move the syram. councell that day, that Cafar should be called king by the Senate. Brutus answered him, he wold not be there. But if we be fent for (faid Cassus) how then ? For my selfe then (faid Brutus.) I meane not to hold my peace, but to withfrandit, and rather die then lose my liberty. Casius being bold, and taking hold of this word: Why, (quoth he) what Romain E is he aliue that will fuffer thee to die for thy liberty? What? knowest thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkest thou that they be coblers, tapfters, or fuch like base mechanicall people, that write these billes and scroles which are found daily in thy Prætors chaire, and not the noblest men and best citizens that do it. No be thou well affured, that of other Protors they looke for gifts, common diffributions among ft the people, and for common playes, & to fee fencers fight at the sharp, to shew the people pastime; but at thy hands, they specially require (as a due debt vnto them) the taking away of the tyranny, being fully bentto suffer any extremity for thy sake, so that thou wilt shew thy felfe to be the man thou are taken for and that they hope thou are. Thereupon he kiffed Bru-1815, and embraced him : and so each taking leave of other, they went both to speake with their *Instables friends about it. Now amongst Pompeys friends, there was one called * Cains Ligarius, who had been accused vnto Cafar for taking part with Pompey, and Cafar discharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Cefer for much for his discharge, as he was offended with him, for that he was brought in danger by his tyrannicall power. And therefore in his heart he was alwaie his morrallenemie, and was besides very familiar with Brutus, who went to see him being sicke in his bed, and faid vnto him: Ligarius, in what a time art thou ficke: Ligarius rifing vp in his bed, andtaking him by the right hand, faid vnto him: Brutus (faid he) if thou hast any great enterprise in hand worthy of thy selfe, I am whole. After that time they began to feele all their acquaintance whom they trufted, and layd their heads together confulting upon it, and did not onely picke out their friends, but all those also whom they thought stout enough to attempt any desperate matter, and that were not afraid to lose their lives. For this cause they durst not acquaint Citero with their conspiracie, although he was a man whom they loued dearely, and tru- They do fled best: for they were affraid that he being a coward by nature, and ageal fo having increased his feare, he would quite turne and alter al their purpole, and quench the heavof their enterprise, the which specially required hote and carnest execution; seeking by perswasion to bring all things to fuch fafetie, as there should be no perill. Brutus also did let other of his friends alone, as Statilius Epicurian, and Faonius, that made profession to follow Marcus Cato: because that having cast out words a farre off, disputing together in Philosophie to feele their minds, Faorius answered. That civill warre was worse then tyrannical gouernment vsurped against the law. And Statilius told him alfo, That it were an vinwise part for him to put his life in danger, for a fort of ignorant fooles and affes. Labeo was prefent at this talke, and maintained the contrary against workether them both. But Brutus held his peace, as though it had beene a doubtfull matter, and a hard tramital thing to have bene decided. But afterwards, being out of their companie, he made Labeo priwie to his intent; who very readily offered himfelfe to make one. And they thought good also to bring in another Brutus to loyne with him, furnamed Albinus: who was no man of his hands himselfe, but because he was able to bring good force of a great number of slaues, and fencers at the sharpe, whom he kept to shew the people passime with their fighting, besides allothat Cafar had some trust in him. Cassius and Laber, told Brutus Albinus of it at the first, but he made them no answer. But when he had spoken with Brutus himselfe alone, and that Brut tws had told him he was the chiefe ring-leader of all this confpiracie, then he willingly promifed him the best aide he could, Furthermore, the onely name and great calling of Brutus did bring on the most of them to give consent to this conspiracy: who having neuer take oathes together. nor taken or given any caution or affurance, nor binding themselves one to another by anyre. ligious othes, they all kept the matter fo fecret to themselves, and could so cunningly handle it, that not with standing, the gods did reueale it by manifest signes and tokens from aboue, and by predictions of facrifices, yet all this would not be beleeued. Now Brutus, who knew yerr well, that for his sakeall the noblest, valiantest, and most couragious men of Rome did venue their lives, weighing with him felfe the greatnesse of the danger; when he was out of his house. he did so frame and fashion his countenance and lookes that no man could discerne he had any thing to trouble his mind. But when night came that he was in his owne house, then he was cleane changed: for either care did wake him against his will when he would have slepty or else oftentimes of himselse he fell into such deepe thoughts of this enterprise, casting in his mind all the dangers that might happen : that his wife lying by him, found that there was some mar. uellous great matter that troubled his mind, not being wont to be in that taking, and that he could not well determine with himselfe. His wife Porcia (as we have told you before)was the daughter of Cato, whom Brutus maried being his cousin, not a maiden, but a young widow after the death of her first husband Bibulus, by whom she had also a young sonne called Bibulus, who afterwards wrote a booke of the acts and gestes of Brutus; extant at this present day, This young ladie being excellently well feene in Philosophy, louing her husband well, and being of a noble courage, as she was also wife: because she would not aske her husband what he ayled before she had made some proofe by her selfe she tooke a litlerazour, such as Barbersoccupie to pare mens nailes, and caufing her maydes and women to go out of her chamber. gaue her felfe a great gash withall in her thigh, that she was straight all of a goare bloud and incontinently after, a vehement feauer tooke her, by reason of the paine of her wound. Then perceiuing her husband was maruelloufly out of quiet, and that he could take no rest, even in her greatest paine of all, she spake in this fort vnto him: I being, ô Brutus, (said she) the daughter of (ato, was maried vnto thee; not to be thy bed-fellow and companion in bedde and at boord onely, like a harlot, but to be partaker also with thee of thy good and euill fortune, Now. for thy felfe, I can find no cause of fault in thee touching our match. but for my part, how may I shew my duty towards thee, and how much I would do forthy sake, if I cannot constantly beare a secret mischance or griefe with thee, which requireth secrecie and fideline? I confesse, that a womans wit commonly is too weake to keepe a secret safely: but yet (Bratus): good education, and the company of vertuous men, have some power to reforme the defect of nature. And for my felfe, I hauethis benefite moreouer, that I am the daughter of Caso, and wife of Brutus, This notwithstanding, I did not trust to any of these things before, vntil that now I have found by experience, that no paine or griefe what foeuer can ouercome me. With those words shee shewed him her wound on her thigh, and told him what she had done to proucher felfe. Brutus was amazed to heare what she fayd vnto him, and lifting vp his hands to heauen, he befought the goddes to give him the grace he might bring his enterprise to sogod passe, that he might be found a husband, worthy of so noble a wife as Porcia: so hethendid comfort her the best he could. Now, a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at whattime they hoped Cafar would not faile to come, the conspiratours determined thento put their enterprise in execution, because they might meete safely at that time without suspicion, and the rather, for that all the noblest and chiefest men of the city would be there: who when they should see such a great matter executed, would every man set too their hands, for the defence of their libertie. Furthermore, they thought also that the appointment of the place where the Councell should be kept, was chosen of purpose by divine providence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of seates for mento sit in, where also was set up the image of Pempey, which the city had made and confecrated in honour of him, when he did beautifie that part of the citie with the Theater he built, with divers porches about it. In this place was the affembly of the Senate appointed to be, inft on the fifteenth day of the moneth March, which the Ro-MAINES call, Idus Martias: fothat it seemed some god of purpose had brought Casar thither to be flaine, for reuenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come; Brutus went out of his house with a dagger by his side under his long gowne, that no body saw nor knew, but his wife onely. The other conspiratours were all affembled at Cassius house, to bring his sonne into the market place, who on that day did put on the mans gowne, called Toga Virilis and from thence they came all in a troupe together vnto Pompeys porch looking that Cefar would fraight comethither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull affured constancie of these conspirators, in The wonderfull hodangerous and weightie an enterprise as they had vndertaken. For many of them being Prætors, by reason of their office, whose dutie is to minister instice to enery bodie; did not onely with great quietnesse and courtesse heare them that spake vnto them, or that pleaded matters raters in before them, and gaue them attentiue care, as if they had no other matter in their heads: but hilling of moreouer, they gaue iust sentence, and carefully dispatched the causes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine fumme of money, refused to pay it, and cried out, that he did appeale vnto Cefar. Then Brutus casting his eyes vpon the conspirators faid: Cafar shall not let me to see the law executed. Notwithstanding this, by chance there fell outmany misfortunes vnto them, which was enough to have marred the enterprise. The misorities fift and chiefest, was Cafars long tarying, who came very late to the Senate: for, because the somes of the sacrifices appeared voluckie, his wife Calphurnia kept him at home, and the Soothfavers bade him beware he went not abroad. The fecond cause was, when one came vnto Casca being a conspirator, and taking him by the hand, said vnto him: O Casea, thou keptest it close fromme, but Brutus hath told me all. Casca being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, & gyd: Why, how now, how commeth it to paffe thou art thus rich, that thou doest fuc to bee Adilise Thus Cafea being deceived by the others doubtful words, he told them it was a thousand wone, he blabbed not out all the conspiracie. Another Senatour called Popilius Lana, after he had faluted Brutus and Cassius more friendly then he was wont to doe, he rounded foftly inheir earcs, and told them: I pray the goddesse you may go through with that you hauetaknin hand ; but withall, dispatch I reade you, for your enterprise is bewrayed. When he had hid, he prefently departed from them, and left them both affraid that their conspiracie would out. Now in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men post hast vinto him, and told him his wife was a dying. For Porcia being very carefull and penfine for that which was to come, The weaker andbeing too weaketo away with so great and inward griefe of mind, she could hardly keepe mess of within, but was frighted with enery little noy se and crie she heard, as those that are taken and withstanpossest with the furie of the Bacchantes; asking every manthat came from the market place, ding her what Brutus did, and still sent messenger after messenger, to know what newes. At length Cafars former omming being prolonged (as you have heard,) Porciaes weaknesse was not able to hold out any longer, and thereupon shee sodainly swounded, that she had no ley sure to go to her chamber, but wastaken in the middest of her house, where her speech and senses failed her. Howbeit she soone came to her selfe againe, and so was layd in her bed, and attended by her women. When Brutus heard these newes, it gricued him, as it is to be presupposed: yet he left motoffthe care of his countrie and common wealth, neither went home to his house for any weshe heard. Now, it was reported that Cafar was coming in his Litter: for he determined notto stay in the Senate all that day (because he was affraid of the vuluckie signes of the facrifi-(s) but to adjourne matters of importance vnto the next Seffion & Councell holden, fayning limselfe not to be well at ease. When Cafar came out of his Litter, Popilins Lana (that had talked before with Brutus and Cessius, and had praied the goddes they might bring this enterprise topaffe) went vnto Cefar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Cafar gaue good care vnto him wherefore the conspiratorus (if so they should be called) not hearing what heesaid to Casar, butconiecturing by that he had told them a litle before, that his talke was none other but the wie discoucrie of their conspiracy, they were affraid eueric man of them; and one looking nanothers face, it was easie to see that they all were of amind, that it was no tarying for them tillthey were apprehended, but rather that they should kill themselves with their owne hands. And when Cassius and certaine other clapped their hands on their swords vnder their gownes todraw them; Brutus marking the countenance and gesture of Lana, and considering that hedid vse himselferather like an humble and earnest suter, then like an accuser: he said nothing whis companion (because there were many amongst them that were not of the conspiracie,) with his but with a pleasant countenance encouraged Cassius. And immediatly after, Lana went from countenance Cefar, and kiffed his hand : which shewed plainely that it was for some matter concerning himselse, that he had held him so long in talke. Now all the Senators being entred first conforms.

into this place or chapter house where the councell should be kept, all the other conspiratoure straight stood about Casars chaire, as if they had had something to say vnto him. And some say. that Casius casting his eies vpon Pompeys image, made his prayer vnto it, as if it had bene aline Trebonius on the other fide, drew Antonius afide, as he came into the house where the Se nate fate, and held him with a long talke without. When Cafar was come into the house, all the Senate rose to honour him at his coming in. So when he was set, the conspiratours flocked bout him, and amongst them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble suite for the calling home againe of his brother that was banished. They all made as though they were intercellors for him, and tooke Cafar by the hands, and kissed his head and breast. Cafarat the first, simply refused their kindnesse and intreaties: but afterwards, perceiving they still pres fed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked ce. fars gowne over his shoulders, and Casea that stood behind him, drew his dagger first and stake Cafar vpon the shoulder, but gaue him no great wound. Cafar feeling himselfe hurt, tookehim ftraight by the hand he held his dagger in, & cried out in Latine: O traitor Casea, what doft thous Casea on the other side cried in Greeke, and called his brother to helpe him. So diverse running on a heap together to flie vpo Cefar, he looking about him to have fled, faw Brutus with a fword drawne in his hand ready to strike at him: then he let Cascaes hand goe, and casting his gowne ouer his face, suffered enery man to strike at him that would. Then the conspirators thronging one vpon another, because every man was defirous to have a cut at him, so many swords and daggers lighting vpon one bodie, one of them hurt another, and among them Brutus caughta blow on his hand, because he would make one in murthering of him, and all the rest also were euery man of them bloudied. Cofar being flaine in this maner, Brutus flanding in the middeft of the house, would have spoken, and staied the other Senators that were not of the conspiracion to have told them the reason why they had done this fact. But they as men both affraid and amazed, fled one vpon anothers necke in hast to get out at the dore, and no man followed them. For it was fet downe, and agreed betweene them, that they should kill no man but Casar onely, and should intreat all the rest to looke to defend their libertie. All the conspiratours, but Byg. tus, determining vpon this matter, thought it good also to kill Antonius, because he was a wire ked man, and that in nature fauoured tyrannie besides also, for that he was in great estimation with foldiers, having been conversant of long time amongst them: and especially having a mind bent to great enterprises, he was also of great authoritie at that time, being Confull with cafe. But Brutus would not agree to it. First, for that he said it was not honest : secondly, becausehe told them there was hope of change in him. For he did not miftruft, but that Antonius being a noble minded & couragious man (when he should know that Cafar was dead) would willingly help his country to recouer her liberty, having the an example vnto him, to follow their courage and vertue. So Brutus by this means faued Antonius life, who at that prefent time difguifed him. felfe, and ftole away: but Brutus & his conforts, having their fwords bloody in their hands, went ftraight to the Capitoll, perswading the ROMAINES as they went, to take their libertic against Now, at the first time when the murther was newly done there were sudden outcries of people that ranne vp and downe the citie, the which indeed did the more increase the feare and tumult. But when they faw they flue no man, neither did spoile or make hauock of any thing, thencertaine of the Senators, and many of the people enboldening themselues, went to the Capitoll vnto them. There a great number of men being affembled together one after another. Brutus made an oration vnto them to win the fauor of the people, and to inftific that they had done. All those that were by, said they had done well, and cried vnto them, that they should boldly come downe from the Capitol: whereupon Brutus and his companions came boldly downe into the market place. The rest followed in troupe, but Brutus went formost, very honorably copassed in round about with the noblest me of the city, which brought him from the Capitol, through the market place, to the pulpit for oratios. Whethe people faw him in the pulpit, although they were a multitude of rakehels of all forts, and had a good wil to make fome ftirre: yet being ashamedto do it, for the reuerece they bare vnto Brutus, they kept filence to heare what he would fay: Whe Brutus began to speake, they gaue him quiet audience: howbeit immediatly after, they shewed that they were not all contented with the murther. For when another called Cinna would have fpoken, and began to accuse Casar, they fellinto a great vprore among them, and maruellously reuiled him. Infomuch that the conspiratours returned againe into the Capitoll. There Bra-tusbeing affraid to be besieged, sent backe againe the Noblemen that came thither with him. thinking it no reason, that they which were no partakers of the murther, should be partakers of the danger. Then the next morning the Senate being affembled, and holden within the temple of the goddeffe Tellus, to wit, the Earth : and Antonius, Plancus , and Cicero, having made a motion to the Senate in that affembly, that they should take an order to pardon and forget all that was past, and to establish friendship and peace againe: it was decreed, that they should not only bepardoned, but also that the Consuls should referre it to the Senate what honours should be appointed vnto them. This being agreed vpon, the Senate brake vp, and Antonius the Confull, to putthem in heartthat were in the Capitoll, fent them his sonne for a pledge. Vpon this affurance, Brutus and his companions came downe from the Capitoll, where every man faluted and the murtheembraced each other, among the which, Antonius himselfe did bid Cassius to supper to him, and Levidus also bade Brutus, and so one bad another, as they had friendship and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called againe to councell, did first of all commend Antonius, for that he had wifely stayed and quenched the beginning of a civill warre; then they also gaue Brutus and his conforts great praises; and lastly they appointed them seuerall gouernments of Provinces. For vnto Brutus they appointed CRETA, AFRICKE vnto Callius; Asia VINO Trebonius; BITHYNIA VINTO Cimber; and VINTO the other Decius Brutus Albinus, GAVLE OR this side of the Alpes. When this was done, they came to talke of Casars will and testament and of his funerals and tombe. Then Antonius thinking good his testament should be read openly, Cofarmil, and also that his bodie should be honourably buried, and not in hugger mugger, lest the people might thereby take occasion to be worse offended if they did otherwise: Casius stoutly spake against it. But Brutus went with the motion, and agreed vnto it : wherein it seemeth he comitted ascond fault. Forthe first fault he did, was when he would not consent to his fellow conspirators, that Antonius should be flaine; and therefore he was justly accused, that therby he had faued and strengthened a strong and grieuous enemie of their conspiracy. The second fault was, when heagreed that Cafarsfunerals should be as Antonius would have them, the which indeed marred all. For first of all, when Cafars testament was openly read among them, wherby it appeared that he bequeathed vnto enery citizen of Rome, 75 Drachmaes a man. & that he left his gardens and arbors vnto the people, which he had on this fide of the river Tyber, in the place where now the temple of Fortune is built: the people then loued him, and were maruellous forie for him. Afterwards, when Cefars bodie was brought into the market place, Antonius making his funerall funerall oration in praise of the dead, according to the ancient custome of Rome, and perceiving that his oration for words moued the common people to compassion, he framed his eloquence to make their hearts yearnethe more; & taking Cafars gowne all bloodie in his hand, he layd it open to the fight of them all, shewing what a number of cuts and holes it had vpon it. Therewithall the people fell presently into fuch a rage and mutinie, that there was no more order kept amongst the common people. For some of them cried out, Kill the murtherers: others plucked up formes, tables, and stalles about the market place, as they had done before at the funerals of clodius, and having laid them all on a heape together, they fet them on fire, and thereupon did put the bodie of Gafar, and burnt it in the mids of the most holy places. And furthermore, when the fire was throughly kindled, fome here, fomethere, tookeburning firebrands, and ranne with them to the murtherers houses that killed him, to set the on fire. Howbeit, the conspirators foreseeing the danger before dreame of hadwifely prouided for themselues, and fledde. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had been no partaker of the conspiracy, but was alway one of Casars chiefest friends: he dreamed thenight before, that Cafar bad him to supper with him, and that he refusing to goe, Cafar was Themur. very importunate with him, and compelled him, so that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being maruellously affraid, he was driven to follow him in spite of his heart. This dreame put him all night into a feauer, and yet notwithstanding, the next morning kenforano. whehe heard that they caried Cafars body to burial, being ashamed not to accompany his funcrals, he went out of his house, and thrust himselfe into the prease of the common people that were in agreat vprore. And because some one called him by his name, Cinna: the people thin- his conforts king he had beenethat Cinna, who in an oration he made, had spoken very cuill of Gafar, they doffic from falling vpon him in their rage, flue him outright in the market place. This made Brutus and his companions more affraid then any other thing, next vnto the change of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of Rome, and kept at the first in the citie of ANTIVM, hoping to returne againe to Rome, when the furie of the people was a little affwaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, confidering that they had to deale with a fickle and vnconstant multitude. easse to be caried, and that the Senate stood for them; who notwithstanding made no enquire for them that had torne poore Cinna the Poet in peeces, but caused them to be sought for and anprehended that went with firebrands to fet fire on the conspiratours houses. The people growing weary now of Antonius pride and infolency, who ruled all things in a maner with absolute power, they defired that Brutus might returne againe; & it was also looked for, that Brutus would come himfelfe in person to play the plaies which were due to the people, by reason of hisoffice of Prætorship. But Brutus vinderstanding that many of Casars soldiers which served underhim in the warres, and that also had lands and houses given them in the cities where they lay, didlie in waite for him to kill him and that they daily by finall companies came by one and by one in. to Rome, he durst no more returne thither: but yet the people had the pleasure and passime in his absence, to see the games and sports he made them, which were sumptuously set forth and furnished with all things necessary, sparing for no cost. For he had brought agreat number of ftrange beafts, of the which he would not give one of them to any friend he had, but that they should all be employed in his games: and went himselfe as farre as By ZANTIVM, to speake to some players of comedies and musicians that were there. And further he wrote vnto his friends for one Canutius an excellent player, that what focuer they did, they should intreate him to play these plaies. For (said he)it is no reason to compell any GR #c I AN, vnlesse he will come of his owne good will. Moreouer, he wrote also vnto cicero, & carneftly prayed him in any case to be at these plaies. Now the state of Rome standing in these termes, there fell out another change and alteration, when the yong man Ottawius Cafar came to Rome. He was the fonneof Inline Cafars Necce, whom he had adopted for his fonne, and made his heire, by his laft will and testament. But when Inlins Cafar his adopted father was slaine, he was in & city of Apollonia (where he fludied) tarying for him because he was determined to make war with the PARTHI-ANS: but when he heard the newes of his death, he returned agains to Rome, where to begin to currie fauour with the common people, he first of all tooke vpon him his adopted fathers name, and made distribution among them of the money which his father had bequeathed vnto them. By this meanes he troubled Antonius forely, and by force of money, got a great number of his fathers foldiers together, that had ferued in the wars with him. And Cicero himfelfe, for the great malice he bare Anionius, did fauour his proceedings: but Brutus maruellously reproued him for it, and wrote vnto him, that he feemed by his doings not to be fory to have a mafter, but only to be afraid to have one that should hate him: and that all his doings in the commonwealth did witneffe, that he chofe to be subject to a mild & courteous bondage, fith by his words and writings he did commend this yong man Octavius Cafar, to be a good and gentle Lord. For our predeceffors (faid he) would neuer abide to be subject to any Masters, how gentle or mild soener they were and for his owne part, that he had never refolutely determined with himself to makewar, or peace, but otherwife, that he was certainly minded neuer to be flaue nor fubicet. And thereforche wondred much at him, how Cicero could be afraid of the danger of civil wars, and would not be affiraid of a shamefull peace: and that to thrust Antonius out of the vsurped tyrannie, inrecompence he went about to stablish yong Octavius Casar tyrant. These were the contents of Brutus first letters he wrote vnto Cicero. Now the city of Rome being divided in two factions, some taking part with Antonius, other also leaning vnto OEtauius Casar, and the soldiers making portfale of their feruice to him that would give most: Brutus feeing the state of Rome would bevtterly ouerthrowne, he determined to go out of ITALY, and went on foote through the country Of LVKE, vnto the citic of ELEA, standing by the sea. There Porcia being readie to depart from her husband Brutus, and to returne to Rome, did what she could to dissemble the griefe and forrow the felt at her heart: but a certaine painted table bewrayed her in the end, although vntill that time she shewed alwaies a constant and patient mind. The denice of the table was taken out of the Greeke stories, how Andromaché accompanied her husband Hettor, when he went out of the city of TROY to go to the warres, and how Hetter delivered her his little fonne, and howher eyes were neuer off him. Porcia seeing this picture, and likening her selfe to be in the fame case, she fell a weeping: and coming thither oftentimes in a day to see it, she wept still. Acilius one of Beutus friends perceiuing that, rehearfed the verses Andromaché speaketh to this purpose in Homer:

Than Hector art my father, and my mother, and my brother; And husbandeke, and all in all: I mind not any other.

Then Brutus smiling, answered againe: But yet (faid he) I cannot for my part say vnto Porcia, as Hefter answered Andromaché in the same place of the Poet.

Tush meddle thou with duly weighing out. Thy maydes their taske, and pricking on a clout.

For indeed the weake constitution of her bodie, doth not fuffer her to performe in shew, the valiant actes that we are able to do: but for courage and constant mind, she shewed herselfe as stout inthe defence of her countrey, as any of vs. Bibulus the sonne of Porcia, reporteth this storie thus. Now Brutus embarking at ELEA in LVKE, he fayled directly towards ATHENS. When he Home Bro. arriued there, the people of Athens received him with common joyes of rejoycing, and hono rable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whom he went daily to heare the at Athens, Lectures of Theomnestus the Academicke Philosopher, and of Cratippus the Peripateticke, and so Britis prewouldtalke with them in Philosophy, that it seemed he left all other matters, and gaue himselfe (elfe to war, onely to study:howbeit, secretly not with standing, he made preparation for warre. For he sent Brustos Herostratus into MACEDON, to win the Captaines and souldiers that were vpon those marches, mendeth and he did also entertaine all the yong Gentlemen of the ROMAINES, whom he found in A-THEN'S studying Philosophic:amongst them he found Ciseroes son, whom he highly praised and commended, faying: That whether he waked or flept, he found him of a noble mind and difposkion, he did in nature so much hate tyrants. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being advertised that there came out of Asiaa certaine fleet of Romaine shippes that had goodstore of money in them, and that the Captaine of those ships (who was an honest man, and his familiar friend) came towards ATHENS: he went to meet him as far as the Ile of CARYSTOS, and having spoken with him there, he handled him so, that he was contented to leave his ships in his hands: whereupon he made him a notable banquet at his house, because it was on his birth day. When the feast day came, and that they began to drinke lustily one to another, the guestes dranke to the victorie of Brutus, and the liberty of the Romain Es. Brutus therfore to encourage them farther, called for a bigger cup, & holding it in his hand, before he dranke spake this aloud.

My destinie and Phabus are agreed, To bring me to my finall end with speed.

And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that the fame day he fought his last battell by the citie of PHILIPPES, as he came out of his tent, he gauethern for the word and fignall of battell, Phebus: sothat it was thought euer fince, that this his sodaine crying out at the feast, was a prognostication of his misfortune that should happen. After this, Antistius gaue him of the money he caried into ITALIE, fiftie Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys fouldiers that straggled vp and downe THESSALY, came with very good will vnto him. He tooke from Cinna also, five hundred horsemen, which he caried into Asia, vnto Dolabella. After that, he went by fea, vnto the city of DEMETRIADE, and theretooke a great deale of armour and munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had been made and forged there by Iulius Cafars commandement, for the wars against the Parthians. Furthermore, Hortensius Gouernor of Macedon, did resigne the gouernment thereof vnto him. Besides, all the Princes, Kings, and Noblemen thereabouts, came and loyned with him, when it was told him, that Caius (Intenius brother) coming out of Iral Y, had paffed the sea, and came with great speed towards the citie of Dyrrachivm, and APOLLONIA, to get the fouldiers into his hands, which Gabinius had there. Brutus therefore to prevent him, went presently with a few of his men in the middest of winter when it did snow hard, and tooke his way through hard and foule countries, and made fuch speede indeede, that he was there long before Antonius sumpters, that caried the victuals. So that when he came Britis at neare to Dyrrachtvm, a disease tooke him, which the Phisitians call Banipua to say, A cormorant and vnfatiable appetite to eate: by reason of the cold and paines he had taken. This sickenessechanceth often, both to men and beastes, that trauell when it hath snowen: either be- bunger aiscause the naturall heate being retired into the inward parts of the body, by the coldnesse of the aire hardening the skinne, doth straight digest and consume the meate; or else because a sharpe are wearled subtil wind coming by reason of the snow when it is molten, doth pierce into the body, and dri- with transl. ueth out the naturall heate which was cast outward. When they heard in what case Brutus was they brought him both meate and drinke; in requitall whereof, afterwards when he wan the citie, he did not onely intreate and vie the citie. zens thereof courteoufly, but all the inhabitants of the citic also for their sakes. Now when Caine Antonius was arrived in the citie of Arol Lonia, he fent vnto the foldiers thereabouts to come vnto him. But when he vnderstood that they went all to Brutus: and furthermore; that the Ci. tizens of Apollonia did fauour him much: he then for fooke that city, and went vnto the city of Bythrorysbut yet he loft three of his enfignes by the way, that were flaine every man of them. Then he fought by force to winne certaine places of firength about By LLIS, and to drine Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before and therefore to obtain his purpose, he fought abattell with Gicero, the sonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whow he was ouercome. For Brutus made the yonger Ciceroa Captaine, and did many notable exploits by his seruice. Shortly after having ftolen vpon Gaius Antonius in certaine marrifhes farre from the place fro whence he fled he would not fet on him with fury but onely rode round about him, comanding his foldiers to spare him and his men, as reckoning them all his owne without stroke striking: and so indeed it happened: for they yeelded themselues and their Captaine Antonius, vnto Brutus: fo that Brutus had now a great army about him . Now Brutus kept this Caius Antonius long time in his office & neuer tooke from him the markes and fignes of his Confulfhip, although many of his friends, and Cicero among others, wrote vnto him to put him to death. But when he faw · Antonius fecretly practifed with his Captaines to make forme alteration, then he fent him into ship, and made him to be kept there. When the souldiers whom Caius Antonius had corrupted; were gotten into the city of Apollonia, and fent from thence vnto Brutusto come vnto them, he made them answer, That it was not the maner of ROMAINE Captaines to come to the soldie ers, but the foldiers to come to the Captaine, and to crave pardon for their offences committed. Thereupon they came to him, and he pardoned them. So Brutus preparing to goe into Asia. newes came vnto him of the great change at Roma : for Octavius Cafar was in armes ; by commandement and authoritie from the Senate, against Marcus Antonius. But after that hee had driven Antonius out of ITALY, the Senate began then to be afraid of him, because he sued to be Conful, which was contrarie to the law; and kept a great armie about him when the Empire of Rome had no need of them. On the other side, Octavius Cafar perceiving the Senate Rayed not there, but turned vnto Brutus that was out of ITALY, and that they appointed him the gouernment of certaine Provinces: then he began to be affraid for his part, and sent vnto Antonius to offer him his friendship. Then coming on with his army neare to Rome, he made himselse to be chosen Consul, whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but assipling or springall of twentie yearesold, as himselse reporteth in his owne Commentaries. So when he was Conful, he prefently appointed Judges to accuse Brutus and his companions, for killing of the nobleft person in Rome, and chiefest Magistrate, without law or judgement; and made L. Cornificius accuse Brusus, and M. Agrippa, Cassus. So the parties accused were condemned, because the Iudges were compelled to give such sentence. The voice went, that whenthe Herauld(according to the custome after sentence given) went vp to the chaire or pulpit for orations, and proclaimed Brutus with a loud voyce, summoning him to appeare in personbefore the Iudges, the people that stood by sighed openly, and the Noblemen that were present hung downetheir heads, and durst not speake a word. Among them the teares fell from Publius Silicius cies: who shortly after, was one of the proscripts or outlawes appointed to be slaine. Afterthat, these three Octavius Cafar, Antonius and Lepidus made an agreement betweene themfelues, and by those articles deuided the Provinces belonging to the Empire of Rome among themfelues, and did fet up bils of profeription and outlawrie condemning two hundred of the noblest men of Rome to suffer death, and among that number, Cicero was one, Newesbeing brought therofinto MACEDON, Brutus being then inforced to doit, wrote vnto Hortensius thathe should put Caius Antonius to death, to be reuenged of the death of Cicero, & of the other Brusus, of the which the one was his friend, & the other a kinsma. For this cause therfore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortenfius at the battell of Philippes, he made him to be slaine upon his brothers tombe. But when Brutus faid, that he was more ashamed of the cause for the which Cicero was flaine then he was otherwise for ic for his death; and that he could not but greatly reproue his friends he had at Rome, who were flaues more through their own fault, then through their valiantnesse or manhood which vsurped the tyranny: considering that they were so cowardly and faint hearted, as foluffer the fight of those things before their eyes, the report whereof should onely have grieved them to the heart. Now when Britis had paffed over his army (that was vericercat) into As 11, he gaue order for the gathering of a great number of ships together, as well in the coast of BITHYNIA, as also in the citie of Cyzievm, because he would have an armic by sea, and himselfe in the meane time went vnto the cities, taking order for all things. and giving audience to princes and noblemen of the countrie that had to doe with him. Afterwards he fent vnto Castus in Syria, to turne him from his journey into Egypt, telling him that it was not for the conquest of any kingdome for themselves, that they wandred vp and downe inthat fort, but contrarily, that it was to restore their countrey agains to her liberty; and that the multitude of soldiers they gathered together; was to subdue the tyrants that would keepe them in flauerie and subjection. Wherefore regarding their chiefe purpose and intent, they hould not be farre from ITALY, as neare as they could possible; but should rather make all the hast they could, to keepe their countrimen. Cassius beleeved him, and returned. Brutus went Gassius do to meete him, and they both met at the citie of Smyrna, which was the first time that they say some armies together fince they tooke leave each of other, at the haven of Pir. EA in Athens, the one going into Syrta, and the other into Mace Don. So they were maruellous joyfull, and no leffe couragious, when they faw the great armies together which they had both leauied: confidering that they departed out of ITALY, like naked and poore banished men, without armor and money nor having any ship ready, nor soldier about them, nor any one towne at their commandement; yet notwithstanding, in a short time after they were now met together, having shippes. money, and foldiers enough, both footmen and horsemen, to fight for the Empire of Rome. Now Cassius would have done Brutus much honour, as Brutus did vnto him, but Brutus most commonly preuented him, and went first vnto him, both because he was the elder man. as also for that he was fickly of bodie. And men reputed him commonly to be very skilfull in warres, but otherwise maruellous cholericke and cruell, who sought to rule men by feare, ra- The sharpe ther then with lenitie: and on the other fide he was too familiar with his friends, and would iest too broadly with them. But Brutus in contrary manner, for his vertue and valiantnesse, was wel- cassius. beloved of the people and his owne, esteemed of noblemen, and hated of no man, not so much Bruttunger as of his enemies; because he was a maruellous lowly and gentle person, noble minded, and conditions, would neuer be in any rage, nor caried away with pleasure and couetous nesse, but had euer an vpright mind with him, and would neuer yeeld to any wrong or iniuftice; the which was the thiefest cause of his fame, of his rising, & of the goodwill that every man bare him: for they were all perswaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainly beleeue, that if Pompey himself Brutun Inhadouercome Cefar, he would have refigned his authority to the law, but rather they were of sent good, opinion, that he would stil keepe the soueraigntie and absolute government in his hands, taking of the source of the still of Confell on Difference of Confell on Difference on the still of the source of the still onely, to please the people, the title of Consul, or Dictator, or of some other more civill office. And as for Cafins, a hote, cholericke, and cruell man, that would oftentimes be caried away from inflice for gaine, it was certainly thought that he made warre, and put himfelfe into sudriedangers, more to haue absolute power and authoritie, then to defend the liberty of his countrey. For they that will also consider others, that were elder men then they, as Einna, Marinus, & Carbo, it is out of doubt that the end & hope of their victorie, was to be the Lords of their countrey, and in manner they did all confesse, that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lords of the Empire of Rome. And in contrary maner, his enemies themselves did never reprove Brutusfor any fuch change or defire. For, it was faid that Antonius spake it openly diverse times, that hethought, that of all them that had flaine Cafar, there was none but Brutus onely that was mowed to do it, as thinking the act commendable of it felfe: but that all the other conspiratours did sessimony of conspire his death for some private malice or envie, that they otherwise did beare voto him. Hereby itappeareth, that Brutus did not trust so much to the power of his army, as he did to his owne vertue, as it is to be seene by his writings. For approching neare to the instant dangerhewrote vnto Pomponius Atticus, that his affaires had the best hapthat could bec. For, faidhe, either I will set my countrey at liberty by battell, or by honorable death rid me of this bondage. And surthermore, that they being certaine and assured of all things else, this one thing big country.

onely was doubtfull to them: whether they should line or die with liberty. He wrote alforthat Antonius had his due paiment for his folly. For where he might have bin a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Cassius, and Cato, & have made one with them, he liked better to chuse tobe ioyned with Octavius Cafar alone : with whom, though now he be not ouercome by vs, yet shall he shortly after also have war with him. And truly he proved a true prophet, for so came it indeed to passe. Now whilest Brutus and Cassius were together in the citie of SMYRNA, Brutus, prayed Cassus to let him have some part of his money whereof he had great store; because all that he could rap and rend of his fide he had bestowed it in making so great a number of ships, that by meanes of them they should keepe all the sea at their commandement. Casius friends hindered this request, and earnestly dissiwaded him from it: perswading him, that it was no reasonthat Brutus should have the money which Caffins hathgorten to gether by sparing, and leavied with greateuill will of the people their subjects, for him to bestow liberally vpon his souldiers, and by this meanes to win their good wils, by Cassius charge. This notwithstanding, Cassius gaue him the third part of this totall summe. So Cassius and Brutus then departing from each other, Cassius tooke the citie of Rhodes, where he too dishonestly and cruelly vied himselfe: although when he came into the city, he answered some of the inhabitants who called him Lord and King, that he was neither Lord nor King, but he onely that had flaine him, that would have been Lord and King, Brutus departing from thence, fent vnto the Lycians to require money, and men of war. But there was a certaine Orator called Nancrates, that made the cities to rebell against him, info. much that the countrimen of that country kept the straights and little mountaines, thinking by that means to stop Brutus passage. Wherfore Brutus sent his horsemen against them, who stoley ponthem as they were at dinner, and flue fixe hundred of them; and taking all the small townes and villages, he did let all the prisoners he took, go without payment of ransome, hoping by this his great courtesie to win them, to draw all the rest of the countrey vnto him. But they wereso fierce and obstinate, that they would mutine for enery small hurt they received as he passed by their countrey, and did despise his courtesse and good nature; vntill that at length he went to befiege the citie of the XANTHIANS, within the which were shut vp the cruellest and most warlike men of Lycia. There was a river that ranne by the wals of the city, in the which many men saued themselues, swimming betweene two waters, and fled : howbeit they layd nets ouerthwart the river, and tied little bels on the top of them, to found when any man was taken in the nets. the XANTHIANS made a fally out by night, and came to fire certaine engines of the batterythat beat downe their wals: but they were presently driven in againe by the ROMAINES, so some as they were discouered. The wind by chance was maruellous bigge, and increased the slame so fore, that it violently caried it into the cranewes of the wall of the city, that the next housesvnto them were straight set on firethereby. Wherfore Brutus being afraid that all the city would take on fire, he presently commanded his men to quench the fire, and to faue the towne if it might be. But the Lycians at that instant fell into such a frensie, and strange and horrible despaire, that no man can well expresse it: and a man cannot more rightly compare or liken it, thento a franticke and most desperate desire to die. For all of them together, with their wives and children, maisters and servants, and of all sorts of age what soeuer, fought vpon the rampiers of their wals and did cast downe stones and fire-workes on the Romaines, which were very busie in quenching the flame of the fire, to faue the citie. And in contrary manner also, they brought faggots, drie wood, and reeds, to bring the fire further into the city as much as might be, increafing it by fuch things as they brought. Now when the fire had gotten into all parts of thecitic, and that the flame burnt bright in enery place. Brutus being forrie to feeit, got vpon his horfe, and rode round about the wals of the citie, to fee if it were possible for to faue it, and held up his hands to the inhabitants, praying them to pardon their citie, and to faue themselues. Howbeit they would not be perswaded, but did all that they could possible to cast themselues away, not only men and women, but also litle children. For some of them weeping and crying out, did cast themselues into the fire : others headlong throwing themselues downe from the wals, brake their neckes: others also made their backes bare, to the naked swords of their fathers, and vadid their clothes, praying them to kill them with their owne hands. After the citie was burnt, they found a woman hanged vp by the necke, holding one of her children in her hand dead by her, hanged vp also: and in the other hand a burning torch setting fire on her house. Some would haue had Brutus to haue seeneher, but he would not see so horrible and tragicall a fight: but when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and caused an Herauld to make proclamation by sound of rumpet, that he would give a certaine fumme of money, to every foldier that could faue a XAN-THIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) aboue fiftie of them faued, and yet they were faued against their wils. Thus the XANTHIANS having ended the revolution of their fatall destinie after along continuance of time, they did through their desperation, renew the memorie of the lamentable calamities of their Ancestors, who in like manner, in the warres of the PERSIANS, didburnetheir citie and destroyed themselues. Therefore Brutus likewise besieging the citie of the PATAREIANS, perceiuing that they stoutly resisted him, he was also afraid of that, and couldnot well tell whether he should give affault to it, or not, lest they would fall into the defraire and desperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit having taken certaine of their women prifoncers, he sent them backe againe, without payment of ransome. Now they that were the wives and daughters of the noblest men of the citie, reporting vnto their parents, that they had found Bistus a mercifull, just, and courteous man, they perswaded them to yeeld themselves and their city ynto him; the which they did. So after they had thus yeelded themfelues, diverfe other ciries also followed them, and did the like; and found Brutus more mercifull and courteous, then they thought they should have done, but specially far aboue Cassius. For Cassius, about the selfe cornelity of fime time, after he had compelled the R H Q D I A N s cuerie manto delinerall the ready mony they had in gold and filuer in their houses, the which being brought together, amounted to the summe of eight thousand talents; yet he condemned the city besides, to pay the summe of fiue hundred talents more. Where Brutus in contrary manner, after he had leavied of all the country of Lycia but an hundred and fifty talents only, he departed thence into the countrey of Ionia, Brutus clean and did them no more hurt. Now Brutus in all this journey, did many notable actes and wor- menes rate thy of memorie, both for rewarding, as also in punishing the certain thad deferued it: wherefore the Lycians among the reft, I will tell you of one thing, of the which he himselfe, and all the Noblemen of the ROMAINES were maruellous glad. When Pompey the Great (having loft the battel against Inlin Calar in the fields of Pharsalia) came and fell upon the coast of Ægypt, hard by the citicofPelvsiv Mithofe that were protectors to the yong king Ptolomie, being then but a child. fate in councell with his feruants and friends, what they should determine in that case. They were not all of one mind in this confultation; for some thought it good to receive Pompey: O- borne in thers also, that they should drive him out of Agypt. But there was a certaine Rhetoritian Chio, a Rib. called Theodotus, that was borne in the Isle of Chio, who was the kings schoole master to teach him Rhetoricke. He being called to the councell for lacke of sufficient men, said, That both theone and the other fide went awrie, as well those that were of opinion to receive Fompey, as the other that would have had him driven away: and that the best way was (considering the Exist. present time) that they should lay hold on him, and kill him, adding withall this sentence, That Theodorus adead man biteth not. The whole councell stucke to this opinion. So, for a notable example dead man of incredible misfortune, and vnlooked for vnto Pompey, Pompey the Greatwas flaine, by the biethnot. motion and counfell of this wicked Rhetoritian Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwards did himfelfe boaft of it. But when Islius Cafar came afterwards into Agypt, the wicked men that confented Theodesus to this counfell, had their paiment according to their deferts: for they died every man of them awicked death, fauing this Theodotus, whom fortune respited a little while longer, and yet in that time he lived a poore and miserable life, never tarying long in any one place. So Brutus compiles going vp and downe A s I A, Theodotus could hide himselfe no longer, but was brought vato Bruus, where he fuffered paines of death: fo that he wanne more fame by his death, then ever hedid in his life. About that time, Brutus, lentto pray Cassius to come to the citic of Sandis, and so he did Brutus vnderstanding of his comming, went to meete him with all his friendes. There both their armies being armed, they called them both Emperours. Now as it commonly happeneth in great affaires betweene two persons, both of them having many friends, and so many Captaines under them, there ranne tales and complaints betwixt them. Therefore, before they fell in hand with any other matter, they went into a little chamber together, and bade energ manauoid, and did shut the dores to them. Then they began to powre out their complaints one to the other, and grew hot and loud, earneftly accusing one another, and at length fell both a other weeping. Their friends that were without the chamber, hearing them loud within, and angry betweene themselues, they were both amazed & afraid also, lest it wold grow to further matter: follower but yet they were comanded, that no man should come to them. Notwithstanding one Marcus of Cato,

Phaonius, that had beene a friend and follower of Cato while he lived, and tooke vpon him to counterfeit a Philosopher, not with wisedome & discretion, but with a certaine bedlem and frae. ticke motion:he would needs come into the chamber, though the men offered to keepe him our But it was no booteto let Phaonius, when a mad moode or toy tooke him in the head : for he was a hote hastie man, and sudden in all his doings, and cared for neuer a Senator of them all Now, though he vsed this bold manner of speech after the profession of the Cynicke Phylosophers (as who would fay, Dogs) yet his boldnessedid no hurt many times, because they did but laugh at him to fee him to mad. This Phaonius at that time, in despite of the doore-keepers, came into the chamber, and with a certaine fcoffing and mocking gefture, which he counterfeited of purpose, he rehearsed the verses which old Nester said in Homer:

My Lords, I pray you hearken both to me,

For I have feene moe yeares then suchie three. Caffins fell a laughing at him: but Brutus thrust him out of the chamber, and called him dogge and counterfeit Cynicke. Howbeit his coming in brake their strife at that time, and so they less each other. The felfe fame night Cassius prepared his supper in his chamber, and Brutus brough his friends with him. So when they were fer at supper, Phaonius came to six downe after hehad washed. Brutus told him aloud, no man sent for him, and bade them set him at the vpperend meaning indeed at the lower end of the bed. Phaonius made no ceremony, but thrust in amonost the middest of them, and made all the company laugh at him. So they were merrie all supper time, and full of their Philosophie. The next day after, Brutus, vpon complaint of the Sarpt. ANS, did condemne and note Lucius Pella for a defamed person, that had beene a Prætor of the ROMAINES, and whom Brutus had given charge vnto: for that he was accused and convided of robbery, and pilferie in his office. This judgement much misliked Cassius, because he him. felfe had fecretly (not many daies before) warned two of his friends, attainted and consided of the like offences, and openly had cleared them; but yet he did not therefore leave to employ them in any manner of service as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproved Brutus for that he would shew himselfe so straight and severe, in such a time as was meeter to beare a little. then to take things at the worst. Brutus in contrarie manner answered, that he should rememberthe Ides of march, at which time they flue Iulius Casar, who neither pilled nor polled the country, but onely was a fauourer and suborner of all them that did rob and spoile, by his countenance and authoritie. And if there were any occasion whereby they might honestly setaside inflice and equitie, they should have had more reason to have suffered Casars friends to have robbed and done what wrong and injurie they had would, then to beare with their owne men. For then faid he, they could but have faid they had been cowards, but now they may accuse vs of iniuftice, befide the paines we take, and the danger we put our felues into. And thus may we fee what Brutus intent and purpose was. But asthey both prepared to passe ouer againe out of Asia into Evrope, there went a rumour that there appeared a wonderfull figne vnto him. Brutus was a carefull man, and flept very little, both for that his dict was moderate, as also because he was continually occupied. He never slept in the day time, and in the night no longer then the time he was driven to be alone, and when every body else tooke their reft. But now whilest he was in warre, and his head ouer bussly occupied to thinke of his affaires, and what would happen, after he had flumbered a little after supper, he spent all the rest of the night in dispatching of his weightiest causes; and after he had taken order for them, if he had any leisure left him, he would read some booke till the third watch of the night, at what time the Captains, pettie Captaines and Colonels, did vseto cometo him. So, being readieto goe into Evropp, one night very late (when all the campe tooke quiet rest) as he was in his tent with a litle light, thinking of weighty matters, he thought he heard one come in to him, and casting his eye towards the doore of his tent, that he faw a wonderfull strange and monstrous shape of a bodie coming towards him, and faid neuer a word. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a god or a man, and what cause brought him thither. The spirit answered him, I am thy enill spirit, Brutus: and thou shalt see me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Brutus being no otherwise affraid, replied againe vnto it: Well, then I shall see thee againe. The spirit presently vanished away: and Brutus called his men vnto him, who told him that they heard no noise, nor faw any thing at all. Thereupon Brutus returned agains to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the day brake, he went vnto Casius, to tell him what vision had appeared vnto him in the

night. Cassius being in opinion an Epicyrian, and reasoning thereon with Brutus, spaketo him touching the vision thus. In our sect, Brutus, we have an opinion, that we doe not alwayes feele or fee, that which we suppose we do both fee & feele, but that our fenses being credulous min of fers and therefore easily abused (when they are idle and vnoccupied in their owne objects) are induced to imagine they see & coniecture that, which in truth they do not. For, our mind is quicke the Estenand conning to worke (without either cause or matter) any thing in the imagination what soeher. And therefore the imagination is resembled to clay, and the mind to the potter: who without any other cause then his fancy and pleasure, changeth it into what fashion and forme he will. And this doth the divertitie of our dreames they vinto vs. For our imagination doth yoon The case of a small fancie grow from conceipt to conceipt, altering both in passions and formes of things dreams, imagined. For the mind of man is ever occupied, and that continuall moving is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cause of this in you. For you being by nature given to melancholike discoursing, and of late continually occupied, your wits and senses having been outerlaboured, do eafilier yeeld to fuch imaginatios. For, to fay that there are spirits or Angels. and if there were, that they had the shape of men, or such voyces or any power at all to come vnto vs, it is a mockerie. And for mine owne part, I would there were fuch, because that wee fould not onely have foldiers, horfes, and ships, but also the aide of the gods, to guide and further our honest and honourable attempts. With these words Cassius did somewhat comfort and quiet Erutus. When they raifed their campe, there came two Eagles that flying with a maruellous force, lighted vpon two of the foremost ensignes, and alwaies followed the souldiers, which gaue them meate, and fed them, vntill they came neare to the citie of PHILIP-PES: and there one day onely before the battell, they both flew away. Now Brutus had con-full genely quered the most part of all the people and nations of that country; but if there were any other Imp Eagles. citic or Captaine to ouercome, then they made all cleare before them, and fo drew towards the coasts of Thas sos. There Norbanus lying in campe in a certaine place called the straights, by another place called CYMBOLON (which is a port in the fea,) Castins and Brutus compassed him in in fuch fort, that he was driven to for fake the place which was of great strength for him, and he was also in danger beside to have lost all his armie. For, Ottanins Casar could not follow him because of his ficknesse, & therfore stayed behind: wherupon they had taken his army, had not Anunius aide beene, which made such wonderful speed, that Brutus could scant beleeue it. So Cafar camenot thither of ten daies after and Antonius camped against Cassius, and Brutus on the other Cassius sideagainst Casar. The Romains called y valley between both camps, the Philippian fields: "unperbeand there were neuer scene two so great armics of the Romaines, one before the other, ready to fight. In truth, Brutus army was inferiour to Octanius Cafars, in number of menibut for brauery and rich furniture, Brutus army far excelled Cafars. For the most part of their armors were silver andgilt, which Brutus had bountifully given the although in all other things he taught his Captaines toliue in order without excesse. But for the braueric of armor & weapon, which soldiers hould cary in their hands, or otherwise weare vpontheir backs, he thought that it was an encouragement vnto them that by nature are greedy of honor, and that it maketh them also fight like denils that loue to get, & to be afraid to lofe because they fight to keepe their armor & weapon, asalfo their goods and lands. Now when they came to muster their armies, Offauius Cafar fouldiers, in tooke the muster of his army within the trenches of his camp, & gaue his men only a little corne, their armore the armore the corne, their armore the corner of the corner & fine filuer Drachmaes to cuery manto facrifice to the gods, & to pray for victoric. But Brutus & weekens. feorning this mifery & nigardlineffe, first of all mustred his army, and did purific it in the fields, according to the maner of the Romains and then he gaue vnto euery band a nuber of weathers to facrifice, and fiftie filuer Drachmaes to every foldier. So that Bruius and Cassius foldiers were better pleafed. & more couragioufly bent to fight at the day of battel, the their enemies foldiers were. Notwithstanding, being busily occupied about the ceremonies of this purification, it is re- value lie ported that there chanced certaine value kie fignes vato Cassins. For one of his Sergeants that ca- signes value ried the rods before him, brought him the garland of flowers turned backward, the which he caffins. should have worne on his head in the time of facrificing. Moreover it is reported also, that another time before, in certaine sports & triumph where they caried an image of Cassius victorie, of cleane gold, it fellby chance, the man stubling that caried it. place the Soothfayers thought good to flut out of the precinct of the campe, for to take away the fuperstirious feare and mistrust men would have of it. The which began somewhat to alter Cassius mind from Epicurus opinions, and had put the fouldiers also in a maruellous feare. Thereupon Cassins was of opinion not to trie this warre at one battell, but rather to delay time, and to nions about the Batten. draw it out in length, confidering that they were the stronger in money, and the weaker in men and armor. But Brutus in contrary maner, did alway before and at that time alfo, defire nothing more, then to putall to the hazard of battell, as soone as might be possible: to the end he might either quickly restore his countrey to her former liberty, or rid him forthwith of this miserable world, being still troubled in following and maintaining of such great armies together. But perceining that in the daily skirmishes and bickerings they made, his men were alwaies the stronger and euer had the better, that yet quickened his spirits againe, & did put him in better heart. And furthermore, because that some of their owne men had already yeelded themselves to their enemies, and that it was suspected moreouer divers others would doe the like, that made many of Cassus friends which were of his mind before (when it came to be debated in councel, whether the battel should be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus mind. But yet was there one of Brutus friends called Atellius, that was against it, & was of opinion that they shold tary to the next winter. Brutus asked him what he should get by tarying a yeare longer : If I get nothing else, quoth Atellius againe, yet haue I lived so much longer. Casius was very angry with this answer. and Atellius was maliced & esteemed the worse for it of all men. Therupon it was presently de. termined they should fight battel the next day. So Brutus all supporting looked with a cheereful countenance, like a man that had good hope, & talked very wifely of Philosophy, & after supper went to bed. But rouching Casius, Messala reporteth that he supped by himselfe in his tent with a few of his friends, & that all supper time he looked very fadly, & was ful of thoughts, although it was against his nature, and that after supper he tooke him by the hand, & holding him fast (in token of kindnesse, as his maner was) told him in Greek: Messala, I protest vnto thee, & makethee my witnesse, that I am compelled against my mind & wil (as Pompey the great was) to icopard the liberty of our country to the hazard of a battel. And yet we must beliuely, & of good courage, confidering our good fortune, whom we should wrong too much to mistrust her, although we follow enill counsell. Messala writeth, that Cassins having spokethese last words vnto him, he bad him farewel, & willed him to come to supper to him the next night following, because it washis birth day. The next morning by breake of day, the fignall of battell was fet out in Brutus & Caffius campe, which was an arming scarler coate; and both the Chieftaines spake together in the midst of their armies. There Cassius began to speake first, and said: The gods grant us O Brutus, that this day we may win the field, and ener after to line all the rest of our life quietly one with another. But sith the gods have so ordained it, that the greatest and chiefest things amongst men are most vncertaine, and that if the battell fall out otherwise to day then we wish or looke for, we shall hardly meet againe, what art thou then determined to doe, to flie, or die ? Brutus answered him, being yet but a yong man, and not ouer greatly experieced in the world: I trust (I knownot how) a certain rule of Philosophy, by the which I did greatly blame and reproue Cato for killing himselse, as being no lawfull nor godly act, touching the gods nor concerning men, valiant; not to giue place and yeeld to divine providence, & not constantly and patiently to take whatsoeuer it pleaseth him to send vs, but to draw backe and flie: but being now in the midst of the danger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it be not the will of God that this battel fall out fortunate for vs, I will looke no more for hope, neither feeke to make any new supply for war againe, but will rid me of this miserable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I gaue vp my life for my countrey in the Iles of March, for the which I shall line in another more glorious world. Cassins fel a laughing to heare what he faid, & imbracing him, Come on then (faid he) let vs go & charge our enemics with this mind. For either we shal conquer, or we shal not need to fearethe conquerors. After this talke, they fell to confultation among their friends for the ordering of the battel. Then Brutus prayed Cassius he might hauethe leading of the right wing, y which menthought was farre meeter for cassius, both because he was the elder man, and also for that he had the better experience. But yet Cassius gaueit him, and willed that Messala (who had charge of one of the warlikest legions they had)should be also in that wing with Brutus. So Brutus presently sent out his horsemen, who were excellently well appointed, and his footmen also were as willing and ready to give charge. Now Antonius men did cast a trench from the marrish by the which they lay, to cut off Cassius way to come to the sea: and Casar, at the least his army stirred not. As for Octanius Cafar himselse, he was not in his campe, because he was sicke. And for his people, they little thought the enemies would have given them battell, but onely have made fome light skirmishes to hinder them that wrought in the trench, and with their darts & slings to have kept them from finishing of their work: but they taking no heed to them that came full vpon them to give them battell, maruelled much at the great noise they heard, that came from the place where they were casting their trench. In the meane time Brutus that led the right wing, sent litle bils to the Colonels and Captaines of private bands, in the which he wrote the word of the battel, and he himselfe riding a horse-backe by all the troupes, did speake to them, and incouraged them to flicke to it like men. So by this meanes very few of them understood what was the word of the battell, and besides, the most part of them neuer taried to haue it told them, but ranne with great furie to affaile the enemies; whereby through this diforder, the legions were maruelloufly fattered and dispersed one from the other. For, first of all Missales legion, and then the next vntothem, went beyond the left wing of the enemies, and did nothing, but glancing by them, ouerthrew some as they went; and so going on further, fell right vpon Casars campe, out of the which (as himselfe writeth in his commentaries) he had bene conneyed away a little before through the counsell and aduice of one of his friends called Marcus Artorius: who dreaming in the night, had a vision appeared vnto him, that commanded Octavius Casar should be caried out of his campe. Infomuch as it was thought he was flaine, because his litter (which had nothing in i)was thrust through and through with pikes and darts. There was great slaughter in this camp. Foramongst others, there were saine two thousand Laced Amonians, who were arrived but euenalitlebefore, coming to aid Cafar. The other also that had not glanced by, but had given acharge full vpon Cafars battell, they eafily made them flie, because they were greatly troubled for the losse of their camp, and of them there were slaine by hand three legions. Then being veryearnest to follow the chase of them that fled, they ran in amongst them hand ouer head into their campe, and Brutus among them. But that which the conquerors thought not of, occasion flewed it vnto them that were ouercome; and that was, the left wing of their enemies left naked and unguarded of them of the right wing, who were straied too farre off, in following of them that were ouerthrown. So they gaue a hot charge vpon them. But, not with standing all the force they made, they could not breake into the middest of their battell, where they found them that recined them, and valiantly made head against them. Howbeit they brake and ouerthrew the leftwing where Cassius was, by reason of the great disorder among them, and also because they hadno intelligence how the right wing had sped. So they chased them, beating them into their campe, the which they spoiled, none of both the Cheftaines being present there. For Antonius sitis reported, to flie the fury of the first charge, was gotten into the next marish: and no man could tell what became of Octavius Cafar, after he was caried out of his campe. Insomuch that octaving there were certaine fouldiers that shewed their swords bloudied, and said that they had slaine casarfaish him, and did describe his face, and shewed what age he was of. Furthermore, the voward and the middest of neutral had already put all their enemies to disher her with and already put all their enemies to disher her with and already put all their enemies to disher her with and already put all their enemies to disher her with and already put all their enemies to disher her with and already put all their enemies to disher her with a disher her middest of Brutus battell had already put all their enemies to flight that with stood them, with the battell great flaughter: so that Brutus had conquered all on his side, and Cassus had lost all on the other of philippes. Ide, For nothing vndidthem, but that Brutus went not to help Castius, thinking he had ouercome forume. them, as himselfe had done; and Cassius on the other side taried not for Brutus, thinking he had beneouerthrowne as himselfe was. And to proue that the victory fell on Brutus side, Messala confirmeth, that they wan three Eagles, and diverse other ensignes of the enemies, and their enemics wan neuer a one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chase, after he had flaine and lacked Celars men, he wondred much that he could not see Casius tent standing vp high as it was wont, neither the other tets of his camp stading as they were before, because all the whole camp had bin spoiled, and the tents thrown downe, at the first coming of their enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whose fight served them better, told him that they saw a great glistering of harnesse, and a number of silvered targets, that went and came into Cassius camp, and were not (as they tooke it) the armors, nor the number of menthat they had left there to guard the camp; and yet that they saw not such a nuber of dead bodies, & great ouerthrow as there should have bin, is many legions had bene staine. This made Brutus at the first mistrust that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the campe of his enemie which he had taken, and caused his men to be sent for that yet followed the chase, & gathered them together, thinking to leade them to aid Casius, who was in this state as you shall heare. First of all he was martiellous genacament angrie to fee how Brutus men ran to give charge vpon their enemies, and taried not for the word errors Bru of the battell, nor commandement to give charge; and it grieved him beside, that after he had ouercome them, his men fell straight to spoile, and were not carefull to compasse in the rest of enemies behind; but with tarying too long also, more then through the valiantnesse or foresight of the Captaines his enemies, Castim found himselfe compassed in with the right wing of his er nemies armie. Wherupon his horfmen brake immediatly, and fled for life towards the fea, Fur caffee yells thermore perceiving his footmen to give ground, he did what he could to keepe them from five ing, and tooke an enfigne from one of the enfigne-bearers that fled, and stucke it fast at his feer. although with much ado he could fcant keepe his owneguard together. So Cassius himselfe was at length compelled to flie, with a few about him, vnto a litle hill, from whence they might east. ly fee what was done in all the plaine howbeit caffins himfelfe faw nothing, for his fight was very bad, fauing that he faw(and yet with much ado)how the enemies spoiled his campe before his eyes. He faw also a great troupe of horsemen, whom Brutus sent to aid him, and thought that they were his enemies that followed him: but yet he fent Titinnius, one of the that was with him: to go and know what they were. Brutus horfemen faw him coming a farre off, whom whenther knew that he was one of Casius chiefeft friends, they shouted out for iou, and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their horfes, and went and embraced him. Thereft compassed him in round about on horsback, with songs of victory & great rushing of their har-The impor- neffe, fo that they made all the field ring again for iov. Butthis marred all. For Cafrus thinking tance of er- indeed that Titimins was taken of the enemies, he then spake these words: Desiring too much toliue. I have lived to fee one of my best friends taken for my sake before my face. After that he got into a tent where no body was, and tooke Pindarus with him, one of his bondmen whom he referred ever for fuch a pinch, fince the curfed battell of the PARTHIANS, where Craffus was flaine-though he notwithstanding scaped from that ouerthrow: but then casting his cloake oner his head, and holding out his bare neck vnto Pindarus, he gaue him his head to be stricken off, So the head was found seuered from the body: but after that time Pindarus was neuer seenemore. Whereupon, some tooke occasion to say that he had slaine his maister without his commandement. By & by they knew the horfmen that came towards them, and might fee Titinius crowned with a garland of triumph, who came before with great speed vnto Cassius. But when he perceined by the cries & teares of his friends which tormented themselues, the misfortune that had chanced to his Captaine Cassius, by mistaking, he drew out his sword, cursing himself a thousand times that he had taried fo long & fo flue himself presently in the field. Brutes in the meanetime came forward fill, and vnderstood also that Casius had bin ouerthrowne: but he knew nothing of his death, till he came very neareto his campe. So when he was come thither, after he hadlameted the death of Calitus, calling him the last of all the Romanes, being vnpossible that Roma should ever breed agains so noble and valiant a man as he; he caused his body to be buried, and fent it to the citic of THASSOS, fearing left his funerals within his campe should causegreat diforder. Then he called his foldiers together, and did encourage them againe. And when he faw that they had loft all their cariage, which they could not brooke well, he promifed enery man of them two thousand Drachmaes in recompence. After his soldiers had heard his oration, they were all of the pretily cheared again, wondring much at his great liberality, & waited vpon him with great cries when he went his way, praifing him, for that he onely of the foure Chiefraines was not our come in battel. And to speake the truth, his deeds shewed that he hoped not invain to be conqueror. For with few legions he had flaine and driven all them away that made head against him: and if all his people had fought, and that the most of them had not outgoin their enemies to runne to spoile their goods, surely it was like enough he had slain them all, and had left neuer a man of them aliue. There were flaine of Brutus fide about eight thousand men, counting the foldiers flaues, whom Brutus called Brigas: and of the enemies fide, as Meffalla writeth, there were flaine as he supposeth, more then twise as many moe. Wherefore they were more discouraged then Brutus, vntill that very late at night, there was one of Cassius men called Demetrius, who went vnto Antonius, and caried his masters cloathes, whereof he were stripped not long before, and his fword also. This encouraged Brutus enemies, and made them so braue, that the next morning betimes they stood in battell ray againe before Brutus. But on Brutus side, both his campes stood watering, and that in great danger. For his owne campe being full of prisoners, required a good guard to looke vnto them: and Cassius campe on the other side tooke the death of their Captaine very heavily; and beside, there was some vile grudge between them that were ouercome, and those that did ouercome. For this cause therefore Brutus did set them in battell ray, but yet kept himselfe from giving battell. Now for the slaves that were prifoners, which were a great number, and went and came to and fro amongst these armed men. thot without suspition: he commanded they should kill them. But for the free men, he sent them freely home, and faid, that they were better prisoners with his enemies, then with him. For with them, they were flaues and feruants: and with him, they were free men and citizens. So when he hw that divers Captains and his friends did so cruelly hate some, that they would by no meanes faue their lines, Brutus himselse hid them, and secretly sentthem away. Among these prisoners, Brutus clethere was one Volumnius a iester, and Sacculio a common player, of whom Brutus made no ac-meney and count at all. Howbeit his friends brought them vnto him, and did accuse them, that though they were prisoners, they did not let to laugh them to scorne, and to iest broadly with them. Brutus made no answer to it, because his head was occupied otherwise. Whereupon Messala Corninus hid, that it were good to whip them on a scaffold, and then to send them naked, well whipped. unto the Captaines of their enemies, to shew them their shame, to keepe such mates as those in their campe, to play the fooles to make them foort. Some that stood by, laughed at his device. But Publius Cafca, that gaue Iulius Cafar the first wound when he was slaine, said then: It doth not become vs to be thus merry at Cassius funerals: and for thee Brutus, thou shalt view what estimation thou madest of such a Captaine thy compeere, by putting to death, or sauing the lives of these blouds, who hereafter will mocke him and defame his memory. Brutus answered againe incholer: Why then do you come to tell me of it, Cafca, and do not your selues what you thinke good! When they heard him fay fo, they tooke his answer for a consent against these poore ynfortunate men, to fuffer them to do what they thought good: and therefore they caried them away, and flue them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promise he had made to the souldiers, and gauethem the two thousand Drachmaes apeece; but yet he first reproued them, because they went and gaue charge vpon the enemics at the first battell, before they had the word of battell giuenthem: and made them a new promise also, that if in the second battel they fought like men. ht would give them the facke and spoile of two cities, to wit, THESSALONICA and LACEDE-HON. In all Brutus life there is but this onely fault to be found, and that is not to be gainefaid: Brutus though Antonius and Octanius Cafar did reward their fouldiers far worse for their victory. For fault wisely when they had driven all y naturall ITALIANS out of ITALY, they gave their foldiers their lands exemped by and townes, to the which they had no right: and moreouer the only mark they shot at in all this warrethey made, was but to ouercome and reigne, Where in contrary maner they had fo great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voice and opinion of the world would not suffer him, neither to ouercome, nor to faue himselfe otherwise then justly and honestly, and specially after Cassius death, whom men burthened, that oftentimes he moued Brutus to great cruelty. But now, like as the mariners on the sea after the rudder of their ship is broken by tempest, do seeke to naile on some other piece of wood in liew therof, and do help themselues to keep them from hurt, as much as may be, vpon that instant danger: euen so Brutus, having such a great army to governe, and his affaires standing very tickle, and having no other Captaine coequall with him indignity and authority, he was forced to imploy them he had; & likewise to be ruled by them inmany things, and was of mind himfelfealfo to grant them any thing, that he thought might make them ferue like noble foldiers at time of need. For Cassius foldiers were very enil to be rukd, and did shew themselues very stubborne and lusty in the camp, because they had no Cheftainethat did command them: but yet rank cowards to their enemies, because they had once ouercome them. On the other fide Octavius Cafar and Antonius were not in much better stage: for first of all they lacked victuals. And because they were lodged in low places, they looked to abide a hard & sharp winter, being camped as they were by the marish side and also for that after the battell, there hadfallen plenty of rain about the autumne, where through, all their tents were ful of mire & dirt, the which by reason of the cold did freeze incontinently. But beside all these discomodities, there came newes vnto them of the great losse they had of their men by sea. For wonderfull Brutus ships met with a great aid and supply of men, which were sent them out of ITALY, and they ouerthrew them in such fort, that there scaped but few of them: and yet they were so famihed, that they were copelled to eat the tackle & failes of their ships. Therupon they were very defirous to fight abattell againe, before Brutus should have intelligence of this good newes for him: for it chanced fo, that the battell was fought by fea, on the felfe fame day it was fought by land. But by ill fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the captains, this victor ty came not to Brutus eare till twenty daies after. For had he knowne of it before, he would not hate bene brought to have fought a fecond battell, confidering that he had excellent good prowas his vi- uision for his army for a long time; and besides, lay in a place of great strength, so as his campe could not greatly be hurt by the winter, nor also distressed by his enemies: and further, he had bin a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by fea, as he was also by land. This would have maruellonfly incouraged him. Howbeit the state of Rome (in my opinion) being now brought to that passes that it could no more abide to be gouerned by many Lords, but required one only absolute Go. uernour: God, to preuent Brutus that it should not come to his gouernment, kept this victory from his knowledge, though indeed it came but a litle too late. For the day before the laft battel was given, very late in the night came Clodius, one of his enemies into his campe, who told that Cafar hearing of the ouerthrow of his army by fea, defired nothing more then to fight a barrell before Brutus vnderstood it. Howbeit they gaue no credit to his words, but despised him so much, that they would not vouchfafe to bring him vnto Brutus, because they thought it but alie denifed, to be the better welcome for this good news. The felfefime night, it is reported that the monstrous spirit which had appeared before vnto Brutus in the city of Sardis, did now appeare againe vnto him in the felf same shape and forme, and so vanished away, and said neuer a word. Now Publius Volumnius, a grave and wife Philosopher, that had bin with Brutus from the beginning of this warre, doth make no mention of this spirit, but faith that the greatest Eagle and enfigue was couered ouer with a swarm of bees, and that there was one of the captains, whose arm fodainly fel a sweating, that it dropped oile of roses fro him, & that they oftentimes went about to drie him, but all would do no good. And that before the battell was fought, there were two Eagles fought between both armies, and all the time they fought, there was a martiellous greats. lence all the vally ouer, both the armies being one before the other, marking this fight between them, & that in the end, the Eagle towards Brutus gaue ouer & fled away. But this is certain, and a true tale, that when the gate of the camp was open, the first man the standard-bearer met that carried the Eagle, was an Athiopian, whom the foldiers for ill luck mangled with their fwords. Now after that Brutus had brought his army into the field, & had fet them in battel ray, directly against the voward of his enemy, he paused a long time before he gaue the signall of battell. For Brutus riding vp & downe to view the bands & companies, it came in his head to mistrust some of the befides, that fome came to tel him fo much as he thought. Moreover, he faw his horsme fer forward but faintly, & did not go luftly to give charge, but fill flaid to fee what the footmen would do. Then fodainly, one of the chiefest knights he had in all his army, called Camulatius, & that was alway maruelloufly effected of for his valiatines, until that time; he came hard by Bratus on horsback, and rode before his face to yeeld him felf vnto his enemies. Brutus was maruellous fory for it: wherfore partly for anger, and partly for feare of greater treason and rebellion, he fadainly caused his army to march, being past three of the clock in the afternoone. So in that place where he himselfe fought in person, he had the better, and brake into the left wing of his enemies; which gaue him way, through the helpe of his horfmen that gaue charge with his footmen, when they faw the enemies in a maze and afraid. Howbeit, the other also on the right wing when the Captaines would have had them to have marched, they were afraid to have bin compassed in behind, because they were fewer in number then their enemies, and therfore did spread themselues, and leave the middest of the battell. Whereby they having weakened themselues, they could not withfrand the force of their enemies, but turned taile ftraight and fled. And those that had put them to flight, came in straight upon it to compasse Bruius behind, who in the middest of the conslict, did all that was possible for a skilful Captaine & valiant soldier, both for his wisdome, as also his hardinesse, for the obtaining of victory. But that which wanne him the victory at the first battel, did now lose it him at the second. For at the first time the enemies that were broken and fled, were ftraight cut in peeces: but at the fecond battell of Cafius men that were put to flight, there were few flaine: and they that faued themselues by speed, being affraid because they had bene our come, did discourage the rest of the army when they came to joyne with them, and filled all the armie with feare and diforder. There was the sonne of Marcui Cato flaine, valiantly fighting among the luftie youth. For notwithstanding that he was very

wearie and ouer-harried, yet would be not therefore flie, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling aloud his name, and also his fathers name, at length he was beaten downe among the many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had flaine round about him. So there were daine in the field, all the chiefest Gentlemen and Nobilitie that were in his armie, who valiantly rune into any danger to faue Brutus life: amongst whom there was one of Brutus friends called The fidelitie of Lucilius, who feeing attoupe of barbarous men, making no reckoning of all men elfe they met in Lucilius pros. their way, but going altogether right against Brutus, he determined to stay them with the hazard of his life; and being left behind, told them that he was Brutus: and because they should beleen him he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he faid he was afraid of Cafar, and that he did mill Antonius better. These barbarous men being very glad of this good hap, and thinking them Glueshappiemen, they caried him in the night, and fent fome before vinto Antonius, to tel him of heir coming. He was maruellous glad of it, and went out to meete them that brought him. Others allo vinderstanding that they had brought Brains prisoner, they came from all parts of the campe to fee him, fome pitying his hard fortune, and others faying, that it was not done the himselfe, so cowardly to be taken aline of the barbarous people, for feare of death. When they came neare together, Antonius staid awhile bethinking himselfe how he should vie Brutus. Inthemeane time Lucilius was brought to him, who with a bold countenance faid: Antonius, I date affure thee, that no enemie hath taken or shall take Marcus Brutus aliue: and I beseech Godkeepe him from that fortune: but wherefoener he be found, aliue or dead, he will be found like himfelfe: and touching my felfe, I am come vnto thee, having deceived thefe men of armes making them beleeve that I was Brutus, and do not refuse to suffer any torment thou wilt numeto. Lucilius words made them all amazed that heard him. Antonius on the other file. looking vpon all them that had brought him, faid vnto them: My friends, I thinke yeare forievouhaue failed of your purpole, and that you think this man hath done you great wrong but laffire you, you have taken a better bootie then that you followed. For in stead of an enemy, voilhage brought me a friend; and for my part, if you had brought me Brutus alive, truly I can notell what I should have done to him. For I had rather have such men as this my friends thinmine enemies. Then he embraced Eucelius, and at that time delivered him to one of his finds in custodie; and Lucilius euer after served him faithfully, even to his death. Now Brus Bruss Sying. Inhauing passed a little river, environed on either side with high rocks, and shadowed with great mes, being then darke night, he went no further, but flaid at the foote of a rocke with certaine of his Captaines and friends that followed him, and looking vp to the firmament that was full of lines, fighting, he reheatled two verses, of the which Volumnius wrote the one, to this effect:

(Olone) escape without due punishment. instith, that he had forgotten the other. Within a little while after, naming his friends that he Appianmental hdleene flaine in battell before his eyes, he fetched a greater figh then before, specially when he this by Antonim ame to name Labio and Flauius, of whom the one was his Lieutenant, and the other Captaine othepioners of his camp. In the meane time one of the company being thirstie, and seeing Bruwhirstie also, he ran to the river for water, and brought it in his sallet. At the same time they hard a noise on the other fide of the river: whereupon Volumnius tooke Dardanus, Brutus servant mihim, to see what it was: and returning straight againe, asked if there were any water left, Bra-Is smiling, gently told him, All is drunke, but they shall bring you some more. Thereupon he Inthim againe that went for water before, who was in great danger of being taken by the enemics, and hardly scaped, being fore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought there were not many of his men slaine in battell : and to know the truth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promiled to go through his enemies, for otherwife it was impossible to go see their campe: and thereupon if all were well, he would lift vp a torch-light in the aire, and then returne againe with feed to him. The torch-light was lift up as he had promifed, for Statilius went thither: and good while after Brutus feeing that Statilius came not againe, he said: If Statilius be aluc, he will come againe. But his euill fortune was such, that as he came backe, he fell into his The death of themies hands and was flaine. Now the night being far fpent, Brutus as he fate bowed towards Statilius. citus one of his men, and told him fomewhat in his eare: the other answered him not, but fell a weeping. Thereupon he proued Dardanus, and faid somewhat also to him: and at last he came to Volumnius himself, and speaking to him in Greeke, prayed him for the studies sake which brought

Volumnius denied his request, and so did many others: and amongst the rest, one of them faid, there was no tarrying for them there, but they must needs flie. Then brutus ri-Brotus faying of ing vp, laid, We must flie indeed, but it must be with our hands, not with our feet. Then taking enery man by the hand, he faid these words vnto them with a chearefull countenance: Itreiow ceth my heart, that not one of my friends hath failed me at my need, and I do not complaine of my fortune, but onely for my countries fake: for as for me, I thinke my felfe happier then they that have our come, considering that I leave a perpetual fame of versue and honestie, the which our enemies the conquerors shall never attaine vnto by force or money; neither can let their posteritie to say, that they being naughtie and vniust men, haue slaine good men, to vsure tyrannicall power not pertaining to them. Hauing so said, he prayed enery man to shift for him. felfe, and then he went a litle afide with two or three onely, among the which Strate was one, with whom he came first acquainted by the Audie of Rhetoricke. He came as neare to him as he Could, and taking his fword by the hilt with both his hands, and falling downe vpon the point of it ranne himselfe through Others say, that not he, but Strato (at his request) held the sword in his hand, and turned his head aside, and that Brutus fell downe vpon it, and soran himselfe through, and died presently. Mesala, that had bene Brutus great friend, reconciled afterwards to Offanins Calars friend, and shortly after, Calar being at good leifure, he brought Strate, Brutus friendyn. to him, and weeping faid: Cafar, behold, here is he that did the last service to my Brutus. Then Calar received him, and afterwards he did him as faithfull service in all his affaires, as any GRECIAN else he had about him, untill the battel of Activm. It is reported also that this Messale himselfe answered Cafar one day, when he gaue him great praise before his face, that he had fought valiantly, and with great affection for him at the battell of Activm, (not with flanding that he had bene his cruell enemie before, at the battell of PHILIPPES, for Brains fake) Leuerlo. ued, faid he, to take the best and justest part. Now Antonius having found Brutus bodie, he caused ir to be wrapped vp in one of the richest coate-armors he had. Afterwards also, Antonius vnderstanding that this coate-armor was stolen, he put the thiefe to death that had stolen it, and sent the ashes of his body vnto Seruilia his mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife, Nicolaus the Philo-Sopher, and Valerius Maximus do write, that the determining to killher felfe (her parents and friends carefully looking to her to keepe her from it) tooke hote burning coles and east theminto her mouth, and kept her mouth fo close, that she choked her selfe. There was a letter of Brutus found written to his friends, complaining of their negligence, that his wife being ficke, they wold not helpe her, but suffered her to kill her selfe; chusing to die, rather then to languish in paine, Thus it feemeth that N icolans knew not well the time, fith the letter (at the least if it were Brutus letter) doth plainly declare the disease and loue of this Ladie, and also the manner of her death. Service of the content

THE COMPARISON OF Dion and Brutus.

DIUN AND BEVIVE

e brita de como como como de la como la la como en el como de la c Of Come now to compare thele two noble personages vitir is certained that both of them having great gifts in them, namely this for the first that by finall occasions they made themselves great men herein both described the chiefe praise for he had no colhesper to bring him the chiefe praise for he had no colhesper to bring him vito that greatnesses as Brutus had of Castius, who doubtlesses was not comparable vnto him for wertue and respect of honour, though otherwise in matters of warre; he was no lessewise and valiant then he. For many do impute vnto Cassius, the first beginning and oris ginall of all the warre and enterprife; and faid it was he that did encous rare Brutus to confpire Cafars death : whereas Dion furnished himselfe with armor, ships, and fouldiers, and wanne those friends and companions also that did helpe him to prosecute his warre. Nor he didnot as Brutus, who rose to great nesselve his enterprises, and by warre got all his strength and riches; but he in contrary manner, spent of his owne goods to make warre for the libertie of his countrie, and disbursed of his owne money that should have kept him in his banishment: Furthermore, Brutus and Cassius were compelled of necessitie to make warres because they could not have lived safely in peace when they were driven out of ROME, for that they were condemned to death, and purfued by their enemies. And for this cause therefore they were driven to hazard themselves in warre, more for their owne safetie, then for the libertie of their countrie: whereas Dion on the other fide, living more merrily and fafely in his banifly ment, then the tyrant Dionnius himselfe that had banished him, did put himselfe to that danger? to deliuer Sicile from bondage. Now the matter was not alike vnto the Romanes, to be delivered from the government of Cafar, as it was for the Syndevs and to be rid of Dionyfing tyrannie. For Dionifius denied not, that he was a tyraur, hauing filled Stelle with fuch miles rieand calamitie. Howbeit, the domination of Cefex when it came to be established, did indeed much hurt at the first beginning thereof vnto those that opposed against it but afterwards, unto them that being overcome had received his government, it feemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a tyranr, then other wife that he was founded. For there never followed any tyrannicall or cruell act, but contrarily, it seemed that he was a mercifull Physician, who he Godhad ordained official grace to be Goudmont of the Empire of Rosin, and to let all things againe at quiet flay, the which required the nonnfell and anthoritie of an absolute Prince. And therefore the Roman s were margellous for it for Cefar after he was flaine and afterwards wold never pardon them that had haine him. For after he had loft the battell, it was impossible for him eyer to rife againe; and therefore his heart failedhim, and fo gaue vo. all, and never durft firing with his euill fortune as Pompey did, confidering that he had present cause enough in the field to hope of his ouldiers and being befide a dreadfull Lord all the fea ouer, Furthermore, the greatest reproch they could object against Brutus, was, that Julius Cafar having faued histife, and pardoned for many prifoners taken in battell, according to his request, taking him for his friend, and honouring him aboue all his other friends, Brutus notwithstanding had imbrued his hands in his bloud wherewith they could never reprodue Dion. For on the contrarie fide to long as Dion was Dio. ny fine friend and kinfeman, he did alway helpehim to order and gouerne his affaires. But after he was banished his countrey, and that his wife was forcibly maried to another man, and his goods also taken from him then he entred into inst and open warres against Dionylius the tyrant But in In what things this point they were contrary together. For that wherein their chiefest praise consisted, towit. the hatred of tyrants and wicked men, was most true and fincere in Brutus. For having no priuate cause of complaint or grudge against Cafar, he ventured to kill him, onely to set his countrie againe at libertie: whereas if Dion had not received private cause of quarrell against Dionysius. he would never have made warre with him. The which Plate proueth in his Epifiles, where is plainely seene, that Dion being driven out of the tyrants court against his will, and not putting himselfe to voluntarie banishment, he draue out Dionysius. Furthermore, the respect of the com. monwealth caused Brutus, that before was Rompers enemy to become his friend, and enemy voto Calar that before was his friend, onely referring his friendfhip and enmitte ynto the confideration of inflice and equitie. And Dion did many things for Diony fine fake and benefit all the while he trufted him: and when he began to miltrust him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherefore all his friends beleeved, that after he had driven out Dionyfus, he would fiablish the government on himselfe, abusing the people with a more courted and gentle title then the name of a tyrant. But for British his very enemites themselves consessed, that of all those that configured Gefars death, he onely had no other end and intent to attempt his enterprise, but torefore the Empire of Rome against o her former state and government. And furthermore it was not a like thing to deale with Dionyfus, as it was to have to do with Isline Cafar. For no man that knew Dionylius, but would have despited him considering that he spent the most part of his time in drinking, dicing, and haunting leud womens companie: but to haue vindertaken to deftroy Iulius Cafar, and not to have farunke backe for feare of his great wifedome, power, and fortune, confidering that his verie name was dreadfull vnto enery man, and fuffered not the kings of PARTHE A and INDIA to be in rest for him: this could not come but of a maruellous noble mind of him that for feare neuer fainted, nor let fall any part of his courage. And therefore, fo foone as Dioncame into Sicile, many thousands of men came and so yield with him against Dionyliu. But the fame of Inline Cafar did fet up his friends againe after his death, and was of flich force, that it raised a yong stripling Octavius Cefar (that had no meanes nor power of himselfe) to be one of the greatest men of Rome and they yield him as a remedie to encounter Antonius malice. and power. And if men will fay, that Dion draue out the tyrant Dionysius by force of armes, and fundrie battels: and that in contrarie maner Brutus flue Gafar, being a naked man, and without guard then do I answer againe, that it was a noble part, and of a wife Captaine, to church apt a time and place to come vpon a man of so great power, and to find him naked without his guard. For he went not findenly in a rage and alone or with a small companie to affaile him bût his enterprife was long time before determined of and that with divers men, of all the which, not a man of them once failed him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he chose them monest mensor else that by his choise of them he made them good men. Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wife choise in trusting of early men, or else because he could not tell how to vie them he had chosen, of good men he made them become euill: fo that neither the one nor the other could be the part of a wife man. For Plate himselfe reproducts him, for

For at MILLAN (a citie of GAYLE on ITALIE bienefide) there was an image of his in braffe, very like vnto him: the which Cafar (afterwards passing his death that way) beheld very aduifedly, for that it was made by an excellent workman, and was very like him; and fo went his way. Then he stayed sodainly againe, and called for the Gouernours of the citie, and before them all told them, that the citizens were his enemies, and traitours vnto him. because they kept an enemie of his among them. The Gouernours of the city at the first mage or were aftonied at it, and fourly denied it: and none of them knowing what enemie he meant, ding in one of them looked on another. Ottavius Cafar then turning him vnto Brutus statue, bending his brasse at hrowes, faid vnto them: This man you fee standing vp here, is he not our enemie. Then the Gonernours of the citie were worse afraid then before, and could not tell what answer to make him. But Cafar laughing and commending the GAVLES for their faithfulnesse to their friends, even kept by in their aduer sities, he was contented Brutus image should stand still as it did.

THE LIFE OF Aratus.

HRISTPPVS the Philosopher (my friend Polycrates) being afraid as it feemeth, of the cuill found of an ancient prouerbe, not rightly as it was spoken, and in vse, but as he thought it best, he wrote in this manner:

What children do their ancestors commend, But those whom fortune fauours to the end?

But Diony sodorus TROEZENIAN reprouing him, doth rehearse the prouerbe rightly as indeed it is:

What shildren do their ancestors commend, But those whose life is vertuous to the end?

Saying, that this prouerbe stoppeth their mouthes, who of themselues are vnworthy of praise, and yet are still boasting of the vertues of their ancestors, whose praise they highly extoll. But before those that (as Pindarus saith)

it is no small good hap for them, often to remember the noble deeds of their parents in hearing them fooken of, or otherwise for themselues oftentimes to remember some notable doings of their parents. For in them, it is not for lacke of commendable vertues, that they report others praife and glory: but in joyning their owne vertues to the vertues of their anceftors, they do in crease their glory, as inheriting their vertuous life, as challenging their discent by bloud. brought vp at home by the example of their ancestors, whose deeds shall lie before them to follow. For he loueth himselfe more then he regardeth perfect vertue or his credite, that thinketh himselfe so perfect, as that he need not follow any others example. The citie of Sicyons, after it fell from her first gouernment of the Optimacie and Nobili. tic, which is proper to the citie of the Dorians, like an inftrument out of tune, it fell into of the Sugre-civill warres and feditious practifes, through the Orators of the people: and neuer ceaffed to be plagued with those troubles and miseries, alway changing new tyrants, vntill that Clean being flaine, they chose Timeclidas and Clinias their Gouernours, two of the noblest men and of great test authoritie in all the citie. Now when the common-wealth beganne to grow to a certaine flate of Gouernment, Timoclidas died: and Abantidas the sonne of Pascas, pretending to make himselfe Lord of the city, he flue Clinias, and put to death some of his parents and friends. draue away others, and foughtalfoto puthis fonne Aratus to death, that was then butfeuen yeares old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers house, among them that ranne away, and wandring vp and downe the city, being scared and afraid, finding shehand of no man to helpe him, by good fortune he got into a womans house, called Sofo, which was Abantidas fifter, and wife vnto Periphantus, his father Clinias brother. She being of a noble mind, and judging that the child Aratus by Gods providence fled vnto her, hid him inher house, and in the night secretly sent him vnto the city of Argos. Now after that Aratus had Aratas ma. scaped, and was fafe from this danger, from that time there bredin him a vehement malice against tyrants, the which still increased in him as he grew in yeares. So he was vertuously brought vp in the city of Ar Gos, with his fathers friends; and perceiuing with himfelfethat he waxed bigge and ftrong, he disposed his bodie to divers exercises, and became so excellent in them, that he contended in five manner of exercises, and oftentimes bare the best away. And in his images and statues, he appeared in face full and well liking, as one that fed well, and the maiestie of his countenance argueth that he vsed such exercise: and such commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not give himselfe so much to pleading, as peraduenture was requifite for a Gouernour of a commonwealth. Howbeit, some do judge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an cloquenter tongue then feemed vnto some: because he wrote them in hafte, having other businesse in hand, and even as things came first into his mind. But afterwards, Dinias and Aristotle Logician flue Abantidas, who did commonly vseto fit in the market place, to heare their matters, and to talke with them. And this gaue them good meanes and opportunitie to worke their feat they did. After Abantidas death, his father Paleas possessed the tyrannie, whom Nicocles afterwards flue also by treason, and made himselfe tyrantinhis place. It is reported that this Nicocles did lively refemble the countenance of Periander, the foune of Cypfelus, as Orontes Persian was very like vnto Alemaon, the fonne of Amphiaraus: and another young Laced Emonian, vnto Hetter of Troia, whom Myrfillus writeth, was troden vnder mens feer, through the ouer-great preasse of people that came to see him, when they heard of it. This Nicocles was tyrant foure moneths together, in the which he did wonderful great hurt to the citie, and had almost lost it; the Atolians coming on a sodaine, who were like to have taken it. Now Aratus was come to the state of a stripling, and was greatly esteemed for the noble house he came of, and also for the great courage they found in him, which was no finall matter: and befides that, he had a maieftie in his countenance, being wifer then was looked for in a young man of his yeares: therefore the banished men from the city of Signon, repaired vnto him before any other man. Nicocles for his partallo was not carelesse of his doings, but had an eye euer to see what Arasus intended, although he little mistrusted any such bold enterprise, nor so dangerous an exploit of him: but did onely coniecture that he did stirre up the kings which had bene his dead fathers friends. And fo Aratus goindeed Aratustooke that course. But when he saw that Antigonus still delayed his promises, and to deliver did alwaies tract time, and that the hope of aid from king Ptolomy of AGYPT was so farre off, his country at length he determined to vindertake to destroy the tyrant himselfe. So he first consulted with fourthety Aristomachus and * Ecdetus; of the which the one was banished from Sicyone, and the other "In another an Arcadian, from the city of Megalipolis, a Philosopher, and a valiant man of his hands Place the cal and had bene scholer to Arcesilans the Academicke, in the citie of ATHENS. These two men Edomis, heing contented to lovne with Aratus, he practifed with other of the banished men also: of the Aristonean which there were fomethat were ashamed, not to be partakers of his hope and noble attempt, Edelus, do and so did also io yne with him. Howbeit the most part of them did not onely refuse to enter into that practife, but further, went about to diffwade Aratus from his enterprife, faying: that for Araus. lacke of knowledge and experience, he understood nor the danger in undertaking such a matter, altogether fo valikely. Now as Aratus was thinking in his mind to keepe a certaine place in the territory of Sycione, from whence they might make warre with the tyrant, there came a priformer ynto them out of the city of Ar Gos, that had broken prison from the tyrant of Sicyon B and was brother vnto Xenocles one of the banished men. He being brought by the same Xenocles vnto. Aratus told that in the place whereby he faued himselfe, the ground within was almost as high as the top of the wall, the which in that partioyned vnto high stony places; and that without the wall the height was not fo great, but that it was eafily fealable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he fent two of his men, South as and Technon, with Xenocles to view the wall, being determined if it were true rather to proue fecretly to execute his pretended enterprife, & quicklyto put it to a venture; then to begin a long warre, and to prepare an open army, he being a prinate ma, to go against the power of a tyrant. Xenoeles being returned again to Aratus, after he had measured the height of the wall, he reported that the place was not vnscalable, but yet very hard to come to it vindifcourred, because of certain little curft curres a gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would never leave barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leave off his enterprise to. Now it was not strange to see every man prepare themselves of armour and weapon, because at that time there were great robberies and cruell murthers committed by high wayes, and one would affault another; but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a carpenter and maker of engines, did not flicke to make them openly, because his common occupation did take away all suspicion why they were made. For this carpenter was himselfe also a banished man from Sicron E as the refiduewere. Furthermore, Arains friends he had in An Gos, of those few men they had, did enery Arains preman of them lend him ten men, and armed thirty of his owne men; befides them, Aratus him- paraties to felfe also did hire some prety number of foldiers, by the practise of Xenophilus, whom the Captaines of the theenes did furnish. They were given to understand that they should be led to the transp. territorie of Sievon E totake a prey of cattell and colts of the King, and they were fent before, some one way, some another, with commandement, all to meet together at the tower of Polygnotus, where they should tarie. So he fent Capbellin also before, without any weapons. with four companions with him: who should come to this gardiners house in the night. like firangers and trauellers, to lie in his house, and to lock him vp and his dogges, because they had no other device to get in but that way. But in the meane time, there were certaine spials of Ni- drain poweles the tyrant discourred, that walked vp and downe the city (making no countenance of any licito dematter) to fee what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his house early in the mor- eles spirals, ming (as his maner was) and walked to the market place with his friends. Then he went to the flew place (or place of exercises) and there stripped himselfe, annointed him, and wrestled, and in the end tooke certaine of the yong gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merry, and to paffe the time away with him: and immediatly after, one of his feruants was feene in the market place carying garlands of flowers, another was feen also buying of links & torches, and another hiring of these common dancing and finging women, which follow feasts and banquets with their instrumers. Nicocles spials seeing that, were deceived, for one of them laughing on another faid, that they might eafily fee by that, there was nothing more fearefull and timorous then a tyrant confidering that Nicocles being Lord of fo great a city, was afraid of a young stripling, that spent all that he could rap and rend to keep him in his banishment, upon vaine bankets and feasts at noone daies. And thus were the tyrants spials finely mocked. Aratus self deparred immediatly after dinner out of Ar Gos, and went ynto the foldiers, whom he had appointed before to meet him at the tower of Polignorus, and led them straight vnto Nemea. There he told them openly his full intent & purpose; having before made an Oration vnto them to incourage them, and also made them maruellous faire promises. Then he gaue them for their watch-word Apollo fauorable, and so went directly to the city of Sicyons, marching with great speed at the first because of the going downe of the Moone, and afterwards slackned his pace a little, so that they had Moone-light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not downe, vntill they were come to the gardiners house that was hard by the wall. So Caphesias, whom he had sent before, vnto the gardiners house, came to meet with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, because they ranne away; how beit that he had made fast the gardiner in his ownehouse. This discouraged the most part of all the companie, who would needs have him in any case to returne backe againe. But Aratus then beganne to comfort them, and promised that he would leade them backe againe, if it chanced that the dogges were too bufic with them. and therewithall presently caused the ladder men to go before, whom Ecdelus and Mnasithus led, and he himselfe came faire and softly after. The dogges made a foule barking, and werebaiof his count ting about Ecdelus and his company. This notwithstanding they came safe to the wall and did fet vp their scaling ladders. But euen as the first mengot vp on them, the Captaine of the watch of Nicelo. that had given place to him that should ward in the morning, came by chance, and passed hard by them, visiting the foldiers with a little bell, and there was a number of torches, & a great noise of men that followed him. They that were vpon the ladders hearing them, ducked downe. and ftirred not and thereby the foldiers that passed by them, could not see them. But now the new morning warch came toward them also, which did put them in great danger to be discoursed. but yet they once againe scaped them, and were not discouered, because the second watch went beyond them, and stayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnastbeus immediatly scaled the wall, and sent Technon with all possible speed vnto Aratus, to will him to make all the hast he could to come to them. Now there was no great distance betwixt the garden where the dogs were, and the walland a litle tower where they kept a great greyhound to keepe watch: but the greyhound neuer heard their coming, either because he was a cowardly curre of nature, or else for that he had bin ouer-coursed and wearied the day before. But the gardiners litle curres that baulled and barked beneath, had wakened the greyhound with their barking, who at the first began to answer them with a foft girning; but when they came by the tower where he lay, he barked out aloud, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Infomuch that the skout which was farther off, called aloud to the hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made fuch a barking and whether there were any thing stirring or not that angred him. The hunt within the tower answer red, that it was nothing, but that his dog was naked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that passed by, and at the noise of the bell. This made Aratus soldiers a great dealethe bolder: because they thought that the hunt had bene made privile to their enterprise, and that he went about to hide their secretattempt, and hoped also that there were many other within thecitie that would further their enterprise. When they came to get vp vpon the wall, it was of a great height and very dangerous, because the ladders shooke and bowed, by reason of the weight of the men, vnlesse they did come vp faire and softly one after another. Furthermore, the time did put them in some perill, because the cockes began to crow, and the countrie folke that brought things to the market to fell, began to come apaceto the towne out of every quarter. And therefore Arasus made haste to get vp, having onely fortic men aboue with him, and looked for some besides to come vp, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly toward the tyrants pallace, where his hired fouldiers kept watch and ward: and coming fodainly vpon them, laid hold of enery man of them, and flue not one. Then he fent into the citie to his friends, to will them to come vnto him. Thereupon they ranne out of euery corner to Aratus. Now the day began to break, and straight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, because of the noise and stirre they heard in the citie, not knowing what the matter meant, vntill at length an Herald proclaimed with open voice that it was Aratus the sonne of Clinias who called his countrymen and citizens to the recouery of their liberty. Then they perswading themselues that the thing which they long wished and looked for, was now come to passe, they ranne all in a troupe together to the tyrants house, and set it on fire. But the flame rose so high and great after the fire hadtaken it in euery part, that it was seene to the citie of Corinth: insomuch that the Co-RINTHIANS Wondering what the matter should be, were in minde to have gone to helpe it.

Now for Nicocles, he faued himfelfe, and got out of the city by fecret vaults he had made under Nicoclastic the ground. The fouldiers on the other fide quenching the fire with the helpe of the citizens, syen fitdid facke all they found in the tyrants pallace; the which Aratus hindred not, but did moreover make all the rest of the tyrants goods common amongst them. So his enterprise had so good succeffe, that there was none of his owne company flaine he brought with him, neither any of their rnemics that were within the city fortune kept this exploit so pure and cleane from any bloudthed. Then Aratus restored sources men vnto their lands and goods againe, whom the tyrant Witcoles had banished; and others also, that had bene banished by former tyrants, to the number of fine hundred men, who had bene wel-neare fiftie yeares space banished out of their countrey. Now the most of them being come home poore and needle, would have entred on their goods and lands they enjoyed before; and for entring againe vpon their lands in their countrey. and their houses in the citie, they amazed Aratus withall seeing Antigonus on the one side pradife all the meanes he could to winne Sicyon B being now free, and they all in an yprore and mutinic in the citie. Therefore, following the best counsell he could thinke you and deuise, confidering the danger of the present time: he joyned the citie in league and friendship with the Achaians, and of them all made but one body. And because the Citizens of Sicyon E isynetitie were DORIANS, they were glad to submit themselves to be governed & protected by the name in ofsiof the Achaians, who were atthat time of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in little to the state villages, and had no great bounds of lands, neither were they very speciall good; for that they chaining flood vpon the feafide, where was no maner of hauen nor port, but flones, & rocks good flore: and the fea beating vpon them, did eate into the maine land. This not with standing, they made their enemies know, that the power of GRECE when it was vnited & gouerned by good policy. was of great force & almost inuincible. For the Achaian's being in comparison of the ancient force of GRECE, of no regard, and but a part of one city enfectled with civill & forraine warre; folong as they could fubmit themselves to be ruled by the wisdome and vertue of their Captaine, and not enuy nor malice his prosperitie & sourraigney; they did not only maintaine themfelues as free men, in the middeft of the service of so many great ciries, large and mighty, but didalfo deliuer many other people of GRECE from their try rants. Now, for Aratus maners : he was one that by nature loued civill government, and equity among citizens in one felfe citie: he was nobly minded, and more painefull about the affaires of the commonweale, then carefull of drawn rehis owne businesse, and hated tyrants to the death, & imployed his good or enill will wholy for the service of the commonwealth. And therfore he seemed not to be so sound a friend, as he was agentle and mercifull enemy: framing himfelfe in either of both, as time ferued for the comonwealth. To be flort, it was a generall and common voice among all the cities confederates, in prinate company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loued nothing but vertue. and honestic that in open wars he was not so valiant & couragious, and he was crafty and subtle to take a citie on the sudden. Furthermore, though he was valiant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he wold neuer hane brought to passe; it seemeth he left many things possible vndone the which he might easily have done, for that he durst not venture on them. For as there be beafts whose fight is perfect by night, and by day they can see nothing, because the Subtilitie of the humor and moisture in their eyes is dried up, & cannot abide the bright light of feelest by the day: euen so, men that otherwise by nature are very wise, are easily afraid of danger, when not by day. they must venter on it at noone dayes: where contrarily they are bold in fecret enterprises, suddeally to attempt any thing. Now this contrariety and difference in men well brought vp grow- range eththrough ignorance & lacke of instruction in Philosophy, which of it selfe doth nourish vertue, as fruit that fpringeth vp without planting, or helpe of mans hand. But this is best discerned vnto owler. by examples. So Aratus having joyned hinfelfe and his city Sicyone vnto the Achaians, and ferning in person as a man of armes among the rest, he was maruellously beloued of his Generals, that faw him fo obedient. For, not with standing, that he had made so large a contribution as the estimation of himself, and the force of his city vnto the commonwealth of the Achaians: yethe was as ready to obey & execute the commandements of the Generals, as the poorest and meanest foldier, were he of DYMA or of TRITA, or of any other small village what soeuer. Furthermore, a great fumme of money being fent him from king Ptolomy for a gift, amounting to twentie and fine talents, he tooke it, but forthwith disposed it amongst his poore countriemen, both to relieue their want as also to redeeme prisoners. This notwithstanding the banished men fill vexed and troubled them that had their goods and lands, to have them out of their hands; and otherwise would be satisfied by no meanes. Their commonwealth therefore being ingreat danger to fall into civill war, Aratus perceiving there was no other way to helpe this mischiefe. but by Ptolomies liberalitie: he determined to go vnto him, to pray him to helpe him with money to pacific this grudge and tumult. So he embarked at the hauen of Methona, aboue the foreland of Malea, to faile from thence into AGYPT: howbeit he had fuch a contrary wind and the fear rofe to high, that the mafter of the ship, was drive to let her go whither she would to take sea roome. So being driven quite from his direct course, with great danger he got to the city of ADRIA, which was his enemy because Antigonus kept it, and had a garrison in it. But Aratus did wifely preuent it, going ashoare, and wandred farre from the sea, with one of his friends cal. led Timanthes, and got into a wood, whereby they had an euill nights rest. He had not gone far after he had left his ship, but the Captaine of the garrison came, and sought for him. Notwithstanding, his servants had mocked him finely (being before instructed by Aratus what answer they should make,) faying that he was gone, and fled into the Ile of EVBOEA. Howbeit, the Captaine of the garrifon Rayed the ship, his men, and all things else she had in her, and tooke her for a good prize. Within few daies after Aratus being maruelloufly troubled, & at a straight with himselfe what he should do, there happily arrived a Romaine ship hard by the place where he kept most partly to hide himselfe, and partly also to see if he could discover any thing, This ship was bound for Syria. So he had dealt with the master of the ship in that fort, that he tooke him aboord, and promifed he would deliuer him in CARIA, and so he did. But he was in as much danger this fecond journey againe by fea, as he was in the first he made towards Æ-GYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Aratus went into AGYPT, and spake with the king, who made very much of him: for Aratus fed him still by sending him passing faire tables, and pictures of GRECE, of excellent workmanship. And indeed having a firgular good wit, healwaies gottogether, and brought the excellent off painted pictures he could get, but specially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus to fend them vnto the king. For learning flourished yetin the city of Sicyone, and they esteemed the painting of tables in that city, to be the perfectest for true colours and fine drawing, of all other places. Infomuch as Apelles (though he was then of a maruellous fame for painting) went thither, & gaue to the setwo excellent painters a talent, to remaine a while in their copany not fo much to attaine to the perfection of the art, as therby to win himselfe same. And therfore when Aratus had restored his city againe to liberty, he caufed all the Images of the tyranes to be defaced and plucked downe; how beit he ftood doubtfull along time, whether he should deface Aristratus picture, or not, who reigned in the time of Philip. For he was painted with the hands of all the scholers of Melanthus, being by a triumphant chariot, that caried a victory, & as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a passing peece of worke to see to, so that Aratus at the first yeelded, and was contented to faue it for the excellency of the workmanship; yet in the end, ouercome with the extreme hate he bare vnto tyrants, he bad it should be defaced. Now it is reported also, that Nealess the painter, being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the teares in his eyes to pardon such a notable peece of work. But when he faw Aratus fo hard hearted that he would not grant it he told him, it was good reason to make war with tyrats, but not with their pictures. Let vs then (quoth he) leave the chariot of triumph and victory, and I will make thee fee Aristratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was contented to let him haue his will. Then Nealces defaced the picture of Aristratus, and in place thereof drew onely a palme tree, and durst adde nothing elle to it of his own deuice. Some fay, that under the chariot were conneyed Arifer atus feet defaced. So Aratus by meanes of these tables and pictures, was maruellously well be loued of king Ptolomy, But after he was acquainted with him, & knew his conversation, he loved him then better then before. Infomuch that he gaue him a hundred and fiftietalents to helpe his citie withall of the which, he caried forty away with him vnto Peloponnesvs, and the king afterwards fent him the rest at sundrietimes. Now this was a maruellous matter of him to get such a masse of money together for his citizens:confidering that the Orators, Captaines and Gouernors of free cities, for a litle fumme of money only which they hauetaken of kings & princes, haue bin corrupted & betrayed their townes & countrey. But this was a more wonder, that by means of this money he made peace and loue betwixt the poore and rich; and furthermore, faued vpright all the people of Sicyone, where he shewed himself maruellous wise and temperate, being of that oveat power & authority he was. For after they had chosen him arbitrator to judge, compound and absolutely to decide all quarels and strife betweene the banished men, he would never vndertake it himselfe alone, buttooke fifteene other of the chiefest citizens with him; and with temperate. them, by great paines and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his citizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore not only all the inhabitants and citizens. of Sicyone together, decreed publike honors meete for him, but also the banished men themselues did prinately cast his image in brasse, and set it vp, vnder the which they caused this inscription to be grauen:

Thy prowesse and thy feats of armes, thy counsell sage and wife, Not onely are among the Greekes extolled to the skies. But also to the vimost straights of Marroke blowne by fame. And we that through thy goodne (e home into our countrey came, Haue set this image up to thee Aratus, as a signe Of our delin' rance through thy loue, and through the power dinine.

Aratus having done all these things, he suppressed the envie of the cirizens, through the great good turnes he had done vnto them. But then king Antigonus being angrie with Aratus in his mind, and seeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be mistrusted of Ptolomie, he did him many other great courtefies, Aratus neuer feeking them at his hands. But one day specially about the rest, as he did sacrifice vnto the gods at Contain, he sent Aratus part of his weathers he had facrificed, vnto Sicyone. And at the feaft of his facrifice in y hearing of many noblemen that were bidden guests, he said openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this yong Si-CYONIAN could not but have a liberall mind, louing the liberty of his country and countrimen: but I perceiue now he is a man that can judge of Princes maners and affaires. For heretofore he made no account of vs, because his hope was out of his countrey, and he greatly esteemed the riches of ÆGYPT, hearing talke of formany Elephants, of fuch agreat fleet of ships, and of such assumptuous Court, as king Ptolomies Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it isonely but a smoake and vaine pompe, he is come to vs: and for my part, he is welcome to me, and I wil haue youal to take him for my friend. These words of king Antigonus, were straight taken at bound of certaine enuious men, and caried for lacke of better matter vnto king Ptolomy, euery man striuing who should write all the cuill they could against him: so that Ptolomie thereupo sent a messenger of purpose vnto him, to reprouc him for it. Thus fell there out much enuy and malice, betweene the earnest loue of these Princes and Kings, that contended with each other who should have Aratus. Furthermore, the first time that Aratus was chosen Lieutenant ge- ing in his nerall of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, he forraged and spoiled the country of LOCRIDE, which fiff Preseleth directly over against ACHAIANS, he forraged and spoiled the country of LOCRIDE, which for ships to the source of the country of Locride to the source of the country of Locride to the source of the country of Locride to the c lieth directly oner against Achara, and Calydonia also. Howbeithe came nortime inough to aid the Bosorians, in the battel which they loft before the city of CHERONEA, against the Atolians: where Abaccrisus, gouernour of Boforia was flaine in the field, with a thoufand other BOEOTIANS. Howbeit the next yeare following, he being the second time chosen Lieutenant generall, he attempted to winne the castell of Corint againe, being an enterprise which not only concerned the private benefit of SICYONE it felfe, and the tribe of the ACHAI-ANS, but also of all GRECE besides. For, he was fully bent to drive the garrison of the MACE-DONIANS thence, the which feemed even a very yoke that held all the GRECIANS nofes to the grindstone. For like as Chares, Captaine of the ATHENIANS, having in a certaine conflict discomfitted the kings Lieutenants, wrote vnto § ATHENIANS, that had won a victory halfe sister to the victory of Marathon: even so me thinks it were no disgrace to say, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrats, which was done by Pelopidas THEBAN, and Thrasphulus ATHENIAN; fauing that this last act was more famous, because it was not against GRECTANS, but amongst strangers and forceine power and gouernment, vpon who it was executed. For the Ishmus or barre of Peloponnesvs, which separateth the sea Ageum from the sea Ionium, doth come and ioyne the firme land of the rest of GRECE with the PRES-CHE an Iland of PELOPONNESVS. Euen so likewise the mountaine called Acrocorinth, on the Peloponnewhich the castel standers, rising vp in the middest of GRECE, when there is any garrison of men of war in it, it cutteth offall traffike and passageby, of any armies of them which inhabit within

So that it was not for sport, but for truth, and in good earnest, that Philip the yong king of MACEDON was wont to call the citie and castell of CORINTH the stockes and gives of GRECE. And therfore was this castel marvellously wished and defired of euery man, but specially of Kings and Princes. But the defire Antigonus had of it was so vehement, that it differed nothing from the passions of a franticke louer. For he did nothing else continually but study and deuise how he might winne it vpon the sudden, from them that kept it : because otherwise by open force, it was impossible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that castell, being poisoned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practisthe castellbeing left in the hands of his wife Nicaa, who gouerned the state of Corinth, & did carefully cause the Acrocorinth to be kept, he immediatly sent his sonne Demetrius thither, and put Nices in good hope to marry her with this yong Prince: a thing that pleased this Lady well. hough she was very old So, for her felfe she was wonne straight, by meanes of his yong some t emetrius, whom he vied as a stale to intrap her. Howbeit Nicea for all this goodly offer, forsooke not her castell, but al waies made it straightly to be looked vnto. Antigonus scemed to make no account of it, but daily gaue himselfe to make sumptuous sacrifices, feasts, and playestothe gods, within the citie of CORINTH for the mariage as though he had meant no other thing, but banqueting and iolliticall that might be. When the houre was come to feethefe sports, and that the musician Amabeus, beganto sing, he himselfemade as though he would accompany Nices vnto the Theater, being conueyed thither in a sumptuous rich litter, as it had bene for a Queene. She was very glad of this honour, and thought nothing leffe then of that which happened her. But when Anigonus came to the end of a firecte that turned to go vp the hill towards the castel. he bade her keepe on still to the Theater : and himselfe in the meane time left Amabeus there with his finging, and all the feast of the mariage, and went straight vp to the castell, forcing himselfe aboue his strength and yeares. When he was at the top of the hill, and found the gates shur, he knocked with his staffe, and commanded the garrison to open him the gates. They wondering to see him there in person, did let him in. When he was gotten into the castell, he was so exceeding joy full of it, that he had no reason to moderate his joy, but would banquet in the middest of streetes, and in the marker place, having minstrels to play vpon their instruments at his table, wearing garlands of flowers on their heads for ioy; and did fo fondly and lightly behaue himselse, as if he had bene a light yong man (and not as he was) an old man, who had proued fuch fundry changes of fortune, and yet fuffered himfelfe to be thus caried away with pleafure, that he embraced and spake to every man he met. Whereby it is easie to judge, that joy posfessing a man without wit or discretion, it maketh him besides himselfe, and doth more trouble his wits, then paine or feare. Now Antigonus having won the castell of the Acrocorinth, as you haue heard, he put it into the hands of those hetrusted best, to be fasely kept and therfore made Persaus the Phylosopher, Captaine of the castell. But indeed Aratus was in mind to have attemption ted the taking of the castell in Alexanders life time: yet he let it alone, because he ioyned himselfe with the ACHAIANS. But at that time there was offered him another occasion againetoattempt it, & this it was. At CORINTH there were foure brethren borne in Syria, of the which, one of them being called Diocles, was a fouldier of the castell: and the rest having robbed the kingstreasure, went straightvnto Sicyone, to Ægias the banker, whom Aratus imployed in his facultie. These three brethren immediatly sold him part of the gold they had robbed: and afterwards, one of them (called Erginus) coming often to see him, by litle and litle fold him all the rest. By this meanes Agias fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the garrifon of the castell of the Acrocorinth. Erginus told him, that going vnto his brother vp those steepe and high rockes, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocke, that went to a place of the wall of the castell, which was verie low. Agias hearing that, answered him finiling: Alas, my friend, what meane you to seale a litle peece of gold to hinder the king, when in one houres space you can sell such a great masse of money together? For as well shall you die if you be apprehended for this fellonie, as if you were otherwise attainted for treason. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promised that he would feele his brother Diocles minde in ic, for he did not greatly trult his other brethren. So returning shortly after, he bargained with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not aboue fifteene foote high, promifing that he would helpe him to execute the reft, with his brother Diocles. Aratus promised then to give him fifty talents, if he brought his enterprise to passe; and if he failed, that he would then giueeither of them, a house and a talent. Erginus would haue the whole fifty talents put into Agias the bankers hands. Aratus had not so much ready money, and besides he would not take it vp at vlury, for feare of giuing cause to suspect his enterprise. Wherefore he tooke all his plate of gold and filuer, and his wives iewels, and laid them to gage to Agias, to disburse the said fumme. But Aratus had fo great and noble a mind in him, and was so bent to do notable a As, that knowing how Photion and Epaminondus had bene effected for the justest and honestest men of GRECE because they had refused great gifts that were offered the & would never sel nor staine their honour for money: he yet surpassing them, was contented to spend his owne, to bring any good enterprise to passe, and did put his life in danger for the common benefite of his countrey men, they themselves knowing nothing of his enterprise, which turned all to their benefit. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie and courage of fuch a man, and that will not even now as it were, be willing to aide him, confidering how dearely he bought so great a danger of his person, and how he laid his plate and all the riches he had to gage to be brought in the night among the middest of his enemies, where he was to fight for hisowne life, hauing no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of fuch a noble enterprife, and nothing elfe. But now, though the enterprise of it felfe was dangerous, an error chancing through ignorance at the first, made it yet more dangerous. For Aratus had sent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to view the wall. This Technon had neuer spoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his mind what manner of man he was , by the markes that Erginus had given him of him; that he had a blacke curled haire, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Now Technon being come to the place where Erginus faid he would be with Diocles, he staied before the towne in a place called ORNIS. So while It he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles (called Dionylius, who knew nothing of the enterprise, nor was made acquainted with all, & looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chance. Technon being moued by the marks and danger he faw in him, like vnto those he was told of, asked him if he were nothing a kin vnto Erginus. by likensse of menone The other answered, he was his brother. Then Technon perswading himself it was certainly Dioeles that spake to him, without asking him his name, or making other enquiry of him, he tooke himby the hand, & began to talke with him of the practife he had with Erginus, and to aske him ofit. Diony fins taking the matter vpon him, & feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the city, holding him on still with talke, Technon mistrusting nothing. But even as Dionysius was readietotake him fast by the coller, his brother Erginus came. Who, perceiving how Technon had mistaken the matter, and the danger he was in, beckned to him with his head to flie and so they both ran for life vnto Aratus, to faue themselues. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more discouraged for this, but fent Erginus straightto carry his brother Dionysius mony, and to pray him not to be aknowne of any thing: who furthermore brought him with him vnto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him fure for flarting: for they bound him, and locked him vp fall in a chamber, while it they went about their enterprise. So when all things were readie, Arasuscommanded the rest of his army that they should tary behind, armed all night: and he himfelfe with foure hundred of the best men he had (not knowing themselves whether they went, nor to what intent) went straight to the gates of the city, passing by the temple of Iuno. This was about the middeft of fummer, when the Moone was at the ful & the element very cleare without clouds: infomuch that they were afraid their armors would glifter by Moone-light, and bewray them. But as the foremost of them came neare unto the city, there arose clouds out of the feathat darkned all the city and places thereabouts, and shadowed them. Then al of them sitting downe on the ground, plucked off their shoes, both because they should make lesse noise, as also for that their footing should be surer, and that they should slip lesse vpon the ladders. But Ergimus, and seven other companions with him, like men that travell, came secretly into the gate of the citie, and flue the porter and warders there. At that very inftant, Aratus caused the ladders to be fet vp against the wals, and made an hundred of his souldiers get vp on them: and fent also to command the reft, that they should follow him with all possible speed. Then drawing up his ladders after him as fast as he could, he went through the city, with his hundred men toward the castel, with such a joy ful cheare, as if he had had it already in his hand, for that he saw he was not discourred. But as he went on, he saw foure of the watch coming with a light against them. They faw not Aratus and his company, but the enemies faw them plainly a farre off Aratus and his men therefore flood vp close against old wals to tarie their coming, and at the first onset flue three of them: but the fourth having a blow on his head with a fword, ranne away, making an out-crie, that the enemics were in the citie. The trumpets forthwith founded the alarme, all the citic was in an vprore, the streets were straight full of people running vp and downe, and of lights in every corner, both beneath the citic, and also in the castel, and the noise was great every where. Aratus in the meane time forced to get up the high rocks faire and foftly at the first, and with great paine & difficultie, being out of his path he should have found, which he missed being very deepe into the rocks, and with many crooks and cranks went to the foote of the caffely but suddenly, euen as it had bene by miracle, the Moone appearing through the clouds, when they were in their worst way it gauethem light, and brought them to that part of the wal where they should be, and straight the Moone was shadowed againe. Now the three hundred souls diers whom Aratus had left by the gate of the temple of luno, when they were come into the citiebeing full of lights and in vprore, and besides could not find the path by the which their Captaine Aratus went before them: they flood close together under a rocke that shadowed them, forowfully looking to heare fome newes of Aratus: who was then fighting with the garrifon of the castell, the which made head against him, with all the force and power he could, Vnder the castell there were a great noise heard of men that fought, but yet the noise was so confufed by the found rebounding against the rockes and mountaine, that they could not deuise whence it should come. So they being in this perplexity, not knowing which way to turne the selves, Archelaus, captaine of king Antigonus men, having a good number of souldiers with him. went vp the hill with great cries and noise of trumpets, to set vpon Aratus and his company behind. But after he was passed by these three hundred soldiers of Aratus band, they gave charge vpon him, as if they had bin laid there in ambush of purpose, and slue the first they encounted withall, and made the others fo afraid, and Archelaus himselfe, that they dispersed them, & made fome flie one way, fome another, So, as they were ouerthrowne, Erginus came to these three hundred men, coming immediately from them that fought, and brought the newes that Aratus and them of the castell, were come to the sword together, and valiantly defended themfelues, lustily fighting for the wall, and therefore it was time for them to help him quickly. Then the foldiers bad him bring them thither straight, and so he did. So they climing vp the hill, did fignifie by their cries to their men, that they came to aide him. Furthermore, the Moone being then at the full, and shining on their harnesse, made their enemies in the castell thinke that they were a greater number then indeed they were, because of the long way they had to make to get vp vpon the rocks; and also because of the found in the night, that made their crie seems to be of a greater number then they were. At length they joyned with Aratus, they fought itout fo luftily, that they draue the garrifon out of the wals, and by breake of day wannethe castel. So that their exploit was discoursed by the rifing of the Sunne, and besides, all the rest of their armie that came from the city of Sycion E: whom the Corint Hians very gladly received, and did set open their gates vnto them, and aided them to take King Antigonus men. Afterwards, when they thought that all was fafe, then Aratus ranne from the castell vnto the Theater of the citic, whither repaired an infinite number of people, as well for the defire they had to fee him, as alfo to heare him speake vnto the Corinthians. So, having placed the Achaians oneither fide, at the coming into the Theater, Aratus being armed went vp into the chaire or pulpit for Orations, having his face quite changed, both for the great paines be had taken, and alfo for lacke of sleepe: so that his bodie being ouer-wearied, his spirits were even done. Now when all the affemby of the people (feeing him in the chaire) did humble themselues to shew him all the honour and kindnesse they could possible: he tooke his speare out of his left hand into his right, and bowing his knee and bodie somewhat, he leaned upon it, and so stood a great while in this manner before he spake, receluing the cries of ioy and clapping of hands which the people made, praifing his valiantnesse, and blessing his good hap and fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet againe, he framed his countenance, and began to make an Oration vnto them in the name of all the tribe and commonwealth of the ACHATANS, meete for the enterprise from whence he came: and perswaded them to joyne to the Achaians. So therewithall, they presently deliuered him the keyes of their citie, the which were neuer before that time in their power, fince the reigne of king Philip. Now touching the other Captaines of King Antigonus, Aratus having taken Archelaus prisoner, he let him go, but put Theophrastus

to death, because he would not go out of Corinth. Persons (captaine of the castell) seeing the cafflebut loft, he secretly saued himselfe, and fled vnto the citie of CENCRES. And it is reported that as he was afterwards in talke of Philosophy, where one maintaining, that a man could zenoes opinot be a good Captaine, vnlesse he were a perfect wise man: This (quoth he) is one of Zennes nion, That opinions rightly, the which heretofore pleased me best: but now this yong Sicyonian Aratus, and the hath made me of another mind. Many writers do report this faying of Persaus. Furthermore, A- good capratus wan presently the temple of Iuno, and the hauen of LBCH EVM, where he tooke fine and twentie ships of king Antigonus, and flue hundred horse of service for the war, & source hundred Syrians, which he fold every one of the. The Achaians left within the castel of the Acro- fell wife corinth, a garrifon of foure hundred footmen, and fiftie dogs, and as many hunts; all the which Perfeutation werekept for the watch of the castel. Now, the Romains wondering at the valiantnesse of Phi- swerse Zebowmen, they called him the last of the GRECIANS. Even so might I also (in my opinion) say, that this act is the last and most famous of all the GRECIANS, and deserved to be equall, aswell for valiantnesse, as also good successe, with the greatest exploits of the most famous ancients: as that which followed immediatly after, dothamply declare. For the MEGARIANS revolting fro king Antigonus, did straight ioune with Aratus: and the Troezenians also with the Epidavri-ANS, did likewife enter into league & friendship with the ACHAIANS. So at the first inuasion he made, he went to spoile the country of Atrica, and crossed ouerto the Isle of Salamina, and poiled and destroyed it, even as if he had delivered the power and force of the Achaians out with the Aof prison, to serue his owne turne in any thing he thought good of. Howbeit, he sent home the thaians. ATHENIANS prisoners without paying of ransome: and all of policy to make them desirous torebell against the Macedonians. Furthermore, he made king Ptolomy a friend and confederate of the ACHATANS, with condition, that he should be Lieutenant generall both by sea & by land. For these respects Aratus was of maruellous estimation and credit with the ACHAIANS: infomuch that where they could not yearely chuse him their Generall, being contrary to their law; they chose him at the least every second yeare: but in effect, all was done by his advice and wilel. For they faw plainly, that it was neither honor, nor riches, nor friendship of kings & printes, northe private benefit of his owne city wherein he was borne, nor any other thing elfe that hepreferred, before the glory & increase of the comonwealth of the AHCAIANS. For he was of opinion, that cities the selines were but weake, and being joyned together with the chaine of comonbenefit, they were a strength one to preserve the other. And in like maner, even as the parts that are in the bodies of brute beafts, have life and sustenace, being joyned & knittogether, and straight so soone as there is any separation of the the one from the other, they live no more, but putrificenen so cities also were brought to decay by them that did disperse their society among them; and in contrary maner did then againe increase, when joyning with any other great body and city, they were gouerned with wisdome and good counsell. So Aratus seeing the chiefest cities therabouts enjoy their lawes & liberties, thought it a shamefull thing to leave the ARGIVES Aratus 20. in flauery and bondage. Wherfore he practifed to kil the tyrant Aristomachus that gouerned the, fee Argon both to shew himselfe thankfull to the city for his bringing vp there: as also to ioyne that great at liberty. and mightie citie vnto the tribe of the Achaias. Now there were diverse men, that had the hearts & courage to undertake to do it, of the which the chiefest were Aschylus and Charimenes the Soothfayer, but they had no fwords; for they were straightly forbidden by the tyrant, and grieuous punishments ordained for the that should be found with their swords. Aratus therefore Aratus precaused litle short daggers to be made at Corinth for the, y which he sowed up in packs caried oncertain beasts loden with other baggage & stuffe. But the Soothsayer Charimenes did impart this enterprise vnto a third man, and made him one of the conspiracy with them. Eschylus be- the tyrants ing very much offended with it, began therefore to enter into practife by himselfe, and left their decree and company. Charimenes perceiuing that, tooke such a toy in his head in a mad mood, that he bewraied the as they went about to execute their enterprise. This not with standing, the most part of the conspirators saued themselves, and sled to Corinth. So the tyrant Aristomachus was flaine shortly afterby his owne men. But then another tyrant Aristippus, a crueller man then the first, made hast to take the tyranny before he could be resisted. This not with stading; Aratus with all the young men of the ACHAIAN's able to ferue in the field, went fodainly thither with aide, the city of hoping to find them of the city very glad to recouer their liberty. Howbeit the people being acquainted, & of long time vsed patietly to beare the yoke of bondage, there was not a man of the

that would once take his part. So he returned backe againe and did nothing, fauing that thereby the Achaians were accused, because that in open peacethey had made war, and therefore they were put in suite before the MANTINGANS, at Aristippus request, tyrant of ARGOS. The matter was pleaded in Arazus absence, and the Achaian's were condemned to pay the summe of thirty Minaes. After this proofe and attempt of Aratus, Aristippus being affraid of Aratus, and haring him to the death, fought wayes to kill him, with the helpe of Antigonus, who did aide him in in and there were spials almost in every corner, that did nothing else but lie in waite to execute ristippus mind. Now, there is no surer guard vnto a Prince, then the perfect loue and goodwill of his subjects. For afterthat the Nobilitie & common people haue bene vsed to feare, not him. but those that for him command them, he then feeth with many eyes, heareth with many eares. and knoweth what is done farre off. Here therefore I will a little digreffe from my historie. to shew you the manner of Aristippus life the tyrant, whereunto he was brought by this so much defired tyrannicall gouernment, and smoke of seigniorie, so esteemed of all men. Now though Arestippus had king Antigonus his friend, and that he kept a great guard of souldiers about him for the safety of his person, & that there was not an enemy of his left aliue in al the city; yet he made his fouldiers watch and lie without his pallace, under the cloifters and galleries thereabouts; and after supper turned all his men out of the doores, and then shut his court gates to him, and locked himselfalone with his concubine, in a litle high chamber with a trap dore, and set his bed your it, and so slept, as one that continually was affraid of himselfe. Then, after he was comeyo, his concubines mother came to take vp the ladder, and locked it in another chamber; and so didlet it downe againe the next morning, and called this trimme tyrant, that went downe out of his chamber, like a fnake that should have crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner. not having obtained by force of armes, but lawfully through vertue, a continuall government, being fimply apparelled with a poore gowne of small prise, and shewing himselfe a mortall enemy vnto al forts of tyrants, hath lefe a race and noble offpring among the GRECIANS, which remaine yet until this present day. Contrarily also, there are few tyrants that do vsurp the callels of free cities, that keepe fo many foldiers in pay, that make fuch provision for armor & weapon. and haue so many gates & drawbridges for the safetie of their persons; that in the end can keepe themselues from violent death, no more then hares: neither do leauealso any posterity, house or graue, why their memory should be honoured after their death. So Aratus having diversewaics made fundrie attempts, both by open force, and otherwise suddenly to take the city of Argos, and to thrust out the tyrant Aristoppus, he ener failed of his purpose, but specially one night, among the rest, when he entred the city very dangerously, with a few souldiers with him & fluc the foldiers that came to give fupply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, &that the tyrant with all his forces came to fet vpo him, the ARGIVBS flirred not at al as if Aratus had not fought for their liberty, but as though they had bin Iudges appointed to fit to fee the sports of the games Nemee, to judge the game vnto the conqueror without partialitie, & with indifferency. Aratus in the meane time fighting like a valiant man, was trust at with a pike, and runne through the thigh. This notwithstading, at length he wan that part of the ciry where he fought, and was not thrust out til night, what force soeuer the enemies made vpon him. And if he could possibly haue holden it out all night, he had vndoubtedly obtained his purpose: for the tyrant looked for none other but to flie, and had already fent diverse of his goods to & sea. Howbeitho man once came to tel Aratus any newes of it; besides also, lacking water, & for that he could not help himselfe because of his wound, he was driven to leade his men away, and failed of his purpose. So, despairing that he could ever take it by stealth, he went thither with open wars, & spoiled and destroyed all the country of Ar GO s; and having fought a great battell against the tyrant Aristippus, by the river of Chares, they blamed Aratus much, that he for sooke the victory & cowardly retired out of the battell. For the rest of his army doubtlesse had the better, and had sollowed the enemies farre in chase: when he fled being afraid, not compelled by his enemies, but mistrusting his fortune, and retired to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chase of their enemies were offended, for that they having put them to flight, and also slaine a great number more of them then they had lost of theirs, and yet for cowardlinesse should suffer their enemies (whom they had ouercome and put to flight) to fet vp markes of triumph in token of victorie: Aratus being ashamed of it, determined to fight once againe, for the markes of triumph. Whereupon resting his men but one day, he led them againe into the field, and setting

This notwithstanding, when he saw a great supply coming to his enemie, and that the tyrants men came to fight more lustily, and with better courage then before, Aratus durst not abide them, but retired, and sent to demand leane to take away his dead men, to burie them; yet he could speake so courteously, and behaue himselfe so wisely, by the experience he had in gonernment, and also for the goodwill they barehim, that they forgate the fault he committed, and he wanne the citie of CLEONES VIIO the ACHAIANS, where he caused the feasts of the games of Nemee to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquitie, rather vnto the CLEONEIANS, then vnto the ARGIVES. This notwithflanding, the AR GIV Es did keepe it also; and then was the first time that the fanctuarie and priniledge was broken, which was wont to be granted vnto all them that came to play for the games; because the Achaians did make them prisoners that fought in Angos, as they returned through their countrey, and fold them as enemies. So maruelloufly did Aratus and the ACHAI-ANS hate all forts of tyrants, without respect of person. Shortly after he was aduertised, that the tyrant Aristippus did lie in waite to spie oportunitie, to take the citie of CLEONES from him: howbeit that he was affraid of it, because he remained at that time in Corinth. So Aratus fraight fent out commandement into enery place, to affemble the armie of the tribe of the ACHAIANS and that they should bring victuals with them for many dayes: and so craftily came downe to the citie of CENCHREES, to intice Aristippus, by his going away so farre off, that Aratus in his absence he should attempt to set voon the CLEONEIANS, as indeede he did. For he fai- Aratagema lednot presently to go thither with his armie. But Aratus returning from CENCHREES Vnto CORINTH, very late in the night, and having layed good watch every way, he fodainely arifuppus brought the armie of the ACHAIANS VITO CLEONES with fuch speede and quietnesse, that they were not seene as they came, but entred into the citie of CLEONES by night, and were readie to fight with the tyrant, before he knew they were come. So the gates of the citie were fetopen by breake of day, and the fignall of battell given by found of trumpets: and fo fetting voon the tyrants men with great cries, they suspecting nothing, were presently put to Aratus vifight. And because the place where the ouerthrow was given, had many turnings, Aratus, fol-then, of the lowing the chase, thought the way which he tooke the tyrant fled in. The chase continued to riftipus. the citie of Mycenes: there the tyrant was ouertaken by a Cretan called Tragifius, (as Divias reporteth) who flue him; and there were flaine of his men also aboue fifteene thousand. she spraise But now Aratus having wonne such a famous victory, and lost neuera man, he could not yet saine. winnethe citic of ARGOS, nor set it again at liberty. For one Ægias, and another Aristomachus, gotinto the towne with the kings armie, and kept it: but notwith standing, by this noble vistory Aratus did race out a great part of the reproch that they gave him, and of the scoffes and slents the flatterers of the tyrants deuised of him: who to please them, reported, that when they should come to fight indeed, the Generall of the Achaians had the wind colicke in his belly, and a dimnesse in his eyes, with a giddines in his head, when he heard but the sound of the trumpets. And furthermorealfo, when he had fet his men in battell ray, and given them the word of battell, he asked the Generalls if he should neede to be there in person, because he was hurt in the heele, and then would get him as farre off as he could, to fee the end of the battell. This talke was so common, that the Philosophers themselues disputing of it, to wit, whether to tremble Aphilosophers and change colour in prefent danger and perill, be fignes of a faint heart, or of an ill complexion and coldnesse of bodie; they alway vouched Aratus, that had bene a good and valiant Cap- ther tremtaine, and yet when he began to fight, he was ever in that taking. So when he had overcome Atilippus, he fought means also to destroy Lysiadas Megalipolitan, who as absolute Lord and colour in king of the countrey, kept the city of MEGALIPOLIS. Notwithstanding he had no base mind danger, be a in him, neither was he caried away with a cruell defire of tyrannie to line at his pleafure, nor figure of through extreme couctoufnesse, as most Princes be: but being a young man, and pricked forward with defire of honor and fame, and having vnaduifedly conceived in his mind (which was great & highly bent) the vaine reasons he heard men talke of principality, as of a state most bleffed, and worthy of admiration he found the meanes to make himfelfe Lord of his countrey. But in. afterwards he was foone weary of the dangers & troubles fuch maner of government bringeth with it, and defired to follow Aratus, whom he faw prosper, & of great honor. Furthermore also, fearing his secret practises against him, he tooke hold of a noble deuice: first to rid himself of the malice and feare of the prison and guard of his souldiers and lastly, to be a benefactor to his

countrey. So he fent for Aratus, gaue vp his gouernment, and delivered vp his citie to the tribe of the Achains. They so extolled him for this act, that they chose him their Lieutenantee. neral of all their tribe. Wherfore, Lyfiadas arining at the first to excel Aratus in honour, attempt ted divers things which were not very needfull: as among others, to make warre with the LACED EMONIANS. But Aratus was very much against him in that, though somethink it was for enuic. Thereupon the chofe Lyfiadas Generall of the ACHAIAN's the fecond time: although A ratus openly both spake, and made what meanes he could to the contrarie, and would have had another to have bene chosen. For he himselfe was every other yeare Generall. So Lysiadas was chosen againe Generall of the ACHAIANS the third time, with every bodies goodwill and dratus and he had absolute power and government by turnes, one after the other. But when they faw that Lysudas became open enemy vnto Aratus, and did still accuse him in all their councels and affemblies they fell in fuch misliking with him, that they rejected him. For they thought his but a counterfeit vertue, to contend with the perfectnesse of Aratus vertue, much like vitto one of A fips fables, faying. That litle birds did answer the cuckow on a time, asking them who they did flie from her: Because we are affraid (said they) thou wilt be a sparhawke one day, Enen fo it feemen, that there was a certaine sufpition in mens minds of Lysadas ty ranny, which made them mistrust that he went not from his tyranny with goodwill. Now Aratus on the other fide, wanne as great praise and honour by his doings against the ÆTOLIANS. For when the A. CHAIANS Would needs have fought vpon the confines of the territoric of the MEGARIANS. and that Agis king of LACED EMON, being come with his army to y camp of the tribe of the A. CHAIANS, did perfwade them hardily to giue battell: Aratus was ftoutly against it, and did abide many mockes and taunts they gaue him, faying, That it was for cowardlinesse he would not go. This notwithstanding, he would not leave his wife and safe determination, for all that open the macibut suffered the enemies to passe ouer the mountaine Gerania, and to inuade Peropos-Mr sys, and would never fight with them. But afterwards, when he faw that at their first comming they had taken the city of PALLENA, he then changed his mind, and would deferre time. no longer to tarie till all his power were come together, but marched forthwith, with thosefew he had, against his enemies; who maruellously weakened themselues by their insolence and diforder after their victorie, keeping no watch nor ward. For after they had entred the citie of PALLENA, the fouldiers ran into every house, one thrusting in anothers necke, and fighting for the goods they found. The Captains also felto rauishing of maides, & the PALLENIANS Wives, and pur their burganets and morrions ypon their heads, that none other should take them: because that by the same the soldiers should know whose they were, and to whom the women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and iolitic, newes came fuddenly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they faw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all vnderstood of the danger by their sudden setting on them, the Achaians were fighting alreadie within the fuburbs and gates of the citie, against the first that resisted, whom they flue. They being broken and put to flight, made the rest so afraid that were gathered togetherto aid them, that they wift not what to do. In this tumult and hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a prisoner, that was the daughter of Epigethes one of the noblest men of the citie, and she a maruellous goodly woman, and paffing faire: who being fet in the temple of Diana, whither a Captaine that had chosen her for himselfe had brought her, and had put his burganet on her head, when she heard the noise of them that fought, she suddenly ranne to the gate of the temple with the burganet on her head, to fee them fight. The Citizens feeing her in that array, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater maiestic, then any worldly creature. The enemies on the other fide were so afraid to see her, thinking she had bene some spirit, that not a man of them durst once defend themselves. So the Pallenians say, that the image of Diana all the rest of the time is kept locked vp, and no body touched it; and that when the Nunne that keepeth it doth carie it else where, no man dare looke on it, but euery man turneth his eyes away: because the fight of it is not onely fearefull and hurtfull vnto men, but it also killeth the fruite of the trees it passeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cause that then troubled the Æ-TOLIANS minds fo much, because the Nunne remouing the image of the goddesse Diana, she turned it towards them. Howbeit, Aratus in his Commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth, that when he had defeated the ÆTOLIANS, following them in chafe, he entred hand oner head with them that fled intothe citie, out of the which he draue them, and flue feuen hundred of them. This noble victory hath bene efteemed among ft the chiefest afterwards: and the painter Timanthes hath drawne and fet it forth in table very liucly. This notwithstanding, because diverse Princes and people did immediatly prepare force against the ACHAIANS, Aratus presently made peace with the Arolians by the practise of Pantaleon, who bare great sway and authority amongst the Furthermore, Aratus being desirous to set the ATHENIAMS at liberty, he suddenly attempted to take the hauen of PIREA: for the which the league with ACHAIANS reproued him, because he had broken the peace they had made with the MACEDO-NIANS. But Aratus in his Commentaries doth stoutly deny that it was he, and layeth the fault woon Erginus, by whose meanes he wanne the castell of the Acrocorinth; faying, that it was semprether he that of his ownemind did fet a scaling ladder to the wall, and that his ladder breaking under him, he fled vpon it and perceiving he was followed neare by the enemies, he still cried out. Araus, as if he had bene there; and by this policie mocked his enemies, and faued himfelfe. Howbeit, methinketh this answer is not true. For it not credible, that Erginus a private souldier and a Syrian borne, should have fo great an enterprise in his head, whesse it had bene by Aratus consent and commandement, who had given him men, time and meanes to vidertake it. And this appeared plainely afterwards: for, Aratus did not attempt it twice or thrice onely, but oftener then fo (as those that extremely desire athing) to take the hauen of PIRBA on the foduine, not giving over for once failing, but rather emboldened him felfe again with good hope, because he missed it but little, and that he came so neare the taking of it. And another time also amongst others, slying through the plaine of Thriasia, he brake his legge, and was diluen to make many incisions to heale it: so that he was a long time together caried in his littervito the warres. After that king Antigonus was dead, and that Demetrius his fonne fucecceed him in the kingdome, he attempted then more carneftly then ever before, to fet the ci-HE of ATHENS at liberty, making small account of the MACE DONIANS. Aratas therefore being our thrown e in battell neare vnto Phylacia, by king Demetrius Lieutenant, called Bishis, Aratus. and the rumour running straight abroad, that Aratus was dead, or at the least that he was taken nerthrowns prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the hauen of Piren, wrote a letter vnto Co- econians. RINTH, and commanded the garrifon of the ACHAIANS that kept it, to deliver the towne, for Aratus was dead. But he by chance was at the felfe fame time in Corinth: fo that they which brought the letters went home with a mocke, without their purpose, and made all the company merric. Furthermore, King Demetrius himselfesent a Galley out of Macedon, to bring Aratus bound vnto him. The ATHENIANS themselves also, to please the MACEDONI-ANS, exceeding all lightnesse of flatterie, wore garlands on their heads a whole day together, in token of common loy, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was To madde inhis mind to heare this, that he brought his army presently against them, even to the verie suburbes of the Academie. Notwithstanding at their earnest requests, he did no hurt there. And afterwards the ATHENIAN'S acknowledging his valiant neffe, when king Demetrius died, ttooke them in the heads to recouer their libertie againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was Generall of the Achaians, and that hekept his bed lying ficke of a long difease: yet to further this, he was caried vnto ATHENS in a litter, and fo perswaded Diogenes (Captaine of the Garrison there,) that for the summe of an hundred and fiftie talents (towards the which Aratus gaue of his owne, twenty talents) he made him deliuer to the ATHENIANS, the hauen of Pirea, the castell of Munichia, the Islc of Salamina, and the castell of Sunium. After this the ÆGINETES, the HERMIONIANS, and the most part of ARCADIA it self, did prefently ioyne with the ACHAIANS: fo that the MACEDONIANS being occupied with warres atthat time in other places against their neighbours, the power of the Achaians maruellously increased, having also the Atolians their confederates. Then Aratus to performe his old promise, and being angry to see the city of Ar Gos (being so neare neighbour vnto them) Aratus by yet kept in bondage, he fent vnto Aristomachus, to perswade him to be contented to set his citie againe at libertie, and to loyne it to the tribe of the Achaians, as Lystadas had done his at enforcement towne of MEGALIPOLIS: and rather to like to be made a Generall with honour and praise syramie. of so great and famous a state as the Achaians, then tyrant of one onely citie, hated, and eucry houre of thenight and day in danger of his life. Aristomachus gaue care to his perswasions, and fent vnto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fiftie talents to discharge the souldiers he had about him. The money was straight prepared. And Lysiadas that was at that time Generall of the Achains, and that maruelloully defired this matter might be brought to passe by his meanes: he secretly sent vnto Aristomachus to accuse Aratus, and shewed how he had bene alwaies amortall enemy vnto tyrants, and therefore counfelled him rather to put him. selfe into his hands, as indeed he did. For Lystadas brought Aristomachus vnto the councell of the Achaians. There all the councell plainely shewed their good wils, and the confidence they had in Aratus: for when he spake against it, that they should not receive Aristomachus, they reiected him with great anger. But afterwards also when Aratus was won, and that he beganto moue the contrary to the councell they ftraight agreed to receive the ARGIVES, & the PRILLS. s IAN'S in league with them; and also the next yeare following they chose Aristomachus Lieure. nant general of all their tribe. Aristomachus seeing himselse in credit now with the Acharans. would need sinuade the countrey of LACONIA with a maine army, and fent for Aratus being then at ATHENS. Aratus wrote vnto him, and wished him in any wise notto meddle with that iourney, because he would not have the Achaians to deale with Cleomenes king of Laceda. MON, that was a couragious and flout young Prince, and maruelloufly growne in flort time. Howbeit, Arifomachus being felf-willed in that point, Aratus beyed him, and was there in perfon all that journey. So Cleomenes being come to them you the fodaine with his armie, neare vnto the city of PALANTIVM, Aristomachus would needs fight with him; but Aratus dissiyaded him from it. Wherupon Lysiadas afterwards accused him to the Achaians, and the next yeare following he contended with him fluing to be Generall howbeit he was reiected by most voices, and Aratus chosen Generall the twelfth time. The felfe same yeare he was ouerthrowne in battell by Cleomenes, neare vnto the mountaine Lyczeum, & being fled, wandred up and down in the night, that every man thought he had bene flaine, and it ran for good paiment amongall the GRECIANS. Howbeit, he faued himselfe, and having gathered his men together again, not contenting him that he had escaped with life but wisely taking the oportunitie and occasionos. fered, no man knowing it, nor mistrusting his coming: he suddenly went to affaile the Man-TINEANS, which were confederates of Cleomenes, and having taken the city of MANTINEA, he left a great garrifon in it, and made the strangers that were there, free of the city. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being ouercome, wan the Achains that which they thefelues could fearcely have won if they had bene conquerors. Afterwards, y LACED EMONIANS invading the territories of the Megalipolitan's with a great armie, Aratus fodainly went thither to aid them, but would hazard battel no more, nor give Cleomenes vantage, who defired only to fight, & fill constantly refisted the Megalipolitans, that provoked him to come into the field. Forbefides that in nature he was not meete for a fet battel, at that time also he was the weaker in men, and had to do with a vertuous young man, that was all fire; where his courage and ambition on the other fide was coole and quiet enough. Furthermore, he confidered, that as king Cleomines fought honour by valiant venturing, which he had not before : cuen fo it was his part wifely to keepe that which he had long fince gotten, and to stand upon his guard and safetic. This notwithfrading, the light armed men being put out into the field, and having chased the LACEDE. MONIANS cuen into their campe, and entring in with them hand ouer head: Aratus would never bring out his citizens, but staied them in a great valley that lay betweene them both, and would not let them come on any farther. Wherewithall Lysiadas being mad with himselfe, and falling out with Aratus, he called for the horsemen, and said, that he would yet helpethem that followed the chase, & praied them not to lose the victory so cowardly, of the which they were so sure: nor to for lake him at a pinch, fighting for the defence of their country. So having gotten a great number of choise horsemen together, he went with a great furie and gaue charge on the right wing of his enemies battell, and having dispersed them, and put them to slight, he vnaduisedly followed the with great courage, into euill fanoured crooked waies, among trees & great broad ditches. Whereupon Cleomenes came, and so lustily set on him, that he flue him dead in the place, valiantly fighting and defending himself. The other men of armes flying also, rushed in again, into the battell of the footmen, and so disordered their rankes, that they made all their army fly for feare. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, because he had for laken Lysiadus: and being enforced vnto it by the Acharans that went without his leave, he followed them at length, and fled himselfealso vnto the city of AGIVM. There the ACHAIAN's sitting in councel, they decreed, that they wold furnish Aratus with no more mony, neither wold they pay his strangers any more; and bad him pay them at his owne charge, if he would entertaine them for the warre-

Aratus perceiuing that they did him great wrong, stood euen indifferent to deliuer vp his commission of Lieutenancy, and to discharge himselfe of his office; but after he had bethought himfelfe better, he bare it patiently, and led the Achaians directly to the citie of Orchomene. There he valiantly fought with Megistonus, king Cleomenes father in law, and had the upper hand of him: for he flue three hundred of his men, and tooke Megistonus selfe prisoner. Furthermore, where before euery fecond yeare they did vie to chuse him their Lieutenant generall, when his furne came about againe, they called him to give him the office; but he refused it, and Timoxems was chosen in his roome. Now the cause alledged for his refusall, was said to be, for that he missiked of the common people. But that sounderh like a lie: for the truth of it, to my seeming, was, for that he faw the state of y Achaians to decline. For king Cleomenes proceeded no more faire and foftly as he did at the first, when he was controlled and bridled by the Ephori : but hauing flaine them, and equally deuided the lands through LACED EMONIA, and made the strangers free citizens of Sparta, being then absolute Lord of Lack DEMON, he straight set vpon Proch. the Achaians with all the power he could, and fought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deserueth inst reproofe, for that he for sooke his countrey in such extreme trouble and danger, that being as the mafter of a ship, he gaue another the sterne to steare, when it had bene most more so served for him to be a said more so forhonorable and meetest for him to haue taken it in hand (though they would not have given it fake his him) to haue faued his countrey. Or otherwise, if he had indeed viterly despaired of the good ficcesse of the ACHAIANS, he should then have put it rather into Cleomenes hands, & not to have danger: poisoned Peloponnesvs againe with the maners of the barbarous people (bringing in as he then the did,the garrison of the Macedonians, filling & castel of the Acrocoriath with Gayles and ILLYRIAN foldiers, and making them his Lords & Masters, whom he had so often ouercome his in inwars, & bereaued of their gouernment, and of whom he also spake so much euill in his Com- storme and mentaries;) nor to have put them into townes, and calling them friends & confederates, to think tempes. thereby to colour and disguise his wicked practise. Admit Cleomenes had bene a tyrant, & a cruellman(if I should so terme him,) yet came he of the bloud of Hercules, & was born in Spartas from whence they should rather have chosen the meanest man Governor, then the greatest king of Macedon; and those specially that prefer the honor and glory of Grece, before strangers.

The most man of man of the control of the contro Yetking Cleomenes required no more of al the ACHAIAN'S, but the name only to be their Lieu- Sparea, was tenant generall: and so they would grant him that honor, he promised he would be very good vnto the cities confederates to Achaia. Where Antigonus notwithstanding, when they had chosen him their Lieutenant generall, with absolute power and authoritie both by sea and also by land, refused the charge, vnlesse they would let him have the castel of the Acrocorinth for his hire. The which was even like to Afops hunter, that bridled his horse: for he would not get vpon the Achaians that requested him, and that by their Ambassadors and decrees of countell, did referre all vnto himfelfe, before he had first fadled and bridled them, by the garrison he madethem receiue, and the pledges he caused them to give him; and yet he spake as much as might be to cleare himself of the accusation against him, bearing the in hand that he was forced to it. Howbeit Polybius writeth, that long time before he was compelled, being afraid of Cleo- Polybius menes valiantnesse, he had secretly practised that with Antigonus, which he was openly seene in afterwards: and that he had entifed the MEGALIPOLITANS (who were the first that moved it to the counsell of the Achaians) to call king Antigonus to their aide, because they were nearest neighbours to the fire, and continually harried with Cleomenes war, that alwaics knocked at their gates to come and spoile them. Thus much is affirmed by Philarchus in his historie, who were Philarchus hardly to be credited notwithstanding, had not Polybius confirmed it. For he loued Cleomenes so well, that it feemed he was rauished with some spirit as often as he spake of him: and frameth his net greatly hiltorie, as a common counseller that should pleade a case in law before the Judges, stil accusing the one, and defending the other. The Achaian's lost the citie of Megalipolis againe, the which king Cleomenes tooke of them, and ouercame them in a great battell by Hecatombaon. Wherewithallthey were so amazed, that they sent Ambassadors presently vnto him, and praied him to come to the city of Ar Gos, and there they would make him their Lieutenant generall. the citie of But when Aratus heard he came indeed, and that he was not far from the citie of Lerna with listons his armie: being afraid, he fent other Ambassadors to tell him that he should safely come with the Achaithree hundred men only, as vnto his friends and confederates: and yet if he mistrusted crast and cuill dealing, that then they would give him pledges for the fafetie of his person. Wherefore he prefently departed thence, and fent a letter before to the Councell of the Achaians, full of fonds words and reproches he gaue vnto Aratus: who likewise replied to him againe, bitterly talinting each other that they came to talke of their mariage & wines. After this letter, Cleomenes fent defiance by an Heraldvinto the Achaians, and proclaimed open war against them: infomuch as he had almost gotten the citie of SICYONE by practise of traitors. Howbeit, failing of his Dir. pose he returned sodainly, and went vnto the city of PALLENA, which he took, & droue out the Generall of the ACHAIAN'S thence, and immediatly after he wan the cities also of PHENEA, and PENTELION. After that, the Argives & Phliasians willingly yeelded vnto him, fo that of all which the Achaian's had conquered, and joyned vnto their tribe, they could reckon of no. thing of certainty vnto them. Then Aratus was maruelloufly troubled in his mind, to feeall PELOPONNESVS in tumult and vprore, and that all the cities fell to open rebellion by thosethat practifed change and alteration. For no man was contented with the ftate and government at that time, but diverse of the SICYONIAN'S and CORINTHIAN'S both were bewraied which had fecretly practifed with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the gouernment of the AcHAI-ANS, defiring themselves to be Lords and Governors of their cities. Aratus having full commiffion and authority from the Councell of the ACHAIANS, to make enquirie of them, and to put them to death, without further triall of law, he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faulty in the city of Sicyone. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at Corinth, he made in. quirie of them, and put them to death: whereby he made the common people very angry with him, who otherwise of theselues were weary of the gouernment and subjection of the AcHAI-ANS. The CORINTHIANS therefore gathering together in the temple of Apollo, they fent for Aratus, intending to make him prisoner before they would openly enter into actuall rebellion. Aratus went thirher, to shew that he neither feared nor mistrusted them, but yet he held his horse in his hand following of him. Then many role vp against him, and did both reprove and injurioufly intreate him. But Aratus with staicd countenance and gentle words, praied them to keepe their places, and not to crie out in such rage vpon their feete, & withal, caused them also to come in that were at the temple doore. But as he spake vnto them, by litle and litle he drew backcout of the presse, as though he meant to have given his horse to some body to hold. So being gotten out of the presse, he gently spake without any feare vnto the Corinthian's he met, & bad them go to the temple of Apollo. When he was come to the castell, he then sodainly tooke his horse backe, & comanded cleopater, Captaine of the garrison of the ACHAIANS there to looke well to the fafe keeping of the castell. Then he set spurres to his horse, and galloped towards the citie of Sicyone for life, being followed onely by thirtie of his foldiers, all the rest having forfaken him, and dispersed themselves here & there. Shortly after, the Corinthian's understanding that Aratus was gone, they followed after, but could neuer ouertake him: whereupon they straight sent for king Cleomenes, and deliuered the citie of Corinth into his hands, the gaine whereof pleased him not so much, as he was fory for the losse of Aratus, whom they had let go. So king Cleomeres ioyning vnto him all the people dwelling along the sea coast, commonly called the river of Corinth, who yeelded up themselves, holds and townes into his hands, he then intrenched in the castell of the Acrocorinth with a great trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the citie of Sicyone, many of the Achains gathered about him, and holdinga Counsel and affembly, he was chosen their Lieutenant generall, having absolute power and authority to do what he would, and gaue him of their owne citizens to guard his person. So, hauing managed the affaires of the state and commonwealth of the Achaians the space of three and thirtie yeares together, and having all that time bene counted of all menthe chiefest man of power and authoritie in GRECE, he then found himselfe in poore estate, for saken, and in great miserie, as in the shipwracke of his countrey beaten with storme, and in great danger of himfelfe. For when he fent unto the ATOLIAN'S for aide, they flatly denied him, and would fend him none. Furthermore, the ATHENIANS being very defirous to fend aid for Aratus fake, were diffwaded from it through the practife of Euclydas and Micion. Aratus also had a house in Co-RINTH, where all his money was: the which king Cleomenes at the first medled not withall, neither would fuffer any other to touch it, but fent for his friends and officers, and charged them w looke to it, to give Aratus a good account of it afterwards. Furthermore, he privily fent Tripylus vnto him, and his father in law Megistonus, and offered him great gifts, and spetially an annual penfion of twelve talents, which was double as much as king Ptolomy gaue him. who fent him yearely fixe talents. Besides, he only praied the Achaians, that they would make him their Lieutenant generall, and also that the garrison in the castell of Acrocorinth, might be deuided in common betweene them. Aratus made answer, that he had no absolute power in his hands, and that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Clemenes thinking this but a deuice and excuse of Aratus, he presently inuaded the country of the Sic You IAN's and destroyed all as he came, and continued the space of three moneths. Aratus in the meane time stood doubtful how to determine; whether he should receive king Antigonus or not: because Antigonus would not aide him before he deliuered him the caftell of the Acrocorinth into his hands. So the Achar-ANS neeting at the city of AGIVM to consult you it, they fent for Aratus thither. Howbeit, it was dagerous coming thither, because Cleomenes camp lay hard by the city of Sicyon E: besides also that the citizens kept Aratus, and held him by force, faying, That they would not let him venture himselfe in such apparent danger, their enemies being so neare vnto them. Moreouer, the women and little children, hung about him, weeping and compaffing him about, as their common father and fauiour. But Aratus comforting them, bad them not be afraid, and so tooke his horfe, with ten of his friends and his fonne (that was a yong stripling growne) and went towardsthe sea, and imbarked in certaine ships that rode at anker. Thence he sayled vnto Acrv M, where the diet or parliament was kept; and there it was refolued, that they should send for An- The Achaisignmus, and deliuer the castell of the Acrocorinth into his hands. And so it was performed; for ans do send Aratus fent thicker his owne fonne among the other hoftages. The Corint Hins were fo for entire and for his offended withal, that they made hauocke of his goods, and gaue his house he had in Corint vnto king Cleomenes. So king Antigonus being onwards on his way to come into Peloponnesvs . with his armic, bringing with him twenty thousand footmen all Macedonians, & foure hundred horsemen: Aratus with the greatest states & officers of the Achains, vnwitting to their enemies, went to meete him as farre as the citic of PEGES, having no great trust nor confidence in Antigonus, northe MACEDONIANS. For he remembred very well, that he came first to his greatneffe, by the injuries he had offered them; and how that the chiefest cause of his rising, was the malice he bare vnto old Antigonus. Howbeit making vertue of necessitie, and weighing the instant occasion of their present extremity, (of Gouernors, to be driven to be subjects,) he put himselfe in aduenture. So, when Antigonus was told that Aratus was come in person to him, ohey neceshaving with good countenance after a common fort faluted thosethat came in his company: to fine Aratus himfelfe at his first coming he gaue an honorable welcome and entertainment. Afterwards also, finding him a good and discreete man, he fell into inward friendship and familiaritie with him. For Aratus was not onely skilfull to give direction in matters of state touching good order and gouernement: but moreouer, his companie and conversation was very pleasant, to entertaine a Princes leafure with. Wherefore though Antigonus was but yong at that time, yet seeing throughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and eftecmedabout a Prince, he vsed his counsell & aduice more then any other mans, in all matters, not Awarder only touching the affaires of the ACHAIANS, but of the MACEDONIANS alfo. And fo all things formed came to passe, which the gods had promised in their sacrifices. For in a beast that was sacrificed, there were two galles wrapped in one felfe caule: the which the Soothfayers interpreted did prognofticare, that two which before were mortall enemies, should now become affured frieds. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did he give any credite to the facrifices, but trusted rather to his owne determination. So, the warres afterwards having good succeffe, and Antigonus making a feast in the city of Corint H where he had bidden many guests, he would needs have Aratus lie vpon him at the table, and a litle while after, commanded his men to bring him a couerlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a cold. Aratus answered him. It freezed. Then Antigonus bad him come neare him, and when the feruants brought acouerlet for the king, they cast it ouer them both. Then Aratus remembring the sacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the king what a wonder he had seene in the sacrifice, and what interpretation the Soothsayers made of it. This was long after. So Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in the city of PEGEs, they were sworne brethre together; and then went both with al speed against the enemies. Thus there fel out hote skirmishes betweene them, hard by the city of Corinth. and draum For Cleamenes was very well fortified, and the Coainthians valiantly defended themselves. I worke In the meane time, Arestoteles of ARGOS (Aratus friend) secretly sent him word, that he would make the citie rebell, if he came himselse with any number of souldiers. Aratus told it vnto kind Antigonus, who gave him fifteene hundred men, with the which he imbarked, and paffed over with great speed from the Isthmus (or barre in the straight) vnto the citie of Epidav Rym. Howe beit, the Argives taried not Aratus coming, but were all vp before he came, and did fet vpon king Cleomenes men, and had driven them into the castell, Cleomenes being advertised of it, and fearing lest his enemies (keeping the citie of Ar-Gos) should cut off his way from returning into his countrey againe with lafetie, if he were driven to a straight: he for sooke the castell of the Acrocorinth, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the city of Ar Gos. So he came thither in time, and ouerthrew certaine of his enemies. But fhortly after, Aratus and king Antigonus both being come thither with all their aide, Cleomenes was driven to flie to the citicof MANTINEA. After the recoucric againe of the citic of Angos, all the refidue of the citics of Pn-LOPONNESUS did againe returne to the Acharans, and Antigonus took the castell of the Acracorinth. So Aratus being chosen Generall by the ARGIVES, beconnielled them to present Antigonus with all the tyrants goods, & those that had bin traitors to the commonwealth. And after they had cruelly tormented the tyrant Ariflomachus in the citie of CBNCHRES, in the end they cast him into the sea, and drowned him. Aratus was maruellously reproued for his death. that would fuffer the poore man to be so vilely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great pleafure; who through his perfwafion willingly refigned vp his tyrannic. and delivered the citie of Ar Gos vnto the Achaians. But besides this, they blamed him for many other things else; for that the Acharans through his meanes had put the citie of Co-RINTH into Antigonus hands, as though it had bene forme meane village: for that when they had fucked the city of OR CHOMENE, they fuffered him to place a garrison of the MACEDONIANS there for that they had enacted by parliament, that they should neither write, nor fend Ambassa. dors any whither, without Antigonus prinitie and consent furthermore, for that they were compelled to give pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made facrifices, feafis, and games vn. to Antigonus, as if he had bene a god; following the example of Aratus citizens, who werethe first that began, and had received Antigonus into the citie by the perswasion of Aratus, that lodged and feasted him in his owne house. With all these faults they burdened Fraths, and confidered not, that after they had put the reynes of the government into Antigonus hand, Aratus himselfe (whether he would or not) was copelled to follow the swinge of the vnbridled Prince, having no other meanes to stay it, but onely the liberty of speech to admonish him: and that also was not to be exercised, without apparent and great danger. For it is most true, that many things were done greatly against Aratus mind : as amongst others that Antigonus caused the tyrants images of An cos to be fet vp, which he had before pulled downe; and also that he made them to be overthrowne, which Aratus had fet up for those that had taken the castell of Co-RINTH, and onely left Aratus one statue, not with standing all the earnest intreaty Aratus made to the contrarie, yet he could get no grant of any thing to be requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the Achaians dealt not fo friendly with y Mantine ans, as became Grecians one to another. For they having the citie in their hands by Antigonus meanes, did put al the noblest and chiefest men of Mantinea to death; others they sold as slaues, & sent the rest into Macedon with irons on their legs, and brought the poore women and children into bondage, and fold them for flaues: and of the money they got by spoile, they deuided the third part among themfelues, and left the other two parts vnto the MACEDONIANS. Now furely it cannot be faid, but this was done for some cruell revenge. For though it was an over-great crueltic, in rage and palfion of mind, to handle people of one selfe bloud and language in this lamentable fort; yet Simonides faith, When men are driven and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to ease their great from ackes enflamed with rage & malice. But for that which was done afterwards vnto the ciric, no man can excuse Aratus, nor say, that he was either driven to it by necessitie, or that he had otherwise any honest occasion to do it. For king Antigonus having given the citie of Man-TINEA vnto the ARGIVES, they determined to make it a Colonic, and chose Aratus their Generall:who made a decree, that thenceforth the citic should no more be called MANTINEA, but Antigonia, as it beareth name vnto this day. Thus it feemeth that gentle Mantinea (for foy Poets called it) was veterly destroyed, & bare the name of another city through Arasis means, preferring the name of him that destroyed the citie, and did put all the inhabitants of the first to death. After that, king Cleomenes being overthrown in a great battel by & city of SELLASIA, he lefethe city of Sparra, and fled into Agypr. So Antigonus having yied Aratus with all kind of honourable courtefie, he returned againe into MACEDON. There falling ficke, he fent Philip that hould fucceed him in the kingdome-being a yong ftripling growne) into PELOPONNESVS, & fraightly charged him specially to follow Aratus counsell, and to imploy him when he would focake vitto the cities, and become acquainted with the ACHATAN'S. So Aratus having received him in that fort, made him fo well affected and louing towards him, that he fent him againe into Mice Don, being throughly determined to make wars with GRECE, So after the death of Antiponus, the ATOLIAN'S began to despise the carelessnesses and cowardlinesse of the ACHAIAN'S thecause that they being vied to be defended by strangers, and having bene altogether governed by the armies of the Machonians, they lived very idlely & diffolutely,) wherepon they tooke vpon them to make themselues Lords of Peroponnesve. So they assembled an armic. and by the way as they went, they onely tooke some prey and spoile you the lands of the Pa-TREIANS, & the DYMEIANS but inuading the territory of MESSINA with all their army, they destroyed the whole countrey before them. Aratus being angry withall, & perceiuing that Timoxenus (who at that time was General of the Achains) did ftill tract and delay time in vaine. because he was vpon his going out of his yeare; he being appointed Generall for the yeare following, did anticipate his time fiue daies before, to go & aide the Messinians. Wherfore leauing an army of § Achaians, whose persons were now neither exercised in armes, nor yet had any defire to go to the wars, he was ouerthrown by the city of CAPHYES. Now, because it was thought that he went somewhat too hotely and couragiously to the wars, he so extremely cooledagaine, & left things in such case, that all hope being cast aside, he suffered the Arolians by the city inmaner to tread PELOPONNESVS vnder their feet before his eyes, with al the infolency & cru- of captors. eliethar might be possible, notwithstanding that they sundrie times gaue him great aduantages ofthem. Thus were the ACHAIAN'S once again forced to pray aide out of MACEDON & to fend The Athai for yong king Philip to make warres in GRECE hoping, for the love he bare vnto Aratus, and the great trust he had in him, that he would vie them gently, and do as they would have him. But when first of all began Apelles, Megareus, and a few other Courtiers to accuse Aratus: vnto fonne. whom King Philipgiuing eafie eare, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrarie faction vnto Aratus, was chosen Generall by the Achaians. Howbeit, this new Generall Eparatus being extremely hated by the Achaians, and Aratus also leaving to deale any more with matters of flate, no act was done to any purpose. Whereupon King Philip finding his fault, returned again vnto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his affaires profiered in all things he went about, he then let him alone with all, as from whom came all his honour and greatnesse. Thereupon euery man esteemed Aratus a wise Gouernour, not onely to rule a Common-wealth, but also a whole Realme and kingdome. For his maners, intent, and chiefeft purpose appeared in the deeds of this yong king, as a rich colour that did fet forth and beautific them. For the clemencie this yong Prince Philip vsed to the LACED EMONIANS that had offended him, the great courtesie he shewed to the CRETANS, whereby in few dayes he wanne all the Isle of CRETA: and the journey he made against the ÆTOLIANS, which was a wonderfull great exploite, wanne the Prince great fame, for following good counsell, and Aratus to be accounted a wife Gouernour, and of deepe understanding. Now the kings slatterers enuying Aratus morethen before, and perceiuing that they got no good by secret backe-biting ofhim, they then began with open mouth very infolently to reuile him at the table, and with great derission: insomuch as one night going home to his tentafter supper, they pelted him companion with stones all the way as he went. King Philip when he knew it, was so offended therewith, of vertue. that he did condemne them in the summe of twentie talents; and afterwards also, because they troubled his affaires, he did put them to death. But king Philip in the end being putfed vp with the good fortune and successe of this warre, which prospered as he would have it, he then grew to be conetous, and beganne to shew his naughtie nature, and to bewray his dissimulation wherewith he disguised himselse, and by litle and litle to make his vices plainly to appeare. For first of all, he abused young Aratus wife, which was kept secret a long time, because he lay in their house, and began daily to grow more seuere and cruell to the commonweales; and then The beginthe world saw plainely that he cared no more for Aratus. For the first suspicion and begin-ning of disning of the mistrust he had of Aratus, came for that which was done at Massina. For the being the Messinians being fallen together by the cares, and in great civill warres one with another, rates and Thilly.

Aratus went thither to make peace betweene them. Howbeit, king Philip came thither the next day following, and in stead of pacifying the quarrell, he fet them further out together then they were before. First, he asked the Gouernours of the citie, whether they had no lawesto bridle the infolencie and stomacke of the common people; and privately also talked with the heads of the faction of the people, and asked them if they had not hands to defend themselues from tyrants. So both the one and the other faction trusting to king Philip, the Gouernours would have layed hold on the Oratours of the citie: but they rifing with the common people, flue of their Nobilitie and Magistrates, well neare two hundred of them. Aratus that came foone after this fact, shewed that he was greatly offended with King Philip, and caused his some with open mouth shamefully to reproue him. Now it seemed that this yong Aratus was in loue with King Philip before: but then he told him before all the people, that for this shamefull act he had done, he thought him now no more faire of face, but the fowlest creature that could be. Philip made no answer to it, although every man looked he would have answer red him in rage, and that oftentimes as the other reproued him, he bit it in with his teeth; but yet as if he had not bene offended at all with the bigge words his fonne had spoken against him. (for that he was a civill man, and mild of nature,) he tooke Aratus the father by the hand, and caried him out of the Theater where the affembly was kept, to the castell of Ithome, to do sa crifice there to Inpiter, and to fee the fort. This fort was of no leffe frength then the castell of the Acrocorinth; and when any garrifon is in it, it keepeth all the countrey about it in obedience: and besides it is very hard to drive them out of it. Now Philip being gotten vp into that castell, he did facrifice there; and when the Soothsayer had brought him the intrailes of the oxe. which they had facrificed, he tooke it himselfe with both his hands, and shewed them vnto Aratus, and to Demetrius PHALERIAN, now turning to the one, then to the other, and asked them what they judged of these signes of the facrifice: whether he should keepe the castell to himselfe, or else deliuer it to the Messinians. Demetrius smiling, answered him: If thou beefe of the Soothfayers minde, then thou shalt deliuer it vp: but if thou hast a Kings minde in thee; thou shalt then hold the oxe by both hornes. (By the oxe, he ment the countrie of Palo-PONNESUS: and moreouer, that if he kept both these castels, of Ithome and the Acrocorinth, all PELOPONESUS were wholy at his commandement.) Aratus still held his peace, and said not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to speake, he faid: In CRETA, and in the countrie of the Bosorians and Phocians, there are many strong castels situated on high hils from the vallies. Moreouer, there are also many places of great strength in the marches of the Acarna-NIANS, both within maine land, as also vpon the scacoast: of all the which thou hast not taken one of them by force, and yet they all do willingly obey the enotwithstanding. It is for thecues to hide their heads in high rocks and mountaines, but a King can have no stronger cassell, then the loue, faith, and goodwill of men. That is it, that opened the sea of CRETA. That is it, that hath brought thee into Peloponnesus. Those are the meanes which have made thee being fo yong a man, some of them to choose thee their Captaine, and others also to make thee their absolute Lord and Master. Aratus going on with his tale, Philip gaue the intrailes againe to the Soothfayer that brought them, and taking Aratus by the hand (as if by force he had casthim out of the castell, and had also taken the citie of Mussina from him; faid vnto him: Come on then, let vs cuen take that courfe. But after that time, Aratus came as little to the court as might be, and so by little and little left Philips company. For when he went to make warre in the Realme of EPIRVs, he was earnestly in hand with Aratus to go that iourney with him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excused, and so remained at home, being afraid to be brought into an cuill name with Philips doings. For Philip afterwards having shamefully lost his armie by sea against the Romaines; and besides, having had also very ill successe in all other his affaires, he returned againe to Peloponnesvs, and thought once more to have deceived the MESSINIANS. But when they found his practife, then he beganne with open force to spoyle their countrey, Aratus then flatly fell out with Philip, and vtterly refused his friendship, for that he perceived then the iniurie he had done his fonnes wife, the which grieved him to the heart; but yet he made not his fon priny to it, because he could get no other ameds, then to know what iniury had bene done to him, confidering that he had no way nor meanes to be reuenged. For king Philip was maruelloufly changed, and from a courteous and chaft yong Prince, become a vitious and cruell tyrant: the which to speake truely, was not a change or alteration

The roife answer of Aratus TH to king Philip, ecuching the fafet's of a Prince.

Aratasthe father for-Jocke I hi.

Philip of a courteous Prince be in nature, but a manifest declaration (when he was no more afraid of any man) of his wicked and divellish mind, the which through feare had of long time bene kept fecret. Now, to prove that Philips first love & good wil he bare vnto Araius, was also mingled with feare & reverence; that which he did afterwards vnto him did plainely fliew it. For he being defirous to put Aratus to death, nor thinking himfelf free fo long as he lined, neither king, nor tyrantihe durft not go about to kill him him lelfe, but procured one of his Captaines called Taurion, & commanded him to make him away as fecretly as he could possible, & specially with poyson in his absence. This Taurion fell in friendship with Aratus, and poisoned him with no violent poyson, but so tempe- Aratus poyred and qualified it, as it did by litle and litle heate the body, and procure a pretie cough which fored by brought him into a consumption. Aratus knew he was poyfoned: but because he saw it booted notto bewray it, he bare it patiently, and made no words of it, as if he had had some natural difcase about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefest friends being in his chamber with him, who wodered to see him spit bloud as he did:he told him; Friend Caphalon mine, this is the reward of akings loue. So he died of this poy fon in the city of Æ grv M, being the feuenteenth time chosen friendship General of y Achaians, who would have had him buried in the felfe same place, & have made the death fomehonorable monument for him, worthie of his noble life. But the SICYONIANS thinking of Aratus. themselves dishonoured; if his bodie were buried any where else but in their owne citie, they so perswaded the counsell of the Achaians, that they suffered them to take Aratus bodie with the. Yet was therean ancient law that forbad buriall within the walles of the city, of any maner ofperson whatsoeper: and besides that law, they had a certaine superstitious feare in them, that made them they durst not. Whereupon they fent to Apolloes temple at DELPHES, to aske counsell of his Nunne that gaue the Oracles, who made them this answer:

Thou bappy foile of Sicyon, Aratus native place, Whereas thou asketh counsell in that noble Captaines case, For keeping of a yeare mind, and for making feastfull daies In honor of that worthy wight to last henceforth alwaies: If any hinder your intent, through fondnesse or through spite, Both sea and land, and heaven it selfe will punish that same wight.

This Oracle being brought, all the ACHAIAN'S were maruellous glad of it, but y SICYONIAN'S specially: who presently changing their mourning into publike ioy, they caried the body from the city of A giv M, and brought it home as in maner of procession, in white robes, and garlands offlowers on their fleads, finging hymmes and fongs of ioy, and dancing, till they came to the citie of SICYONE. And there they chose out the chiefest place, and buried him as their founder, father, and fauiour of their citic: and the place is called at this present time, ARATIVM. There they yearely maketwo folemne facrifices, the one the fifth of Nouember, at which time he de- rearely falincred the city of Sicyone from tyranny, and they call this facrifice Soteria, as much to fay, as the feast of health: and the other on his birth day, as it is reported. For the first facrifice, that honor drawas done by the Priest of Iupiter the fauiour. The second facrifice also was done by Aratris son, this memo. who was girt about with a cloath, not altogether white, but mingled with purple colour. So during the facrifice, they fung hymnes vpon the Harpe in praise of him; and the master of the Mustians made a procession round about, being accompanied with boyes and yong men of the citic, after whom followed the Senate crowned with garlands of flowers, and other citizens that were disposed to go to a procession. How beit the most part of the honors that were appointed to be done vnto him, were left off by processe of time, and change of things that followed afterwards. Thus you fee what the life of Aratus the father hath bene, as we find in histories. The milera. Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, caused his son Aratus also to be poisoned, not with a deadly poyfon, but with such a poyfon as troubleth a mans wits so, that through their draws the dinellish receit, he becometh a starke foole without any wit at al, & maketh him to attept strage strange and abhominable things, and to have certaine shamefull and detestable desires: insomuch as his death (though he died in the prime of his youth) could not be thought milerable, but rather a happy deliuerance to him out of al his miseries & mishaps. But Philip afterwards, so long as he liued, paied vnto Iupiter (protector of all iustice and friendship) the punishment his wicked life described. For, after he was ouercome in battell by the Romaines, he was compelled to yeeld himselfe to their mercie; by whom he was deprined from all the rest of his lands and domini- for him wieons he had, and of all his ships, but fine only, and condemned besides to pay a thousand talents kedness.

Iphicrates faying, what maner of man a mercenary fouldier Should be.

AEmylius faying of > Platees Saying of an arthie.

Demender

Phicrates the Athentan captaine faid, that a mercenary foldier should be couctous, alouer, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleasure, he should be the valianter, and readier to put himself r into any danger. But most men thinke, that souldiers should be as one entire strong body, that stirreth not of it self without v mouing of the Generall. And to approue this opinion, it is faid that Paulus Amylius arriving in MACEDON, and finding the fouldiers full of words and curiofity (euery man medling with the affaires of the Generall) he made open proclamation, No man so hardie to meddle with his office & affaires but every man only to keep his fword tharp, & tobe quick of hand againft the enemy; and for the rest, to refer alto him, who wold take sufficient order for things of his charge & gouernment. Therfore Plato faith, that it little auaileth to haue a good and wife Captaine, if the fouldiers also be not wise and obedient; thinking it as requisite for the vertue of obedience, to have men of a noble mind and good education, as otherwife it is meete for a Captaine to know how todirect and command well; confidering it is that which with lenitie and mildneffe doth mitigate all fury & choler. He hath divers other examples & fufficient proofes to prove his words true; and namely, the great miseries & calamities which came to the Romains after v death of Nero, do plainly flew, that nothing is more dangerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, the a great army liuing licentiously & disorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexader the great, compared Alexandersarmy vnto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out confidering how blindly & loofly

they were gouerned. How beit the Empire of Rom a being deuided into fundrie factions at one filtrime and rifing against it felf in many places, it fel into the like misfortunes & calamities fained by the Poets of the Titans; not fo much through the ambitious field of the Emperors; as The Empire by meanes of the couetousnesse and insolency of the soldiers, who draue the Emperors out of wherete their Imperial seates one after another as one naile driveth out another. And Dionysius also the furant of Sicile, was wont to call Phareus (who had bin tyrant of Thessalia onely ten moneths space) a tyrant in a play, deriding his so sudden change of state. But the Imperial house of the Calars at ROME, received foure Emperors, in lesse then ten moneths space, the soldiers now nutting in one, and then taking out another, as if they had bene in a play on a feaffold; So that the ROMAINES being thus grieuoully oppressed, had yet this comfort; that they needed not to seeke to be reuenged of them that did oppresse them. For they saw one of them murther another, and him first and most justly of all other murthered, that had first of all corrupted the soldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the change of the Emperors; and fo depraying a worthy deed of infelfe, which was their for laking of Nero; and mingling it with briberie, made it plaine treason. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being Captaine of the Emperors guard, which are called the Prætorian foldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he faw Nero in despaire of himselfe and of his e- Tigellinus, flate, and that he was ready to flie into ÆGYPT: he perfwaded the guard they should call Galba Nero. Emperor, as if Nero had not bene at Rome, but fled and gone, and promited every one feven thousand five hundred Drachmaes apeece: and to the rest of the souldiers that were dispersed ypand downe in garrifon ypon the provinces, twelue hundred and fiftie Drachmaes a man. For the leavying of which furnine, they could not possibly do it, but they must needs comit ten thoufand times more extortion on every body, then Nero had done. This large promife made them presently put Nero to death, and shortly after him, Gaiba himselfe also. For the soldiers for sooke New, for the hope they had to receive this promifed gift: and shortly after they flue the second, which was Galba, because they received not their gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwards also, in seeking who should still feed them with like gifts, before they could obtaine gifts do their wished hope, one of the destroyed another by treason and rebellion. But now to set down frozed the all things particularly which hapned at that time, it were to write one whole entire historic; and Reme, therefore, I will content my felfe, not to passe ouer with silence the notablest deeds, and lamentablecalamities, which happened at that time vnto the Cafars.

Itis manifestly known to all men, that Sulpitius Galbs of a private man, was the richest & wealthieft that came to be in the number of the Cafars: who, though he came of a very noble house, and publicderiving him selfe from the race & family of the Serny; yet he was honored the more, because he seed Galwas akin vnto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue & estimation, was one of the chiefest men of his time, albeit that otherwise he willingly resigned his authority and power vnto others. So Galba thereby was somewhat akin vnto Liuia the wife of Augustus Casar, and therefore for her sake he came out of the Emperors pallace, whe he went to take possession of his Consulship. Moreover his reported, that whe he had charge of the army in GERMANY, he did valiatly behaue himfelf. And in the gouernment of Libia also, where he was Vice-confull, he did as honorably behaue himselfe, as any man whatsoeuer. Howbeit his meane and simple ordinary of diet, voide of all Galbate excelle, was reputed mifery and niggardlineffe in him, when he was proclaimed Emperor: because the practise of sober and temperate diet which he would haue brought in vse, was then so raw athing, that it was taken for a new & strange deuice. He was sent gouernor also into Spaine by Nero, before he had learned to be afraid of the citizens of great authority: howbeit, befides that he was of accourteous & gentle nature, his age moreover increased the opinion they had of Galbani him, that he was timerous and feareful. For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vexe conteste. and torment the provinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to helpe them: yet was it some cofortto them, which were judged & fold as flaues by the officers, to fee that Galba did lamet the mileries & calamities they endured as if they had bin done vnto himself. So whe any fladerous rimes were made against Nero, which were fong vp & downe in euery place, he would neither forbid the, nor yet was offended as Neroes officers were. Therefore he was maruelloufly beloled in the countrey, of them that were acquainted with him: because he was then in the eight Yeare of his government as Procoful amongst the, at which time Iunius Vindex being Proprietor Iunius Vindex of GAVLE, rebelled against Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba, before he entred described as diuerfe others which were gouernors of armies and provinces did: who fent Vindex letters vnto Nero which he himselfe had written vnto them, and so did as much as in them lay to him. der the enterprise, who afterwards being of the cospiracy did confesse they were traitors to the felues, as much as vnto him. Howbeit when Vindex afterwards had proclaimed ope war against Nero, he wrote againe vnto Galba, and praied him to take the Imperiall crowne vpon him, and to become the head of a strong and mightie bodie (which were the GAVLES) that lacked no. thing but a head & gouernor, being a hundred thousand fighting me ready armed, & might also leauic a great number more of them. Then Galba consulted the rupon with his friends, & among them fome were of opinion that he should stay a while, to see what change and alteration would grow at Rome vponthis stirre. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Pratorian band, said vn. to him: O Galba, what meaneth this fo doubtfull a deliberation? Be not we wife men, to call in questió, whether we shal allow of Vindex friendship; or accuse him; yea, & with armes persente him, that defired rather to have thee Emperor, then Nerotyrant over the state of Rome! After. wards Galba by bils fet vp encry where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchize fuch as would make suite for it. This rumor flying straight abroad, he gathered a great number of soldierstoge. ther, that were very willing to rebel; and he was no fooner gotten vp into the tribunall or chaire of state, but all the souldiers did salute him by the name of Emperor. Howbeit he was not coten with this name at the first, but accusing Nero, & lamenting the death of the noblest men whom he had cruelly put to death, he promifed that he would employ his best wit and discretion to the feruice and benefit of his countrey, neither naming himfelfe Cafar, nor Emperor, but only Lieu. tenant to the Senate, & state of Rome. Now, that Vindex did wisely to cal Galba to be Emperor. Nero himself in his doings doth witnesse it: who having alwayes made a countenance as though he passed not for Vindex, & that he weighed not the rebellion of the GAVLES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperour, being then at Supper, for spite he ouerthrew thetable. Morcouer, though & Senate had judged Galba an enemy, yet Nero to be pleasant with his friends. made as though he was nothing afraid of it, & faid, This news made al for him, because he flood in need of mony, & also that it was a happy occasion offered him to helpe him withall. For faid he, we shall soone haue all the GAVLES goods, as the spoile of a just warre, after we haueonceagaine ouercome & conquered them: and moreover, Galbaes goods also would quickly beinhis hands, that he might fel them, confidering that he was become his open enemy. So he presently commanded Galbacs goods should be openly fold, to them that would give most. Galba viderstanding that, did allo by sound of trumpet sell all Neroes goods he had in all the province of SPAINE, and did also find more men readier to buy, the there were goods to sel. Daily mentose against Nero in enery country, who tooke Galbaes part, Clodius Macer only excepted in Africa, and Verginius Rufus in GAV LE, both of them having charge of legios appointed for the lafekeeping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow feuerall directions by themselues, varying in mind & intent. For Clodius Macer having robbed much & put divers men alfo to death through his crueltie and couetousnesse, shewed plainly, that he swam betweene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, not yet keepe it. Verginius also on the other fide, being generalloper great & mightic legions, who had fundry times called him Emperor, and did in maner force him to take vpon him the name & Empire: he notwithstanding did ever answerthem, that he neither minded to take y Empire vpon him, nor yet to fuffer any other to do it, then fuch as the Senate should chuse & cal vnto the same. This at the first somewhat amazed Galba. But whe both the armies of Vindex & Verginius, in spite of their Captaines (who could not stay nor keep them backe, no more then coach-men can keepe backe the horse with their bridles) were joyned in a great battell together, where were flain 20000 GAVI Es in the field & Vindex also flue himself thortly after it was given out, that the conquerors after to great a victory obtained, would copel Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperor, or else that they would take Nerges part again. Then Galba being not a litle perplexed, wrote vnto Verginius, & perfwaded him to ioyne with himto hold vpthe Empire & liberty of the ROMAINS, and therupon fled straight into a city of SPAINE called *Colonia, rather repenting him of that he had done, & wishing for his wonted peaceable and quiet life wherein he was brought vp, the otherwise occupying himself about any needfary or profitable thing for the furtherance of his enterprise, Now it was about the beginning of fommer, & one day towards euening, there came to Galba one of his slaues enfrachised, a Siei-LIAN born, that was come from Rom in seuen daies: who vnderstanding that Galba was alone, went presently to his chamber dore, and opened it, and coming in against the wils of the grooms of the chamber, that stood at the dore, he told him, that Nero being yet aliue, but seene no more. first the people of Rome, and then the Senate had proclaimed him Emperor & that immediatly after newes came that Nero was dead: the which he hardly beleeuing notwithstanding, went thither himfelf, faw his body laid out vpon y ground, and then made towards him with all freed to bring him these newes. The newes maruellously revived Galba, & a multitude of menthronged ftraight about the dore, which began to be couragious, feeing him liuely again, although the need of the messenger seemed incredible. Howbeit two daies after, Titus also arrived, with cerraine others of the camp, who told Galba particularly what the Senate had decreed in his behalf. So this Titus was called to great honor: and the flaue enfranchifed had priviledge given him to weare rings of gold & he was called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the enfranchifed bondmen, became the chiefest man about his master Galba. In the meane time, Nymphidius Sa-BINE began at ROM B, not covertly, but with open force, to take upon him the absolute government of the Empire, perswading himselfe that Galba was so old, that he could hardly be brought taketh poor in a litter vnto Rome, being at the least 73 yeares old: besides also, that the army of y Pr Æro- Emperour. RIANS which were in Rome, did beare him good wil of long time, & then acknowledged none other Lord but him only, for the large promise he had made the, for the which he received the thanks, and Galba remained the debter. So he prefently comanded Tigellinus, his companion and Captaine with him of the army of the PR ETORIANS, to leave off his fword and disposing himfelfeto banqueting and feafting, he fent for all those that had bin Consuls, Prætors, or Procosuls of provinces, & made them all to be invited in the name of Galba. So, there were certain foldiers gage out this rumor in the campe, that they should do well to fend Ambassadors vnto Galba, to pray him that Nymphidius might be their only Captaine stil, without any copanion joyned with him. Furthermore, the honor & good wil the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactor, & going daily to visit him in his house, procuring him to be the author of all their decrees to Namphipassed in Senate, & that he should authorise the this made him high minded, and the bolder by much in fo much that shortly after, they that came to honor him in this fort, did not only hate & made him missike his doings, but moreouer he made the afraid of him. Furthermore, whethe Consuls had grow too bild and ingiven to common pursuants any commissions under seale or letters patents signifying the decrees of the Senate, to cary them to the Emperor (by vertue of which letters patents, when the officers of the citie do fee the feale, they straight provide the pursuants of coaches and fresh horses to further their speed and hastic iourney;) Nymphidius was very angrie with the, because they did not also come to him for his letters, sealed by him & his soldiers, to send likewise to the Emperor. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to have deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing themselucs vnto him, and crauing pardon, did appeale his anger. And to please the commons also, he suffered them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could Neroes meete withall. Among other, they flue a fencer called Spicillus, whom they put vnder Ne- friends rus statues, which they dragged up and downe the citic. Another also called Aponius, one of Nerous accusers, they threw him to the ground, & draue carts ouer him loden with stones. And diuerse others also, whom they flue in that maner, of the which some haddone no maner of of commandefence. Hereupon one Maurifeus, one of the noblest men of the citie, and so esteemed, said openly in the Senate: I feare me we shall wish for Nero againe, before it belong. So Nymphidius beingcome in maner to the fulnesse of his hope, he was very glad to heare that some repined at The parenhim, because he was the sonne of Caius Casar, that was the next Emperor after Tiberius. For this tage of Caius Casar, when he was a yong man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had bin a faire yong Nymphidi woman, and the daughter of one Callifus, one of Cafars enfranchifed bondmen, whom he had gotten of a laundresse he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Cains Cafar could know his mother: and men thought that he was begotten of a fencer called Martianus, with whom his mother Nymphidia fell in fancie, for that he had a great name at that time in Rome; and indeed Nymphidius was liker to him in fauor, then vnto any other. So, he cofessed that he was the son of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did ascribe the glory of the death of Nero vnto himself, & thought himself not sufficiently recopenced with the honors they gaue him, neither also with the goods he enloyed, neither for that he lay with Sporus who Mero loued ^{fo} dearly, whom he fent for to Neroes funerals whileft his body was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife, and called him Poppaus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet secretly he aspired to be Emperor, partly practifing the matter in Rome it selfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senators which were fecretly his friends: and partly also through one Gellianus, whom he fent into Spaine, to fee how all things went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things prospered with Galba, fauing Verginius Rusus only, who flood doubtful yet, & made him forely mistrust him; for that he was afraid (besides that he was Gene. rall ouer a great and puissant army, having also newly overthrown Vindex, & secretly ruling the best part of the Empire of Rome, which was all GAVLE, and then in tumult & vprore, ready to rebell,) left he would hearken vnto them that perswaded him to take the Empire to himself. For there was no Captaine of Rome at that time to famous, and of to great estimation as Verginius and that deservedly, for that he had done great service to the Empire of Rome in time of extremitie, having deliuered Rome at one selfe time from a cruell tyrannie, and also from the danger of the warres of the GAVLES. This notwithstanding, Verginius persisting still in his first determination, referred the election of the Emperour vnto the Senate: although, that after the death of N ero was openly knowne, the common fort of foldiers were earneftly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the foldiers (otherwise called a Colonell of a thousand men) went into his tent with a fword drawne in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperor, orele to look to have the fivord thrust into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Captaine of a legion, was fworne vnto Galba, & that he had received letters from Rome, advertifing him of the ordinance and decree of the Senate: in the end, with much ado, he perswaded the souldiers to proclaime Galba Emperor, who fent Flaccus Ordeonius to fucceed him, vnto whom he willingly gaue place. So, when Verginius had delinered up his army unto him, he went to meet with Galba, on whom he waited, coming on still towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither shewed him enill countenance, nor yet greatly effected of him, Galba himfelfe being cause of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but specially Titus Iunius: who for the malice he bare vnto Varginius thinking to hinder his rifing, did vnwittingly indeed further his good hap, and deliucted him occasion to draw him out of the civill warres and mischiefs (the which lighted afterwards vpon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambassadors were sent fro the Senate, & met with Galba at NAREONA, a city of GAYLE; where after they had presented their humble duty, they perswaded him to make all thehalthe could possible to shew himselfe to the people of Rome, who were maruellously desirous to see him. Galba received them very graciously and courteously, and made them greatcheare, howbeit very modestly. For notwithstanding that Nymphidius had sent him diverse officers, and store of Neroes moueables: yet he would neuer be served with any of them, at any seasts or banquets he made, nor with other then his owne stuffe; wherein he shewed his noble mind, and how he could master all vanity. But Titus lunius shortly aftertold Galba, that this noble mind, & civill moderation, without pride or pompe, was too lowly a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine respect of honesty that knew not it selfe, and became not his greatnesse and maiestie. So, he perswaded him to vse Neroes money and stuffe, and to be sumptuous & Princely in his feafts, without niggardlinesse. To conclude, the old man Galba began plainly to shew, that he would be ruled by Titus Iunius: who aboue all other was extreme couctous, and besides too much given to women. For when he was a yong man, the first time he went to the warres vnder Calussus Sabine, he brought his Captaines wife (which liked good fellowship) disguised likea fouldier into the campe, into his Generals tent (which the Romains called Principia) and there was somewhat bold with her. Wherfore Cains Casar committed him to prison, but heefcaped at his death. Another time, whe he supped with Clodius Casar, he stole a silver pot. Clodius hearing of it, bade him againe to supper the next night: but he commanded his menthey should giue him drinke in a earthen cruse. Thus this theft (through Casars pleasantnesse) seemed rather a matter of sport, then of anger: howbeit the faults which he committed afterwards through extreme conetonfinesse of money (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the sway about him) gaue vnto some iust cause, and vnto others apparent colour of tragicall mischiefes, and grieuous calamities. For Nymphidius, to foone as Gellianus was returned out of Spaine, whom he had fent thither to see what Galba did, informing him that Cornelius Lacon was Captaine of the guard and house of the Emperor; and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could never be suffered to come neare Galba, nor to speake with him apart, because those which were about Galba did mistrust him, and euer had an eye to him to see what he did; he was maruellously perplexed perplexed withall. Thereupon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and pettie Captaines of the campe of the Prætorian armie, and perfwaded them that Galba touching his owne perfon. was a good old and discreet man, howbeit that he did not follow his own eaduice and counsel, but was ruled altogether by Iunius & Lacon, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good (beforethey came to be of greater power, and to have such great authoritie in managing the affaires of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before) to fend Ambassadors to the Emperor, in the name of all the campe, to tell him that in putting those two men from about him, he should be the better welcome to Romn, and to all men else besides. The Captaines veterly misliked this deuice. For they thought it too strange, and beyond all reason, to seeme to teach an old Emperour, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: and to appoint him what feruants and friends he should keepe, & whom he should trust or mistrust. Nymphydius perceiuing this, tookeanother course, and wrote letters vnto Galbato terrific him; one time sending him word that he was maruellous euill beloued of many in Rome, and that they were readie to rebell against him: another time also that the legions of GERMANIE were revolted, and that he vnderflood the like from the legions of Ivri and Syria and another time also that Clodius Macer in AFRICK E stayed all the ships fraughted with corne that were bound for Rome. But in the end finding that Galba made no account of him, and that he gaue no credit to his words nor writings, hedetermined first of al to set vpon him. Howbeit Clodius Celsus, born in the city of Antioch, awife man, and his faithful friend, diffwaded him maruelloufly not to do it; declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one house nor family in Rome that would call Nymphidius, Casar. Howbeit in contrary manner, divers others mocked Galba, and specially one Mithridates of the Realme of Pont, that faid he was a bald writhen man. For the Romain's (faid he) have him indeed now in some estimation: but when they have once seene him, they wil think it a perpetual hame and reproch to our time, that he was called Cafar. So they thought it good to bring Nymwhidius about midnight into the camp, & there openly to proclaime him Emperor, Howbeit the of datonius chiefe Tribune of the fouldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his fouldiers together in the Honoratus, night, and before them all did first openly reproue himselfe, and then them, for that they had so offenturned and changed in fo short time, without any wit or discretion, having no judgement to chase the best way, but to be pricked forward & caried headlong in that fort by some wicked spirit, which brought the out of one treason into another. And yet (faid he) our first change had some countenance of reason, to wit, the horrible vices and faults of Nero: but now wherein can we accuse Galba, to have any countenance to falsifie our faith vnto him? hath he slaine his mother thath he put her to death? hath he shamefully played the tumbler or common player vpona scaffoldin v Theater: And yet for all these vile parts, we neuer durst once begin to forsake Nero, but gaue credit to Nymphidius words, who told vs that Nero had first for faken vs, and that he was fled into ÆGYPT. What shall we do? shall we kill Galba after Nero: what shall we kil him that is a kin vnto Liuia, to make the sonne of Nymphidia Emperor, as we have already slaine the sonne of Agrippina? or shall we rather kill him that hath rashly entred into this enterprise, and thereby to reuenge the death of Nero, and to shew our selues faithfull souldiers vnto Galba: All the souldiers yeelded straight to the Colonels words, and therewith went to their other companions to perfwade them to keepe their faith and promife they auowed vnto the Emperor: fo that they made many of them revolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereupon the noise and cries being great, Nymphidius supposing (as some thought) that the souldiers did call for him, or else hoping betimes to quench this tumult to flay fuch as were yet wauering : he went thither himselfe with great store supports oftorch light, and caried an oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, and the which he had learned without book to speake vnto the soldiers. But when he found the gates of the campe shut, and saw divers men armed vpon the wals, he began to be afraid: and coming nearer, asked them what they meant by it, and by whose commandement they had armed themselues as they did. Answer was made him by them all, that they acknowledged no other Empefor but Galba: the which he feemed to like of , and also commanded them that followed him to do the like, & therewithall drew nearer. Whereupon certain of the fouldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and fuffered him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit as loone as he was come in first there was a dart throwne at him, the which one Septimius that went before him received upon his shield and then others also came with their swords drawn in their Nymphidi-

hands to fet vpon him, and followed him as he fled into a fouldiers cabine, where they flue him. "Sabine

the next day fee it. So Nymphidius being flain in this fort, Galba vnderstanding of his death, commanded that all Nymphidius friends and confederators that had not bin flain at that time, should for his fake be put to death, as indeed they were. Amongst the they flue Giconius that had made the oration for Nymphidius, and Mithridates also of Pont. Howbeit, though indeed they had doferued it, yet menthought it a very cruell part to command these men to be put to death in that fort, which were men of such qualitie and calling as they were, without due forme and order of law. For every man flood in good hope vpon the coming in of this new Emperour, to have feene another manner of government then they had yet feene: howbeit they were deceived of their hope at the first chop. But yet they misliked this most of all, when he commanded themto kill Petronius Tertullianus, that had bene Confull, because he was Neroes faithfull friend. But now for the death of Clodius Macer, whom Trebonianus flue in AFRICKE by his commandement, and for Ponteius that was also flaine in GERMANIE by Valens, he had some reason to feare them because they were in armes, & commanded great armies. But for Tertullianus, that was an old man. naked and ynarmed, truly he should have put him to his triall by law, if he would have ministred iustice, the which he promised to keepe at his first coming to the Imperiall crowne. Hereinthey greatly reproued Galba. Now when he drew neare to Rom E within five & twenty furlongs, he was compassed about with a multitude of mariners & sea-faring men, that kept the high way on euery fide, wandering vp & down in euery place. Thefe were the men whom Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the oare and made them fouldiers. So they were come thither to be futers to him, that he would allow them still to be fouldiers; and they pressed so arrogantly upon him, that they would not suffer those which came to the new Emne. ror, to fee him nor fpeake with him, but they fel to tumult & vprore, crying out to have enfigues for their legion, & to be appointed a place to lie in, in garrison. Galba referred them ouer to another time & bade them they should then let him understad their demand. They told him againe that this delay was a kind of deniall, and thereupon fell to plaine mutinie, & followed him with great cries: infomuch that some of them stucke not to draw out their swords. Then Galba commanded the horsemen he had about him, to set vpon them. So there was not a man of them that refifted, but fome of them were overthrown, and troden under their horse sected and others also flaine as they fled. This was a very cuill figne and prefage for him, to enter into Rome with fuch bloudshed, vpon so many poore dead mens bodies as lay slaine on the ground. Howbeit, where fome before did despise & mocke him for an old feeble man, every man then was afraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, because he would shew a great change and alteration from the vnreasonable vaine gifts & expences of Wero, it seemeth he did many vncomely things. As when one Canus an excellent plaier on y recorder, had plaied all supper time, because it was maruellous fweet musick to heare, he praised and commended it maruellously, and commanded one to bring him his casket, out of the which he took a few crowns, and put them into his hand, faying that it was not mony of the common treasure, but of his owne. Furthermore, he gaue straight commandement that they should require and call backe agains the gifts Nero had given and bestowed vpon common players, minstrels, wrestlers, and people of such kind of facultie and profession, and to leave them onely the tenth part. But he got litle by this device. For the most part of those that had gifts given them, had spent and consumed it all, as men that lived without any rule or order, & spent at night that which they got in the day; and besides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them restore it agains. But this was an endlesse worke for things had bene so conueved from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinit number of mens hands. But of all this, the shame and dishonor returned to Galba himself, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Innius: who only made the Emperour straight-laced to all others, whilest he himselfe tooke vnreasonably of all men, making port-fale of every thing that came to hand. For He fiedus the Poet faith: As well when the vessell is full that it spill, Hefiodus faying.

As when it is emptie, thir it craueth drinke fill. But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be old and feeble, would wifely take his fortune and time while time serued, supposing it almost to be at an end so soone as he began to enter into it. So in the meanetime he did much dishonour the poore old man, ouer-greatly abusing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefest and weightiest matters, in reprouing, or altogether hindering those,

the which the Prince him felf had a good defire to deale verightly in, as to punish the officers of Galbani Nero. For he put some of them to death, among the which Elius was one, and certaine other, as leth Neroet Polyclitus, Petinus, and Patrobius: whereat the people maruelloufly reloyced, and cried out as officer. they went ro execution through the market place, that it was a goodly and bleffed proceffion. and required Tigellinus of the gods and men, that had bene chiefe mafter and guide of all Nernes tyrannie. How beit the trim man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Innius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, and had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of the wicked parts he played when he was aliue. Whereas he that made Nero worthy of eath, and that afterwards had also betraved him, was let alone, and nothing faid vnto him; being a manifest proofe to all others. that they should not doubt to hope to obtain any thing at Titus Iunius hands, so they fed him with gifts. For the commo people of Rome neuer defired any thing fo much as to fee Tigellinus to be caried to execution; and they never left crying out to demand him in all affemblies of the Theater or shew place, vntill such time as the Emperor Galba did forbid them by proclamation. the which declared that Tigellinus would not live long, because he was ficke of a consumption of the lungs, which by litle and litle did weare him to nothing; and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloudy. The people were much offended with this, but yet they feemed to laugh at it: & Tigellinus did facrifice to the gods for his health & fafety, and prepared a sumptuous feast. Where Iunius rising from supper, being set by the Emperor, went vnto Tigellinus to be merry with him, and tooke his daughter being a widow with him, vnto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offered her agift of fine & twentie Myriades of filuer: and commanded one of his chiefest concubines to take from her necke a carcanet she wore, being worth fifteene Myriades, and to give it the other. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done vprightly and with instice, were reproued and taken in euill part; as the thing that was granted to the GAVLES, because they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the subsidies and taxes they were wont to pay, nor that they were made free of Rome, for much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Iunius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the people hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the foldiets still lived in good hope, for the gift that was promised them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promifed them, yet they should enjoy as much as Nero had given them. But Galba vnderstanding that they complained of him, spake aword meet for so noble & worthy a Prince as he was: that he vsed to chuse soldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the soldiers, it bred a maruellous mortall hatred in them against him: because they thought it was not only totake the gift away from the which they hopedprefently to have received, but that it was also a president to teach the Emperors that shold galba of come after him, what they should do. How beit the rebelling mindes of the Prætorian guard at finded the Rome appeared not yet, but was fecretly kept in for the reverence they bare vnto the maiefty & fouldiers. person of Galba, who kept them that were desirous to rebell, because they saw as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did fomewhat smother & keepe in the shew of their wickedintent. But they which had before served under Verginius, and were at that time under Placcusin Germanie, thinking themselves worthy of great reward for the battell they had won against Vindex, and having nothing given them in recompence, they would not be pleased with any thing their Captaine said vnto them, neither did they make any account of Flaccus, because he could not stirre himselfe, he was so plagued with the gout, and besides that, he had no maner of experience in warres. So one day when certaine sports were made, at the bringing in of the which, the Colonels & Captaines (according to the maner of the Romaines) made praiers vnto the gods for y health & prosperity of the Emperor Galba: there were divers of the that made anoile at the first and afterwards when the Captaines continued on their prospers, in the end to anoisear the first, and afterwards when the Captaines continued on their praiers, in the end the of the Ro. foldiers answered: If they be worthy. The legions in like maner under Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes vse such insolent parts: whereof Galbaes officers did aduertise him by letters. Wherfore Galba being afraid, & mistrusting that they did not only despise him for his age, but also because he had no childre, he determined to adopt some yong gentlema for his son, of the noblest house of y city of Rome, & to proclaime him his successor in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble house, but ever given to sensualitie and pleasure from his cradle, as much as any Romaine could be. And as Homer ofterimes doth call Paris y husbad of the faire Helen, ners.

fo otho came to be knowne in Rome, by marying Poppaa, whom Nero loued when the was Cric pinus his wife: howbeit, bearing some respect to his wife, and being affraid also of his mother, he had inticed othe to be his baud vnto her. Nere loued othe dearely, and much delighted in his companie, because he was so good a fellow and free of his flesh; and was very glad sometime to heare how he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was annointing himself with precious oyles & perfumes, he cast a litle vpon otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feaft in his house, where sodainly were thrust into the hal, divers vessels of gold and filuer ful of this perfumed oyle, that ran out of the like conduit water, & did wetall the hall. So Otho having first possessed Porpea, and abused her vnder hope of Neroes love, he perfwaded her to be divorced from her husbad. The which she did, & he received her home to his owne house, as his lawfull wife, not being so wel pleased to have part, as he was fory & angryal. fo to let another enjoy her. Now Poppea her self (as it is reported) did not mislike this his icloufie for fometimes the would that her doore against Nero, though Otho were not within either because the would keepe Nero in breath, and in loue-liking still, or else as some thought, because the would not have Cafer to her husband; and likewife that the would not refuse him for her friend, because he was wantonly given. But so it is, Otho was in danger of his life by marying of Poppagiand fo was it also a strange thing, that Mero having put his wife & fifter to death, onely to marry Poppea, he did yet pardon Othos & faued his life. Howbeit it was for Senecaes fake that was his friend, through whose perswasion he was sent to y farthest part in Spain a along the Ocean fea, to be governor of Lystrania. And there he governed to wifely, that he was nothing chargeable nor trouble fome vnto the country knowing that this honorable charge was give him only to mitigate and hide his banishment. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the first of all the Gouernors of the prouinces that joyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both gold and filuer, vnto the mint-master, he gaue it him to put into bullion, and so to be converted into currat coine, Moreouer, he gaue of his officers vnto Galba, those which he thought the meetest men to serue a Prince: and otherwise when he was tried, he shewed himselfe as faithfulland skilful in matters of state as any one that followed the Emperors traine. In somuch as altheway he went many dayes journey in coach with Galba himfelf, & did maruelloufly durry fauor with Titus Iunius, bestowing great gifts vpon him, & also entertaining him with pleasant speeches.but specially, because he willingly gaue him the upper hand, wherby he was assured to be the second person in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Junius, for that he granted mens fuits frankly & freely without one penie taking, and was befides eafie to be spoken with of euery manthat had any fuite to him: but specially of the foldiers, whom he did greatly help and further, & caused divers also to be called to honorable office, he himself partly moving y Emperor for them, without any labour or fuite made vnto him, and partly also obtaining them at Innins hands, and of the two infranchifed bondmen of Galba, Icellus, and Assaicus. For these threemen Othors pra. did beare al the fway & credit about the Emperor in the court. Moreover, alwaies when he inuited the Emperor to his house, he bristed the Pratorian guard that waited you him, and gauceucry soldier a crown. Now this in fight, seemed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperor with: though indeed it was a fine deuice to ouerthrow him, to bribe the foldiers in that fort as he did. So Galba confulting whom he should make his successor, T. Iunius preferred otho vnto him: the which he did not fimply of himself, nor without reward, but only with promise that otho should mary his daughter, if Galba did adopt him his sonne, and proclaime him successor in the Empire. Howbeit, Galba did alway specially regard the comonwealth before his private liking, & sought to adopt fuch a one as should not so much please himselfe, as otherwise should be profitable and meet for the Empire. But furely in my opinion Galba would not make Otho heire of his goods, confidering what an vnreafonable spender he was, and how sumptuous in all his things, and befides, far gone in debt: for he ought aboue five thousand Myriades. So when he had heard Innius counsel about this adoption, he gently without other answer, did put ouer his determination vntil another time, and made otho only Conful at that time, and T. Iunius Conful with him: whereby it was straight supposed, that at the beginning of the new yeare, he would proclaime him his fucceffor in the Empire. Which was the thing the fouldiers most defired of all other. But now, delaying still his determination, the legions of the Romaines in Germany, did rife and rebel against him all at an instant. For he was generally hated of all his fouldiers, because he paid them not the gift he had promifed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alledged for their cause of rifing, that he had dishonorably rejected Verginius Rusus; and that the GAV LES which had fought against them, were rewarded with great and rich priviledges, and they that tooke not part with Vindex, had bene grieuously punished and put to death. Moreouer, that Galba did onely honour Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his good will vnto him. offering publike oblations and funerall facrifices for him, as if by him only he had bene proclaimed Emperour. Now fuch speeches and rumors ranthrough the campamongst them, when the first day of the yeare came, which the Romains call the Calends of Ianuary, on which day whe Flaceus had called the fouldiers together, to fweare them to the Emperour according to the cusome they plucked downe Galbaes images, and sware onely in the name of the people and Se-The Galda. nare of Rome. The Captaines seeing what course they tooke, were as much afraid of the danger diere dore robe without a head, as they stood doubtful of the mischief of their rebellion. So there stept vp Galba. one among it them and faid: My fellowes in armes, what do we meaner we neither chuse any other Emperor, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperor at this present; wherby we shew plainly, that we do not onely refuse Galba, but also all other to be our head and Emperor that may command vs. Now for Flaceus Ordconius, that is but Galbaes shadow and image, I would wish we houldlet him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, Gouernor of the lower Germany, he is not far from vs, but one dales iourney only, whose father was Censor at Rome, & thrice also Confull, and that was in a maner a Peere and companion of Clodius Cafar in the government of the Empire: whose pouerty if any man missike in him, is a manifest proofe of his goodnes and magnanimitic. Him therefore let vs chuse, and let the world know that we can tell how to chuse an Emperour, better then the Spaniar Ds or Lysitanians. Some of the fouldiers that frood by, confirmed these words, but others misliked of them: insomuch that among the rest there was an enfigne-bearer that stole secretly out of the campe to carie Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great supper, and had great store of good company with him. These newes running firaight through his campe; Fabius Valens Colonell of a legion, came the next morning with a great number of horsemen, and was the first manthat named Vitellius Emperor, who before seemedio refuse that name, as one that was afraid to take the charge of so great an Empire vpon him: but after dinner, being full of wine and meate, he came out among them, and accepted the Vitellius name of Germanicus which they gauchim, and refused the name of Casar. But therewith all incontinently after, Flaceus fouldiers leaving their goodly popular oath which they had fworne in Germanical thename of the people and Senate, they all then took their othes faithfully to do what it should but not of please the Emperour Vitellius to command them. Thus Vitellius was chosen Emperour in Gen-Vitellius MANIE. So Galba hearing of this new change, thought it not good to deferre time longer for named Emthe adoption he had intended: wherefore certainely understanding that those whom he trusted four by the most about him, were parties in this matter, some taking part with Dolabella, and the most part of them with Othe, neither liking the one nor the other, fodginly without any word spoken to any man, he fent for Pife (that was the yonger fonne of Grasius and Pife, whom Nero had put to death) a yong man faire conditioned, and shewed by his graue and modest countenance he had by vertue, that he was indued with many noble vertues. Galba came downe presently from Galba adap. his pallace, and went straight to the campe to proclaime Pifo Cafar, and his successor in the Em- ted Pifohis pire. Howbeit at his fetting out of his pallace, there appeared many great fignes in the firma ment which followed him. And moreover, when he was also come into his compared that Levill fignes.

Entitle fignes. ment which followed him. And moreouer, when he was also come into his campe, and that he appared began to fay without book part of his oration, and partly alfo to reade it, it lightned al the while and sale falls and a manual large his large falls and a manual large f hespake, and there fell such a great shower of raine vpon it, and a maruellous thicke mist in the campe, and ouerall the citie, that men might eafily fee the gods did not like this adoption, and that it wold not prosper. The souldiers themselves shewed their discontenument by their heavy lookes, and the rather, because at that time there was no speech of reward or liberalitie. And furthermore, they that were present also maruelled much (for that they could gather by the countenance and words of Pifo, that Pifo nothing rejoyced at this great fauour, although he lacked not wit and vnderstanding otherwise to acknowledge it. And on the other side also, they found eafily by Othoes lookes, many fignes and proofes that he was maruelloufly offended in his mind, to see that he was thus deceived of his hope. For he being the man that was first spoken of and thought most worthic of all other, and being come also so neare vnto it, now to see himselfe. thus whipped out of it, he supposed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him, & that he maliced him in his heart, fo that after that time he ftil ftood in feare of his life, For he being afraid of Pife, hating also Galba, and being grieuously offended with T. lunius, he went his way full of diuers thoughts in his mind. But the Soothfayers, Aftronomers, and Chaldeans. which he euer kept about him, did perswade him not to be discouraged for this, nor to cast all hope afide and specially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great confidence, because he had often times before for etold and affured him, that Nero should not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero should die first, & he himself survive him, & should become Emperor of Roms. Whereby Ptolomy having proved his first prediction true vnto him, he bad him be bold, and feare not that to come. But now besides him, those that secretly complained vnto him, did prick him forward the more, fighing to fee him fo cuill dealt with by Galba, and divers of them chiefly, which bare great authoritie and credit about Tigellinus & Nymphidius: who being then cast off, and discountenanced, came all vnto him, and stirred him vp the more. As amongst others, Veturius and Earbiss chiefly of the which the one had bene Optio, & the other Tefferarius; (for fo the Romaines call those that be their messengers, spials, and officers to the captaines) who with an infranchised bondman of his called Onomastus, went vnto the campe, and there corrupted some soldiers with readic monic and other some with faire words, being of themselves cuill inclined, and expected but occasion to ytter their malice. For otherwise had the foldiers bin all of one mind, it had not binan enterprise to haue bin brought to passe in foure dayes space (being no more betwixt the adoption and murther) to make a whole camp rebel in that fort. For they were flain v fifteenth day of Ianuary, on which day Galba did facrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his friends. But at that time the Soothfayer called Ombrious, whe he had the intrails of the beafts facrificed in his hands, and had looked upon them, he spake not doubtfully but plainly, that he saw fignes of great tumult and rebellion, & that the Emperor was in present danger of great treason, Whereby it plainly appeared, that the gods had put Galba into Othoes hands for he flood at that time behind Galba, and both heard and faw all that the Sooth fayers did. So he feeming to be gricued withall in his mind, and his colour changing oft for the feare he was in, his infranchifed bondinan Onomastus came and told him, that the masons and chiefe carpenters were come to fpeake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch-word agreed vpon betweene them, at which time Otho shold thengo vnrothe soldiers. Then Otho said, that he went to looketo an old house he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would shewit vino the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius house, into the market place, where the golde pillar standeth, where also the greatest highwaies of all ITALY do meete together. There certains met him that first called him Emperour, which were not in all about three and twentie perions. Thereupon, though other was not viconstant, as it appeared (notwithstanding he was so fine and effeminate a man) but rather resolute and fout in instant danger: yet feare so oppressed him at that time, that he would faine hauelest his enterprise. Howbeit the foldiers would not suffer him, but compassing his litter round about with their armes, and their fwords drawne in their hands, they commanded the litter mentogo forward. So Othoas he went haftening on his drivers, he often muttered to himselfe, Iam but dead. Some hearing him as they passed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwise troubled, to see such a small number of men about him, that they durst venter vpon so hardan enterprise. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three and by foure in a company: all which came and ioyned with him, and cryed Cafar, Cafar, having their fwords drawne in their bands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to guard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conspiracie, but being amazed and afraid with their fodaine coming, he suffered them to come in. So when Otho was come in, he foud no man that refused him. For they that knew nothing of the practise, being compassed in with those that were made priny to it, & had knowne it of long time, being found stragling here and there, by one and by two, they followed the rest for feare at the first, & afterwards for good will. This was brought straight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothsayer being yet busic about this facrifice; infomuch that they which before gaue no credite to those divinations, began then to maruell much at this heauenly figne. Then there ran immediatly a great number of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Thereupon Iunius and Lacon, and certaine other of Galbaes infranchised bondmen, stood to guard Galbaes person with their swords drawne in their hands. Pise also went out to speake vnto the soldiers that guarded the Emperors person. Moreouer, Morcouer, because the ILLYRIAN legio lay out of the camp in a place called Vipsanus, they dispatched away Marius Celsus with al speed, a very honest man to get that place. Galba in the mean rime flood in doubt whether he should come out of the pallace or not for Iunius would not let him go, but Cellus and Lacon perfuaded him togo outsinfomuch as they fell at great words with lunius that went about to dissiwade him from it. In this stirre there ranne a rumor that Othowas faincinthe field. Immediatly after came Inlins Articins, one of the noblest men of all the Empe-lie of a folrours guard, and shewed his sword drawne, crying that he had slaine Casars enemie; and thrust through the prease, and got to Galba, and shewed him his sword bloudied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who comanded him to do it. The foldier answered him the faith and oath he had made vnto him. Therewith all the people that flood by cried out, it was nobly done of him. and clapped their hands for ioy. Then Galba taking his litter, went out of his pallace to do facrificeto lupiter, and also to shew himself openly. Howbeit he was no sooner come into the market place, but he heard contrary newes, that Otho was Lord and mafter of the whole camp & army. Then as it happeneth in so great a prease of people, some cried out to him to returne back again, Tumult for others would have him to go forward: others bad him be afraid of nothing, & others willed him Galba. to looke to himfelf. So his litter being thus turmoiled to and fro, as toft you the fea fometime borne back, otherwhile caried forward, first of all they saw certain horsinen, and then footmen alfoarmed coming from Paules pallace, al of them together crying out with loud voice. Hence, hence, private man. Then all the people fet vpon a running, not flying dispersedly, but in heapes. ypon porches and stals in the market place as it had bin to have seene some fight or sport. Then one called Attilius Sarcello, ouerthrew one of the images of Galba, which was as it were a beginning of open warres. Others round about threw darts on enery fide of him against his litter. But doth sall when they faw they could not kill him, then they came nearer to his litter with their fwords him rigidrawne in their hands, and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to defend him, fauing one man onely, whom the Sunne faw that day, amongst so many thousands of men, worthy of the Empire of Rome: and he was called * Sempronius. He having received privately no manner of * cornelius pleafure at Galbaes hand, but onely to discharge his oath and dutie, stepped before the litter, and Tacins lifting up a vine branch he had in his hand (with the which the ROMAINE Captaines do vieto him Denbeate their foldiers that have offended) he fell out with them that did fet you him, and prayed fits. them to hold their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the end when he faw they would not leave but that they fell to it in good carneft, he then drew his fword, and bare off the blowes as well as he could, virtill they hought him, that he fel to the ground. Then Galbaes litter Ser promises being ouerthrowne right in the place called Curtius lake, Galba lay on the ground armed in his of his cath curaces. The traiterous fouldiers flew vpon him, and gaue him many a wound: and Galbs holding out his necke vnto them, bade them ftrike hardily, if it were to do their countrey good. So persur Galhehad many wounds on his armes and his thighs, as it is reported; howbeit the foldier that flue ba. The death him was called Camurius, of the fifteenth legion. Others do report that it was one Terentius, of semproother also say Arcadius: and some other do call him Fabius Fabulus; who having stricken off his The death head, wrapped it in the lap of his gowne, because he could not otherwise take hold of it, for that of albasis hewas all bald. Howbeit his fellowes & conforts would not fuffer him to hide it, but rather that and his his notable fact he had done should be seene. Therefore he set it vpon the point of his lance, and his death. so shaking the face of this poore old man, (a wife and temperate Prince, and chiefe Bishop, and Confull)he rannevp and downe (like mad women possessed with the spirit and furie of Bacchus at the feasts of Bacchus bowing down his launce being all of a goare bloud. When his head was brought to Othe, it is faid he cried out aloud: Tush, my fellowes, this is nothing, vnlesse you bring me also Pisces head. So not long after, they brought him his head also. For the young man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who flue him hard by the temple of * other do Vefta. So did they also kill Titus Junius: who openly confessed that he was one of the conspiracy reade Muragainst Galba, and cried out to them that slue him, that Otho did not know that they did kill him. """ This notwithstanding, the soldiers strake off his head and Lacons also, and brought them both the of Pife, to Otho to receive the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Archilochus faith:

Of seuen peraduenture saine dead on the ground, A thousand will say, that they all caue the wound.

So there was diuerse men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, had bloudied all their hands and fwords, and so shewed them bloudied to have reward also: but Vitellus notwithstanding made inquirie of them afterwards, and caused them to be put to death. There came into the field also, one Marius Celsus, whom divers men accused to have perswaded the souldi ers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bade he should be put to death. Howbein Otho would not fuffer them to kill him : and yet being afraid to contrary the fouldiers minds, he told them they should not kill him so rashly, because he was first to learne some things more of

him. So he commanded them to bind him, and deliuered him to be kept of those he trusted most. Asterwards the Senate was presently assembled: who, as if men had bene sodainly changed from them they were, or as if there had bene new gods, they all sware by the name of other

(the which oath he himselfe had before sworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him besides, Augustus & Casar; the bodies of them that were slainelying yet headlesse on the ground in the market place, all in their Consuls robes. And as for their heads, the fouldiers after they could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter for the summe of two thousand fine hundred Drachmaes. And for Pisoes head, his wifethrough intreatie begged it of one Veranius. On the other fide, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patro-bius and Vitellius servants:who, after they had vsed it as vilely as they should devise, they threwir at length in a place where their bodies are cast, who the Casars put to death, the which they call Sestertium. Now for his bodie Heluidius Priscus, through Othoes sufferance, caried it away, and Argins, one of his infranchised bondmen, buried it by night. Thus have you heard the historie of Galba, a man that in nobilitie and wealth, was inferior to few Romaines, and in them both was the chiefest man of all his time, & had alway lived in honorable fame and estimation, in the reigne of fine Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him, and not through his owne force and power. For of them that stroug to make themselves Emperours at that time, some found no man that thought them worthy of it: others did put forth theselues, as thinking themselues worthy of it. Howbeit Galba was called vntoir and obeyed them that called him, vfing his name against Vindex boldnes: whereby he procured that his rifing (which before was called innovation and rebellion) was then called civill warre. after that his faction came to have a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperor. And therefore he did not so much desire to be Emperor for himselfe, as to do good to his countrey and common-wealth. But yet he erred, in feeking to command the fouldiers, whom Tigels linus and Nymphidius had spoiled by their flatteries; euen as in old time Scipio, Fabricius, and Camillus did command the fouldiers of the Empire of Rome at that time. So he being now avery old man, shewed himselfea good Emperour and after the old fort, in his behauiour towards the fouldiers only:but in all other things else, being caried away with the couetousnesses fire tus Iunius and Laco, and of other his infranchised bondmen, he left none desirous to be gouerned by him, but many that were forie for his death.

The end of Galbaes life.

HE next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went vnto the Othors mo-Capitoll, and facrificed, and there fent for Marius Celsus to come vnto deration at him, whom he courteously saluted, and prayed him rather to forget the cause of his imprisonment, then to remember his deliuerie. Marius reigne. Celfus made him a wife and noble answer againe, and faid, that the matter for the which they would have accused him vnto him, did witnesse his behauiour, shewing himselfe faithfull vnto Galba, who neuer did him any pleasure. These words of them both did maruellously please the people: and so did they like the souldiers also wonderfully well.

Moreouer, after he had very fauourably & graciously taken order for matters in the Senate, the rest of the time he had to be Conful, he employed partly about Verginius Rufus, and did also establish them Consuls in their place and degree, which had bene called vnto that dignitie by New, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honoured the oldest Senators and of greatest estimation, with certaine priesthoods. Besides all this, herestored vnto all those Senators that were banished by Nero and called home againe, all their goods yet vnfold. Whereupon the chiefest Magistrates and Noblemen of the citie that quaked before for feare, supposing that he was not aman, but rather a diuell or furie of hell that was come to be Emperour, they all became glad men, for the good hope of this smiling & gracious reigne they were so lately entredinto. Moreouer, nothing pleased all the Romaines together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men so much, as that he did vnto Tigellinus: for it was punishment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the punishment enery man threatned him withall, as a thing due to the common wealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his bodie was infected withall. Now, though the Noblemen thought his vnreafonable infolencie and lust of the stell (following naughtie-packs and common frumpets, burning still in filthic concupiscence) an extreme punishment, comparable to many deaths, and being also no better then a dead man in a manner, fill following pleasure and sensualitie as long as he could : this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they should see such a wicked creature as he liue, that had put so manie noble men to death. So Otho fent for him, who lived very pleafantly at his houses in the countrey, by the citie of Stavessa, and had ships cuer readie upon the sea coast, to slic if necefficie draue him to it. Thereupon he first sought to bribe him with money which was sent with commission'to apprehend him, and perswaded him to let him escape: but when he saw he could not frame him to his mind, yet he refrained not to give him gifts, and praied him to give him leave to shave his beard. The other granted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razor, and did cut his ownethroate. So Otho having pleased the people thus well, he sought not otherwise to be reuenged of his private iniuries. Moreover, to currie favour with the common people; he refufed not to be called Nero, in any open affemblies at the Theaters. Also when certaine private men had fet vp Neroes images in open fight, Otho was not offended withall : but moreouer, Cladius Rufus writeth, that the letters patents & commissions were sent into Spaine by posss, sink. fcribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of Otho. Howbeit; when it came to his cares that the noblemen of Rome misliked of it, he left it off, and would write it no more in his letters. So Otho having begun in this fort to establish his Empire, the soldiers maruellously troubled him. For they continually perfwaded him to take heed to himself, and to beware how noblemen and gentlemen came neare vnto him: which they did, either for that indeed they bearing him good will, were afraid fome treacherie or treason should be secretly practised against him-orch it was some seined device to set all together by the eares, and to bring it to civill war. For when othe himselfe had sent Crispinus with his seventeenth legion to bring him certaine prisoners, and that Criffinus was ready before day, going to performe the effect of his commission, having loden carts with armour and weapon for the fouldiers: the desperatest and bouldest men among them began to crie out, and faid, that Crifpinus meant no good in his heart, and that the Senare went about to make some change and stirre, and that his armour and weapons were not for Gefar, but against him. These words moued many mens consciences, and made them to rebelliso that some laid hold upon the carts to stay them, others slue two Centurions out of hand, and Crispinus himselfalso that would have staied them. Thereupon all of them together, one encou. raging another, went directly to Rome, as meaning to aide the Emperour. But when they came thither, understanding that there were foure score Senators at supper with the Emperour, they ranne fraight to the pallace, crying out, that it was a good occasion offered them to kil all Gelars enemies at a clap. Hereupon all Rome was straight in armes, looking immediatly after tobe facked and spoiled of all that ever they had; and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, othe himselfe also being in great seare and distresse. For men might easily see hewas afraid, because of his guests he had bidden, not for himselfe, seeing them all amazed with the matter, for feare not speaking a word vnto him, but staring on him still, and specially thosethat came and brought their wives with them to supper. So othe sodainly fent the Captaines vitto the fouldiers, and commanded them to speake with them, and to pacific them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the boord, and conveyed his guefts out of his pallace by fecret posternes. So they faued themselues, passing through the souldiers, a litebefore they entred into the hall where the feast was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Celars enemies. So the Emperour rifing from his bed, he pacified them with gentle words, the teares standing in his eyes, and thereby at length he sent them all away. The next morning he liberally bestowed vpon enery souldier a thousand two hundred and sistic Drachmaes; and then he went into the market place, and there gave great commendation vnto the common people for their readie good wils they shewed vnto him; howbeit, he said there were some among them, that vider colour and pretext of honestie, did commit many leud parts, and made his goodnesse and grace towards them to be cuill spoken of, and their constancie and faithalso to be misliked of, and prayed them his griefe might be theirs, and that the offenders might be punished. They all confirmed his words, and bad him aloud he should do it. So otho thereupon caused two of them onely to be apprehended, supposing no man would be greatly offended with the punishment of them, and then went his way. Those that loued and trusted him, maruelled much to fee this change. Other were of opinion, that it flood him vpon foto do,to winne the fouldiers hearts, because of the warreat hand. Now newes came flying to him out of all parts, that Vitellius had taken vponhim the authoritie to be Emperour, and posts came to him one in anothers necke, to tel him that numbers of people came in daily to submit theselues vnto Vitellius. Others toldhim also, how the legions remaining in PANNONIA, DALMATIA, and Mysia, had chofen otho. Immediatly after friendly letters were brought him also from Mutianus and Vespasianus, the one of them being in Syria, and the other in Ivo Ala, with great and mightie armies. Whereupon Othogiuing credite vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius, and bad him beware how he medled with any deeper enterprise then became a private souldier; and that he would give him gold and filuer enough, and a great citie, where he might live quietly. and take his pleafure. Vitellius gently answered him at the first, and sported with him: but afterwards the falling out one with another, spitefull letters were sent betwixt either parties, one of them reproching another not fally, but fondly, & foolifhly detecting each others vices. For indeed it was hard to judge, which of them two was most licentiously given, most effeminate, least skilfull, poorer, or most indebted before. Now at that time they talked of wonderful signes that had bene feene: howbeit they were but flying tales, and there was no man to iustifie them. But in the Capitol there was the image of Victory fet up in a triumphing charior, the which every body and Victory faw did let flacke the reines of the bridles of the horses which she had in her hands, as though she could not ftay them any more. The statue of Caius Cafar also within y Iland, which standeth in worders themiddest of the river of Tyber at Romb, without any earthquake or storme of wind, turned feene at ofit felf fro the West to the East: the which (as it is reported) chanced about the time that Vespafanbegan to take vpon him to be Emperour. Many alfo tooke the ouerflowing of the river of Tyber for an ill figne. For indeed it was at that time of the yeare when rivers do fwell most, yet They mind was it neuer fo great before, neither had it euer done fo much hurt as it did at that time. For it had derful ouerouerflowne her bankes, and drowned the most part of the city, and specially the corne-market: she river of infomuch that they fuffered famine many daies after in Rome. In all this ftirre newes came that Tyber. Cuinna and Valens (two of Vitellius captains) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes: and moreouer in Rome, Dolabella a noble man, was suspected by the Prætorian souldiers, that he practised sometreason. Now other, either because he was afraid of him, or of some other, he sent him to the city AQVINVM, promifing him he should have no other hurt. Then choosing the choisest Gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellimanddid not depriue him of any iote of his honor and dignitic. Moreover, he was very carefullto see his wife and mother safe, that they should not be afraid of themselves. Besides all this, heappointed Flauius Sabinus, Vespasians brother, gouernor of Rome in his absence: and did it for Merces fake, who had before given him the fame honor and authority, the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Vespasian see, that he loued & trusted him. So he taried behind at BRES-SELLE, a city standing upon the river of Po:and sent his army before under the conduct of Marim Celfus, of Swetonius Paulinus, and of Gallus and Spurina, all noble and great personages: howbeitthey could not have their wils to rule the armie as they would, because of the insolency and flubburnnesse of the souldiers, who would have no other Captaines but the Emperour onely, The frefaying, that he and none other should command them. Indeed, the enemies souldiers also were wardnesse not much wifer, nor more obedient to their Captaines, but were braue and luftie vpon the felfer fame occasions how heir they had this advantage over the other than a subject to the subje fameoccafion howbeit they had this aduantage over the other that they could tel how to fight, fouldier. and were all well trained in the warres, and could away with paines and hardnesse, and neuer frunke from it: whereas the Prætorian souldiers that came from Rome, were fine meale-mouthed men, because they had benelong from the warres, and had lived at ease in Rome, and taken their pleasure in banqueting and playes: and therfore in a brauerie and iolitie, they would needs hauemen thinke, that they disdained to do what their Captaines commanded them, as men that were too good to do it, & not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that, when Spurina would have compelled them, he was in danger of death, & escaped very narrowly that they flue him not. For they stucke not to reuile him, and give him as foule words as they could, calling him traitor, & curfing him, faying that he marred all Cafars affaires. Yea, and there were fome of them, that having their full cups, went in the night to his tent to aske him leave to depart, faying that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flour they had given them by their enemies about that time, hard by the citie of PLACENTIA, did Flacentia, stand Spurina and his affaires to great purpose. For Vitellius souldiers coming hard to the wals she fertilest of the citie, did mocke Othors men that were at the cranewes of the same, and called them fine towns of all dancers and goodly stage-players, that had seene nothing but playes and seasts; and that for feates of armes, and battels, they knew not what it meant: and that the greatest act they euer did, was that they strake off the head of a poore naked old man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the field before men, their heartes were in their heeles. These vile words galled them to the heart, and made them fo mad withall, that they came of themselves to pray Spuring to command them what he thought good, promifing that from thenceforth they would neuer refuse any paines or danger he would put them to. Thereupon there was cution cape taines were farre more familiar curreous, and civil to deale with cities and private men, then vi. tellius souldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna was neither for person nor manners accompaniable for the people, but strange, monstrous, and troublesome, to see him only a mightie made man, wearing gally gascoignes, and coates with sleeues, after the fashio of the GAVLES,& spake in this attire vnto the ensigne-bearers and Captaines of the Romaines. Furthermore, he had his wifealway with him brauely mounted on horsebacke, gallantly apparelled, & accompanied with a troupe of the choisest men of armes of al the companies. The other, Fabius Valenche was fo couetous, that no spoile of enemies, no polling of subjects, nor bribes taken of their frieds and confederates, could quench or fatisfie his vnfatiable couctoufneffe: whereby it feemeth that was the let, that coming on fo flowly, he was not at the first battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecima for it, that made too much hast, for the desire he had to have the only honour of thevi-Gory to himselfe and this was the cause, that besides his other light faults, he also made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and feafon, and when it came to the point indeed, yet he foughtir not out valiantly, so that he had almost cast all away: For when he had the repulse fro Placen. TIA, he went vnto CREMONA another great citic. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was befreged in the citie of Placentia, when he heard by the way that the Placentings had the better, and that the CREMONENSES were in great danger and diffresse, he marched this ther with his armie, and went and camped hard by the enemies. After that also, the other Cap. taines of either fide came to aide their men. Howbeit Gecinna hauing laied a great number of his best souldiers well armed in ambush, in certaine thicke groues and woods, he commanded his horsemento march forward, and if the enemies came to charge them, that they should retirelisle and litle, making as though they fled, vntill they had drawne them within his ambush. So there were certainetraitors that bewrayed the ambush vnto Marius Celsus, who came against them with his choice men of armes, and did not follow them ouer rashly but compassed in the place where the ambush lay, the which he raised, & in the meane time sent to his campe with all possible speed to his footmen to make hast thitherward and it seemeth, that if they had come in time. they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched upon the bellies of all Cisinnaes armie, if they had followed the horsemen in time, as they should have done. But Paulinus being come too late to aide them, for that he came fo flowly, he was burdened that he did not the dutie of a Captaine that bare the name and countenance he caried. Furthermore, the common foldiers accused him oftreason vnto Otho, and stirred vp their Emperour against him, & spake very big words of themselues, saying, that they had ouercome for their owne parts, had not the cowardlinesse of their owne Captaines bene, who put them by the victorie. So othodid not trust him so much that he would not make him beleeue but that he mistrusted somewhat. Therefore he fent his brother Titianus to the camp, and Proclus with him, Captain of the Prætorian guard, who indeed commanded all but in fight, Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenant. Marius Celsus and Paulinus followed after bearing the name of Counfellers and friends onely: howbeit otherwise they medled with nothing, neither had any authoritie giuen them. On the other side, the enemies were in as much trouble as they, and those specially whom Valens led. For when newes was brought of the coffict that was betweenethem in this ambush, they were angrie with him, because they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were flaine: infomuch that he had much ado to pacifie and quiet the, they were for eadie to haue flowne vpon him. So Valens at length removed his campe, and went and joyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being come to his camp at the towne of BE-BRIACYM, which is a little towne hard by CREMONA, he confulted with his Captaines whether he should give battell or not. So Proclus and Titianus gave him counsell to fight, considering that the fouldiers were very willing to it, by reason of the late victorie they had wonne, and wished him not to deferre it for thereby he should but discourage his armie, which was now willing to fight, and also give their enemies leysure to stay for their Chiefetaine Vitellius, who came himselfe out of GAVLE. But Paulinus in contrarie manner alledged, that the enemies had all their force and power prefent, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Otho looked for another armie out of Mysia and Pannonia, as great an army as his enemies had already, fothat he could tary his rime, and not ferue his enemies turne: and alfor that if the fouldiers being now but a few in numher were willing to fight, they should then be much more encouraged, when they should have greater company, and should also fight with better safety. Furthermore he perswaded the, that to delay time was for their auaile, confidering that they had plenty & ftore of all maner of prouifion: where the enemies on the other fide, being also in their enemies countrey, their victuals would quickly faile them. Marius Celfus liked very well of these perswasions; and so did Annius nallus, who was not present at this councell (but gone from the camp, to be cured of a fal he had from his horse) but he was written to by Otho to have his opinion also. So Annius Gallus returned answer, that he thought it not best to make haste, but to stay for the army that came out of Mysia, confidering they were onwards on their way. Howbeit Otho would not hearken to this counfell, but followed their minds that concluded of battell: for the which were alledged dinerse occasions. But the chiefest and likeliest cause of all was, that the souldiers which are called the Prætorian guard (being the daily guard about the Emperours person) finding then in effect what it was to professe to be a souldier, and to line like a souldier, they lamented their continuing in Rome, where they lived at case and pleasure, feasting and banqueting, never feeling the discommodities and bitter paines of war: and did therfore so carnestly cry out to fight, that there their pleawas no staying of them, as if they should at their first cry & setting forward, have overthrowne their enemies. Moreouer, it feemed also that Otho himself could no more away with the feare & doubt of the vncertaine fuccesse to come, neither could any longer abide the grieuous thoughts of the danger of his estate, he was so effeminate, and vnacquainted with sorow and paines. This was the cause that caried him on headlong, as a man that shutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and so to put al at adventure. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, & Oshoes Secundus Secretary. Others also do report, that both armies had diverse determinations and minds: as to the Orator, ioyneall together in one campe, and ioyntly to chuse among them, if they could agree, the worthiest man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to assemble the whole Senate in a the Emps. placetogether, and there to fuffer the Senators to chuse such a one Emperour, as they liked best rour. of. And fure it is very likely it was fo, confidering that neither of the both which were then called Emperors, was thought meet for the place they had: and therefore that these counsels & confiderations might eafily fall into the Romains fouldiers heads (who were wife men and expert fouldiers,) that indeed it was a thing for them iuftly to mislike, to bring themselves into the like miserable time and calamitie, which their predecessors before them had caused one another to fuffer: first for Sylla and Marius fakes, and afterwards for Cafar and Pompey; and now to bestow the Vitellius a Empire of Rome either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his drunkennes & glut- drunkard tonic or else vpon othe, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cause that moued Celfus to delay time, hoping to end the wars without trouble & danger; and that caused otho otho tomake the more hast, being afraid of the same. How beit othe returning backe again into BR B s-SELLES, he committed another fault, not only because he tooke his mens goodwils from them liver. to fight, the which his presence, and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but because also he caried away with him for the guard of his person, the valiantest souldiers and most resolute me of al his host. A hour that time there changed a skirmish to fal out hy the river. S.D. resolute me of al his host. About that time there chanced a skirmish to fal out by the river of Po, the river of because Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, & Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they faw they premailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and dry wood. all rubbed ouer with brimstone and pitch, and setting them on fire, they sent them downe the streame. When the barges were in the middest of the streame, there suddenly arose a winde out oftheriuer, which blew vpon this wood-stacke they had prepared to cast among the enemics workes of this bridge, that first made it smoke, and immediatly after fell all on a flame; which did so trouble the men in the barges, that they were driven to leape into the river to save themselues: and so they lost their barges, and became themselues also prisoners to their enemies, to their great shame and mockerie. Furthermore, the Germains vnder Vitellius, fighting with Othres fencers, which of them should win a litle Iland in the middest of the river, they had the vpper hand, and flue many of the fencers. The reupon Othors fouldiers which were in Babriaeval, being in a rage withall, and would needs fight, Proclus brought them into the field, and went and camped about fiftie furlongs out of the city; fo fondly, and to fo litle purpose, that being the spring of the yeare, and all the countrey thereabout full of brookes and rivers, yet they notwithstanding lacked water. The next morning they raised their campe to meete with their enemies the fame day, and were driven to march aboue an hundred furlongs. Now Paulinus perfwaded them to go faire and foftly, and not to make more hast then needed; and would not fo foone as they should come (being wearied with their journey and trauell) fet upon their enemies that were wel armed, & besides had leisure & time inough to settheir men in battell ray, whilest they were coming so long a journey with all their cariage. Now the Captaines being of diuerfe opinions about this matter, there came a horseman from otho, one of those they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which othe commanded them to make all the haft they could, and to lose no time, but to march with all speed towards the enemie. So when the letters were read, the Captaines presently marched forward with their army. Ceciana vnderstanding of their coming, was assonied at the first, and suddenly for sooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he found the most part of his fouldiers ready armed and Valens had given them their fignall and word of battell. And in the meane time, whilest the legions were taking their places to fet themselues in battell ray, they sent out before, the choifest horsemen they had, to skirmish. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor you what cause) that Vitellius Captaines would turne on Othoes side in battell, insomuch that when these men of armes came neare to meet with the voward of Othoes army, Othoes men did speake very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other fide tooke this falutation in euill part, and answered them againe in rage, as men that were willing to fight: Infomuch that those which had spoken to them, were quite discouraged; and the residue also beganto fusped their companions which had spoken to them, and mistrusted them to be traytors. And this was the chiefest cause of all their disorder, being ready to joyne battel. Furthermore, on the enemies fide alfo, all was out of order: for the beafts of cariage ran in among ft them that fought, and fo did put them maruelloufly out of order. Besides that also, the disaduantage of theplace where they fought, did compell them to disperse one from another, because of fundry ditches & trenches that were betweenethem, whereby they were compelled to fight in diverse companies together. So there were but two legions only, the one of Vitellius, called the Denourer. & theother of Otho, called the Helper: which getting out of these holes & ditches apart by themselves, in a good plaine euen ground, fought it out to a long time together in good order of battell. o. thoes foldiers were men of goodly personages, strong & valiant of their hands, how beit they had neuer serued in the warres, nor had euer foughten battel but that. And Vitelliusmen on the other fide, were old beaten foldiers, & had ferued all their youth, & knew what wars & battels meant. So when they came to joyne, Othors men gaue fuch a lufty charge voon the first onset, that they ouerthrew, & flue all the first ranke, and also wan the ensigne of the Eagle. Vitellius men were lo ashamed of it, and therewith in such a rage, that they tooke heart againe vnto them, and ran in lo desperately vpon their enemies, that at the first they slue the Colonell of all their legion, & wan diverse enfignes. And furthermore, against othors fencers (which were accounted the valiantest men, and readiest of hand) Varus Alphenus brought his men of armes called the BATTAVII, which are GERMAINES in the lower part of GERMANIE, dwelling in an Iland compassed about with the river of Rhene. There were few of his fencers that stucke by it, but the most of themran away towards the river, where they found certaine enfignes of their enemies fet in battell ray, who put them all to the fword, and not a man of them scaped with life. But aboue all other, none proued more beafts & cowards, then the Prætorian guard. For they would not tary till the encmiescame to give them charge, but cowardly turned their backes, and fled through their owne men that were not ouerthrowne; and so did both disorder them, and also make them afraid. This notwithstanding, there were a great number of Othoes men who having overthrown the voward of those that made head against them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were conquerours, and so valiantly returned backe into their campe. But of their Captaines, neither Proclus nor Paulinus durst returne backe with them, but fled another way, being afraid of the fury of the foldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Captaines. Howbeit Annius Gallus received them into the city of BERIACVM, that came together after this overthrow; and told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celsus gathering the noble men & gentlementogeperswading ther that had charge in the army, he fel to cosultation what they should do in so great a calamity, and extreme flaughter of the ROMAINE citizens. For if Otho himselfe were an honest man, he hould no more attempt Fortune: confidering that Cate and Scipio were both greatly blamed for that they were the cause of casting away of many men in Africk E to no purpose (though they fought for the liberty of the Romaines) and only of felf-will, for that they would not yeeld to tolliss C.esar after he had won the battel of PHAR SALIA. For though Fortune in all other things haue power ouer men: yet extremities happening to good men, she cannot preuent them to deremine the best for their safety. These perswassions straight caried away v Captains, who went nresently to feele the minds of the private soldiers, whom they found all of them desirous of peace. So Titianus perswaded them to send Ambassadours vnto the enemies to treate of neace; and Gelfus and Gallus tooke vpon them the charge to go thither, to breake the matter vnto Cuinna and Valens. But by the way they met with certaine Centurions, who told them how all hearmy of the enemies were coming onwards on their way to come directly to the city of Ba-BRIACY Moand that their Chieftaines had sent before to offer treatie of peace. Celsus & his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions that they would returne with them vn-10 Cecinna. But when they were come neare vnto him, Celfus was in great danger of his life: beculethe men of armes which he had ouerthrowne certaine dayes before in an ambush, coming before, when they spied him, they flew vpon him with great shouts. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his company, stepped before him, and closed him in: and so did the other Captaines that cried vnto them they should do him no hurt. Cecinna vnderstanding what the matter was, rodethither, and pacified the tumult of these men of armes; and then saluting Celsus very courcoully, he went with him towards BEBRIACYM. But now Titianus in the meane time, repeninghimfelf that he had fent Ambassadors vnto the enemies, he placed the desperatest souldiers helad vpon the wals of the citie, and incouraged the rest also to do the like, and to stand to the defence. But Cecinna came to the wall, and being on horse-backe, held vp his hand vnto them. Then they made no more refistance, but those that were upon the wals, salured the fouldiers; and they that were within the city opened the gates, and thrust in amongst Vilellius men, who receiwithem, and did no man any hurt, but courteously imbraced them, and faluted each other. Then they all sware and tooke their oaths to be true to Vitellins, and so yeelded themselves vnto him. So do the most part of those that were at this battell, report the successe thereof: granting mwithstanding, that they knew not cuery thing that was done, because of the great disorder among them. But as I travelled on a time through the field where the battell was firiken, with Marius Florus that had bene Confull, he shewed me an old man that when the field was fought in that place, was yong & against his will was at the same battel on Othors part. Who told ve, that things that after the battel was fought, he came into the field to survey the number of those that were dead: things that are done at and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of those that came to view them. the battell. And faid moreouer, that he made inquirie of the matter, but he neither could imagine it himfelfe, nor be fatisfied by others. Now indeed it is likely, that in civill wars betweene countrimen of one selfe city, where one of the two armies is ouerthrown, that there shold be greater slaughtramong them, then against the other enemies, because they take no prisoners of either side: forthose they should take, would serue them to no good purpose. But after they were slaine, ometo be layed on heapes fo by another, that is a hard thing to judge. But now to the matter. The news of this ouerthrow came first but obscurely vpon othe, a common thing in a matter of fogreat importance: but afterwards, when some that were hurt came and brought him certaine newes of it, it was no maruell then to fee othors friends & familiars to comfort him, who prayed himto be of good cheare, and not to be discouraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and good will which the private fouldiers shewed vnto him at that time, did passe and exceedall speech and expectation. For they for sooke him not, neither went they to submit themscheet their enemies the conquerors, neither tooke they any regard of themselves, to see their Emperor in that despaire: but all of them iountly together went vnto his lodging, and called him the Empe. their Emperor. Then he came out, and they fell downe at his feete, as men represented in a triumph lying on the ground, & kissed his hands, with the teares running down their cheekes, and belought him not to for sake and leave them to their enemies, but to command their persons whilest they had one drop of bloud lest in their bodies to do him service. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongst others, there was a poore soldier drawing out his sword, derfull And write him: Know, ô Cafar, that all my companions are determined to die in this fort for thee, for for fully like of a food in the following with for of the forthers, who looking with for of the forthers, and the following with forthers, for others, and the following with forthers, for the forthers, for forthers, for the forthers, a stout countenance round about him, and casting his eyes every where, spake vitto them in this maner. I think this a more happy day for me, my fellowes, then that in the which you first chose me Emperor: to fee you loue me so well, and do me such honor, with so great shew of loyaltv. But yet I beseech you not to deny me of a greater fauour, which is: To die valiantly and hono. rably, for the fafety of 10 many honest men as you be, and so good citizens of Rome. It by your election youmade me worthy to take vpon me the Imperiall crowne, I must now needs shew my selfe an Emperour, not sparing to spend my life for your and my countries safety. I ameer. taine that the victorie is not altogether mine enemies. For newes are come vnto me, that our armies of Mysia and Pannonia are in their way coming tovs, and that they are not farre of from the Adriaticke fea. As IA, SYRIA, and ÆGYPT, & the legions that made warre with IVRY are all ours. The Senatetaketh our part, and our enemies wives and children be in our hands. But this warre is not against Hannibal, nor Pyrrus, nor against the CIMBRES, to fight who should be owners of WALIE: but it is against the ROMAINES themselucs. For in this civill war, both the conquerous and vanquished do offend their countrey: for where the conquerous have benefit, the countrey and commonwealth alwaies receiveth losse. Assure your selves Ihad rather die then reigne Emperor: confidering also that my life with victoric cannot so much benefite the Romaines, as the facrifice of the fame may do my countrey good, for the peace and quiernefle of my countrimen, keeping ITALIE thereby from feeing such another battellasthis hath bene. So when he had made this oration vnto them, and put those by, that would have perfwaded him the contrary: he commanded all the Senatours and his friends that were prefent, to avoid. Then he wrote letters to them that were absent, and also vnto the cities wherethrough they passed, to vie them very courteously, and to see them safely conveyed. Then came his nephew Cocceius to him, who was yet but a young boy, and he did comfort him, and bad him not be afraid of Vitellius, for he had fafely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as care. full of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his some though he was defirous to do it, vntill fuch time as he faw the end of this warre: to the end that if he ouercame, he should quietly reigne Emperour with him: and if he were ouercome, that for adopting of him, he would not be cause of his death. But this one thing onely I command and charge thee, my fonne, even as the last commandement that I can give thee : that thou do not forget alrogether, neither ouer-much remember, that thine Vncle hath bin Emperor. Whenhe had told him this tale, he heard a noise at his doore: they were the souldiers that threatned the Senators which came from him and would kill them, if they did not remaine with him, but would for fake their Emperor. Vpon this occasion he came out once againe among them, being afraid leaft the fouldiers would do the Senators fome hurt, and made the foldiers give backe, not by intreating of them, nor speaking courteously to them, but looking grimly on them, and in great rage:infomuch that they all shrunke backe, and went away for feare. So when night came, he was athirst, and dranke a little water: and having two swords, he was proving a great while which had the best edge. In the end, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his feruants, & liberally to give out his mony among them, to fome more, to fome leffe, not prodigally throwing it away without discretion, as being another mans mony: but discreetly gaue to every man according to his desert. Then, after he had dispatched them away, he laid him downe to fleepe all the rest of the night, and the groomes of his chamber heard him morr, he flept fo foundly. In the morning he called one of his enfranchifed bondmen, whom he had commanded to helpe to faue the Senators, and fent him to fee if they were all safe, and gone. So when he vnderstood that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: Come on, said he then vnto him, looke to thy selfe I reade thee, and take heed the souldiers see thee not, if thou wilt scape with life, for sure they will kill thee, thinking thou hast holpen meto kill my self. So, assoone as his enfranchised bondman was gone out of his chamber, he tookhis fword with both his hands, and fetting the point of it to his breast, he fell down vponit, seeming to feele no other paine, fauing that he fetched a figh: whereby they that were without knew that he had done himselfe hurt. Thereupon his friends made straight an out-cry, & all the campe and city was incontinently full of teares and lamentation. The fouldiers suddenly ranne with a great noise to his gates, where they bitterly bewailed, and lamented his death, falling out with themselues that they were such villaines so slenderly to have guarded their Emperour, that they kept him not from killing himselse for their sakes. So there was not a man of them that left his body, Bur of this we will speake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried Othoes aftes, they did fet vp a tombe for him, neither for magnificence of building, nor for glorious E. nitabh. subject to enuy. For I haueseene his tombe in the city of BRESSELLES a meane thing, to Others and the Epitaph ypon ittranslated out of Latine, saith no more but this: This is the tombe of tomic in OMercus Otho. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Captaines would have compelled his fouldiers prefenily to have taken their oathes to betrue to Vitellins, they fell out with him: and understanding that there were yet remaining fome Senators, they would not medle with them, but onely roubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his doores armed, and called him by his name, and commanded him totake charge of them, and to go as ambassador to intreate for them. How beit hethought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were alreadic ouercome, considering he refused it when they had ouercome; and also he was afraid to go ambassador to the GERMAINE s, because he had compelled them to do things against their wils. Therefore he went out at his backe-doore, and faued himfelfe. So when the fouldiers heard of it, they were at length contented to be brought to be fworne vnto Vitellius: and so ioyned themselues with Cecinnaes fouldiers, fo they might be pardoned for all that was past. Hannibal.

tage of Hannibal

F we do call to mind the first Punick war the Carthaginians had with the ROMAINES, we shall find many Captaines who by the glorie of their noble deeds, haueleft great fame and renowne vnto their posteritie. Howbeit amongst all the Captaines of the CARTHAGI-NIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and fo commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilear, Hannibals father, otherwise sirnamed Barcha, a valiant man doubtlesse, and in his timea skilfull fouldier as any was. The fame Hamilear, first of all made warre with the ROMAINES, a longer time in Sicile then was looked for, who had done great hurt to his countrey and commonwealth. After that also in the warres of AFRICKE (at what time the mercenarie foldiers through their rebellion did put the country of CARTHAGE in great danger) he did fo valiantly appeare the infurrection, that to every mans iudgement, he was reputed the onely preseruer of his countrey. Then he was sent Gouernour and Captaine into Spaine, and caried with him at that time (as it is reported) his some Hamibal, being but a young boy, where he did noble service. In fine, in the ninth yeare of his aboade there in that province, he died fighting valiantly against the Vetheons. After his death, Haldrubal his fonne in law (whom the CARTHAGINIANS through the aide and friendship of the BARCINIAN faction had made Generall of all their armie) remained Gouernour there the space of eight yeares. This Hasdrubal sent for Hannibal into Spaine, after his father Hamilears death, against & minds of the chiefe of the contrary faction, to the end that as he had bene trained from his youth in the discipline of wars, in his father Hamilears life: egen fo in like manner; that now being come to mans state, he should the better harden his bodie, to away with the paines and dargers of the warres. Now although at the first, the remembrance of his father was a great helpe vnto him to winne the loue and good will of the fouldiers: vet he himselfe afterwards, through his diligence and industrie so handled the matter, that the old fouldiers forgetting all other Captaines; they only defired to choose him (and none other) for their gouernor, For they found in him all the perfections that could be wished for in a noble Thesparte Captaine or Generall. He had a present and readie wit to give counsell what was to be done; in greatest attempts: and besides, he lacked neither manhood nor industrie to put it in execurion. He had a valiant and inuincible mind, even in greatest dangers and adversities of body: the which are wont to stay others from performing their endeuors and dutie. He would watch and ward as any private foldier, and was quicke and ready to do any kind of service, either like a valiant fouldier, or a good Captaine. In this fort Hannibal continued in service in the warres, the foace of three yeares, under the conduct of Hasarbal. In that time he so wan the hearts of all the army, that immediatly after Hasdrubals death, he was chosen to be Lieutenant generall, with the Hamibal common confent of all the fouldiers: and this honour was laid upon him without contradiction chofen Lieu? of any of the CARTHAGINIANS, through the friendship and good will of the BARCINIAN faction Hannibal was now fixe and twentie yeares old, when the fouldiers made him their Lieute- the death of nanigenerall. For at what time his father Hamilear brought him into Spaine, he was then but being but mineyeares old: and from that time vnto Haldrubals death (according to Polybius declaration) it 26-jeares was seventeene yeares moe. So he was no sooner made Licutenant generall of all the camp, and old. hiscountrey, but he bent himfelf to make war with y Romains: having long before determinedit. For first of all, he chiefly maintained almost a common hate of all the CARTHAGINIANS against the Romaines, because of the losse of Sicile & Sardinia. Besides also, he bare the Binersedu. secret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamiltan: who of all the Captaines food Hamthe CARTHAGINIAN'S euer had, was the mortallest enemy vnto the Romaines. And it is writtenalios that at what time Hamiltar made his preparation to go into Spain E the compelled Han- the Ro. nibal (being but a boy) to sweare in a facrifice he made, that he would be a mortallenemy to the maines. ROMAINES, affoone as euer he came to the state of a man. So, the remembrance of these things were still fresh in the yong mans mind, as the Idea (or Image) of his fathers hate, and still prougked him to spie out all the meanes he could, how to destroy the Empire of Rome. Besides also, the Barcinian faction neuer left to pricke him forward vnto it, because by wars he might raise The Barcin himselfe to greatnes, and so increase his estate. These causes, as well common as particular, inticed Hannibal to attempt war against the Romaines, and gauethe stout youg man occasion by these means to practise innouatio. There was a people at that time called § SAGVNTINES, who confined indifferently betwixt the Romaines & Carthaginians: and were left free by the former peace concluded. These SAGVNTINES cuerafter tooke part with the ROMAINES and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the Romaines alwaies found the very true and faithfull to the Empire of Rome. Hannibal therefore thought with himselfe, he could not deuise to make a better match to anger the Romains s withal, & to kindle the fire of his malice also against them, then to make war with the SAGVNTINEs their confederates, Howbeir, before he would be openly feene to fer upon the, he first determined to leade his army against the OLcade s, and other people on the other fide of the river Iberus: and after he had ouercomethem, then to find occasion to molest the SAGVNTINES, to make it appeare that the warre was rather begunne by them, then purposely intended by him. So after he had ouercome the OLCADES, he did fet vpo the VACCEIANS, spoiled their country, befieged many cities, & took HERMAN-DICE, and ARBOCOLE, great and rich cities. Now he had in manner ouercome all the whole countrey, when diverse fugitives from the citie of Hermandice, encouraging one another, The compiconspired against him, leavied men, and inticed the OLCADEs that were fled, to take their part. racy of the Then they perswaded the CARTHAGINIANS their neighbours, that they would all agree sodainely to fet voon Hannibal at his returne. They being a people that defired nothing more then mbal. to fight, and confidering also that they had received injuries by Hannibal, did easily hearken vnto that counsell; and thereupon leauying a great number of men, to the number of a hundred thoufand, they went to affaile Hannibal at his returne from the VACCEIANS, by the river of Tagus. Wifecoun fell for gomernors to things at the begin.

When the CARTHAGINIANS discovered their army, they staied vpon it, and were maruellously affraid. And doubtlesse they had had a great ouerthrow, if they had fought with those so ficre people, being affraid of their sodaine coming, and also loden as they were with so great spoiles. the which Hannibal deepely confidering, like a wife Captaine as he was, he would not fight, but lodged his campe in the place where they were. Then the next day following, he passed his armie ouer the river with as litle noise as he could, leaving the passage where the enemies might easiliest come ouer, vnguarded: because vnder pretence of dissembled seare, he might inticethe barbarous people to passe ouer the river, to take the oportunity and occasion offered them, Now indeed as he was the subtillest Captaine, and had the finest stratagemes of any other Captaine of his time: so his policie was not in vaine, and his purpose to good effect, in abusing of the enemy for the wild barbarous people reposing too great trust in the multitude of their men, suppos fing the CARTHAGINIANS had bene affraid, with great furie entred the river to passe over it. So they being greatly troubled, & out of order by this meanes, and specially before they could paffe all ouer the river, they were fet vpon by the CARTHAGINIANS, first by certain horsmen. and afterwards with the whole army; so that there was a great number of them slaine, and the residue were put to slight. After this victory, all the people inhabiting about the river of Iberus. yeelded themselues vnto him, fauing the Sagvatines: who, though they saw Hannibal at hand coming towards them, trusting to the friendship of the Romaines, they prepared to defend themselues against him; and therewithall sent ambassadors presently to Rome, to shew the Senate in what great danger they were, & also to pray aide against their so great enemy, that made wars so hotely with them. The Ambassadours that were sent to Rome, were scant gone out of SPAINE, when Hannibal made open war on them with all his army, & pitched his camp before the city of Saguntus. When this matter was reported at Rome, and confulted of for the wrongs that had bin done to their confederates, the Senators dealt but flackly in it, & by decree only sent P. Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Pamphilus vnto Hannibal, to will him to raise his fiege from Sagvarvs: and if they found he would not hearken to them, that then they should thence repaire to CARTHAGE, &to pray them to deliver their generall Hannibal vntothem, because he had broken y peace. Polybius writeth, that Hannibal did hearethese ambassadors, howbeit, that he made the a flender answer. Liuius writeth in contrary maner, that they were neuer heard, nor came at any time to his camp. Howbeit, they both agree thus far, that they came into SPAINE, & afterwards went into Africke, & from thence came to Carthage; whereafter they had deliuered their message vnto the Coucel, the BARCINIAN faction was so much against them, that they dishonourably returned to Rome, and obtained not their desire. Now in the Se. nate of CARTHAGE there were two contrary parts and factions: of the which, the first took his beginning from the government of Hamilear, furnamed Barca, & so descended as it were by succeffio to his son Hannibal, and grew afterwards vnto such greatnesse, that that faction (as wellabroad as at home) ruled all matters iudicial. The second faction came of Hanno, a graue man and of great authority in the same commonwealth: howbeit, a man more giuen to imbrace peace& quietnes, then otherwise disposed to war and trouble. It is he only (as it is reported) who at that time when the Ambassadors of the ROMAINS came to CARTHAGE, to coplaine of the iniuries done to their confederates, that did then in maner against the will of all the whole Senate, counfell them to keep peace with the Romains, & to beware of wars, the which one day might peraduenture veterly destroy their country. Doubtlesse, if the CARTHAGINIANS would have followed the grave counsell of Hanno, rather then to have given place to their defires, and had followed the author of peace, and not to have bene ruled by them that gaue counsell to make warres, they had not tasted of those miseries which their countrey afterwards came vnto:butgiuing place to the fury and ambitious mind of a yong man, they heaped fuch mischiefes on their heads, as afterwards fell out vponthem. Therfore it is very meete for wife magistrates & gouernors of comonweales, alwaies rather to haue an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the end:& euer to decide all matters by aduice & counsel, before they should take any wars in hand. Now the SAGVNTINE's feeing themselves besieged by Hannibal, & that against alreason & equitie he made wars vpon them, they notwithstanding valiantly defended the siege many moneths together. Yet in fine, though Hamibal had many mo men then they (hauing a hundred and fiftie thousand men in his camp) & that the most part of their rampars were battered & ouerthrown: they liked rather to abide the facke of their citie, then to yeeld themselues to the mercie of their

mortallenemy. So some do report, that SA GVNTV's was taken the eight moneth after fiege was laid vnto it. But Linie seemeth not to agree to that, neither to set downe any certaine time of the continuance of the siege. Now the taking of this so wealthy a city, was a great furtherance di. gomui: terfe wates to Hannibals enterprifes. For many cities taking example of the lacke of SAGVNTVS. who before misliking to be subject to the Carthaginians, were ready to rebell, keptthemfelies quiet, and the fouldiers also waxed lively and couragious: feeing the rich spoiles that were divided in the campe. So Hannibal fent great presents of the spoiles of the Sagyntines. VIIIO CARTHAGE, whereby he wan the chiefest men of the city, and made them like the better ofwarres: whom he determined to leade with him againfi the ROMAINES, not in SPAINE, as many supposed, but into ITALY it selfe. Whilest these matters were in hand, the Ambassadors returned from CARTHAGE to Rome, and declared in open Senate, the flender answer they had received in maner at the felfe fame time when they had intelligence of the facke of SAGVNTVS. Hereupon the Romains greatly repented themselves (though somewhat too late) for that they aided not their friends & confederates in fo great a danger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very fory for it, and therewith also maruellously offended, they deuided the provinces vnto the Confuls to wit Spaine vnto Publing Cornelius and Africke and Sicile P. Cornelius alloyato Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certaine of the noblest men of the city were sent Amhistadors vnto Carthage, to make their complaints in open Senate for breach of the peace, Promiting and also to denounce vnto them the cause of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to prodame open warre against them, after they had declared the occasion thereof to come of themfelies. This was as brauely received of the CARTHAGINIANS, as luftily offered vnto them: but mainer therein they were not so well aduised, as the successe of that war in the end sufficiently proued it with the settlers. Now Hampiled being aduertised how things were concluded in the Senare of Carthage. tothem. Now Hannibal being advertised how things were concluded in the Senate at CAR-THAGE, and thinking with himselfe that it was time to go into ITALY, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the possible speed he could to prepare his ships and things readie, and fo required aide of the cities that were his best friends and confederates, and commanded that all the bands should meete him at new CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appointed good garrifons in places most convenient, in Africk & Spaine, which he thought about all things elfe to be most necessary: because that when he should go into ITALY, the Ro-MATNS should not win it from him. Therfore he sent into AFRICK twelve hundred horsemen. and thirteene thousand footmen, all Spaniards; and besides, he brought out of diverse parts of Africk foure thousand soldiers, & placed them in garrison in Carthage, obtaining both hostages and fouldiers by this meane. So he left the government of Spain to his brother Hacdrubal, and gaue him an army of fifty ships of warre, two thousand horsemen, and twelucthoufand footmen. These were the garrisons he left in both those prouinces. Now he thought them not fufficient to with stand the power of the ROMAINS, if they bent their wars into SPAINE OF Africk E: but he thought them firong enough to flay the enemy from ouerrunning of the country, vntill that having brought his army by land, he had fet foot in Iralra Moreouer, he knew that the CARTHAGINIAN'S were strong enough to leavie a new army if they listed: and if need so required, to send him aide also into ITALY. For, after that they had driven away this so dangerous a warre, procured against them through the spite of the mercenary souldiers, having euer after obtained victory: first under the conduct of Hamilean: secondly, under Hasfdrubal: and lastly, under Hannibal: they were growne to such greatnesse and strength, that at what time Hannibal came into ITALY, their Empire and dominions were maruellously enlarged. For they had all the coast of Africk, which lieth ouer against the sea Mediterraneum, from the alters of the Philenians, which be not farre from the great Syrte, vnto Hercules pillars, and containeth in negle of the length * two thousand paces. So after they had passed the straight which deuideth Africk B from EVROPE, they possessed almost all Spaine, to the mountaines Pirenei, which do deuide SPAINE from GAVLE. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRICKE and SPAINE, Hanni- is false. bal returned againe to new CARTHAGE, where his army was ready for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his mentogether, and encouraging them with great and large promifes, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALY: and made Hannibal great account vnto them of the friendship of the Gavens, and in the endbad them be of good determines courage, and fet lustily forward. Thereupon, the next day following he departed from CAR-THAGE, and brought his army all along the coast, vnto the riner of Iberus. It is reported, that the

Hamibal dreamed he faw ayong man, of a maruellous terrible looke and stature, who bad him follow him into ITALY; but afterwards, that he saw a snake of a wonder. full greatnesse, making a maruellous noise and being desirous to vnderstad what the same might fignific, that it was told him, that it betokened the destruction of ITALIE. It is not to be maruelled at, though the great care and thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALY made his mind to run of fuch fancies in the night, as dreaming of victory or destruction, or fuch other calamities of war. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator faith: that our thoughts and words do beget such things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet writeth of Homerto wit, like to those his mind most ran on, or that he talked of most. Now after Hannibal had passed ouer the mountaines Pirenei, and that he had won the GAVLES hearts with bountifull gifts, in few daies he came to the river of Rhone. The head of the river of Rhone, is not farre from the heads of the rivers of the Rhein and Danuby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at GENEVA. Then it runneth from thence towards the west, and deuideth the GAVLES a pretie way; and then being increased by the river of Arar (called in French, Saone)& with other rivers, in the end it falleth into the sea with divers heads betwixt the Volses & the CAVARIANS. The Volsces at that time inhabited both the fides of vriuer of Rhone, & were full of people, and the richest of all other GAVLES. They having understanding of Hannibalscoming, passed our the river, and armed themselves, and prepared on the other side to stoppethe CARTHAGINIANS, that they should not passe ouer. Now, though Hannibal had wonall the other GAVLES, yet those he could never win neither by gifts nor threates, to cause them ratherto proue the friendship of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Hannibal perceiuing he was to handle such enemies rather by policy, he commanded Hanno the sonne of Bomilear, fecretly to passe ouer the river of Rhone, with part of the army and so to set vpon the GAVLES on the fodgine. Thereupon Hanno (as he was commanded) made a long journey, and haujng paffed ouer the river at paffable foords, he shewed himselfe hard by the enemies campe before they faw him, or that they knew what he was. The GAVL's hearing their shouts & cries behind them, and having their hands full of Hannibal before them, who had many boats ready to passe ouer his men: they having no leifure to confult of the matter, neither to arme the clues to fland to defence left their campe and fled for life. So they being driven from the other fide of the riuer, the rest of the army of the CARTHAGINIAN's passed ouer it with safetic. In the meanetime, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a little before was come vnto Massilia, still heard newes of Hannibals armic. Wherefore, to be more affured of the matter, he fent a band of choise horsemen to discouer what the enemies intent was: who making great speed as they were commanded, met by chance with fine hundred horfemen of the NVMIDIANS, whom Hannibal had also fent to bring him word of the Romaines army. So, they first fodainly gaue charge vpon the Numi-DIANS, and after a hote and valiant conflict between both the parties, in the end the Romains ouercoming them, they made them flie, but with great loffe of their men: howbeit the greatest loffe and flaughter fell vpon the enemies. So Hannibal by this meanes found where the Ro-MAINES lay, and flood in a great doubt with himfelfe, whether he should keepe on his way into ITALIE, or else lead his armie against the Consul that then was, and so to proue his hap & succeffe. At length debating many wayes in his mind, and vncertaine which way he should determine, the Ambassadors of the Borans perswaded him to leaue all other deuises, & togo on into Italie. For before that Hannibal had passed over the mountains Pirenei, the Boian's having by craft taken the Romains Ambaffadors, and done great mischiefe vnto Manlius the Prætor, and intifed the Insubrians also, they were revolted from the Romaines, & tooke part with Hannibal, and onely because the Romains had replenished the cities of Placentia, & Cre-MONA with people, and had made the Colonics to Rome. So Hannibal being ruled by their counsell, raised his campe, and keeping the rivers side, still going against the river in few daies he came to the place which the GAVIEs do call the Iland, the which the riuer of Arar and Rhodanus coming from divers mountaines do make there. So at this present, there is the famous citie of Lions in Gavie, which they fay was built long time after by Plancus Munatius. Fro thence he came to the country of the ALLOBROGES, & having pacified the variance betwixt two brethren for the Realme, he came through the countrey of the Castinians and Vocontians, to the river of Durance. The head of this river cometh from the Alpes, and from thence running with a swift streame, falleth into the river of Rhone: & as it oftentimes changeth her course sonathit in manner no passable foord. Yet Hannibal having past it over, he led his army vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine countries, as farre as he could: howbeit, as he passed through them, he had great losses, as it is reported. Infomuch that some that were living at that time. did affirme, that they heard Hannibal himselfe say, that he had lost aboue thirtie thousand men, and the most part of his horsemen. For he was forced not oney to fight with the inhabitants of the Hannibal mountaines, but also compelled to make wayes through the straights: so that in certaine places of the highest rockes, he was driven to make passages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had passed the Alpes in fifteene dayes space, he came downe into the valley, not farre was the when the came downe into the valley, not farre from the citic of TVRINE. Whereby it seemeth to me, that he passed ouer the mountaine they commonly called Genua, the which on the one fide of it hath the river of Druentia, and on the piegar. other fide it goeth down to y city of TVRINE. Now it is hard to fay truly, what number of men The rather he had when he was come into ITALIE, because of the diversitie of mens opinions. For some write, that he had a hundred thousand footmen, and twenty thousand horsemen; others also write, that he had twentie thousand footemen, and fixe thousand horsemen, all Africans and SPANIAR DS. But others reckoning the GAVLES and LIGVEIANS, do count four-score thoufand footemen, and ten thousand horsemen. Yet it is not credible, that his army was so great as from The the first men report, and specially having passed through so many countries, and also received "ine. fuch loffe as he had; neither also could his number be so small, as the second reporters do make it, if a man will confider the famous exploits and great enterprifes he did afterwards. So that Tlike their opinions best, which keepe the meane betweene them both: considering that he brought into ITALIE, the better part of four escore thousand footemen, and ten thousand hors- Hamibals; men, the which he had leuied in Spaine: as it is manifestly knownealso, that a great number army in of the Ligyrians and Gavies came to loyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the ROMAINES, that gaue no place nor ground vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Hannibal being come from TVRINE, into the countrey of the INSVERIANS, he was met withall by Publics Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull speede from Massizia and having passed the riuers of Po and Tesin, he camped not farre from the enemy. So shortly after, both the Generals being come into the field to view each others campe, the horfemen of either fide grew to skir- Hambals milh, which continued long, and was not to be differred which of them had the better. How-first onbeit, in the end the Romaine's feeing the Confull hurt, and also that the horsemen of the Ny-MIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compasse them in, they were drivento give ground; and so pretily retired, defending the Conful the best they could to saue him, and so at length recovered their campe. It is reported, that Publius Cornelius Scipio was faued at that time through his fons conful helpe, who afterwards was called African, and at that time was but a young strippling; whose hure, and praile, though it was wonderfull in so greene a youth, yet it is likely to be true, because of the bis enemies famous and valiant acts that he did afterwards. Now Scipio having prooued how much his e- by hitos. nemie was stronger then himselse in horsemen, he determined to place his campe so, as his footmen might be in best safetie, and also sight with greatest advantage. And therefore the next called denight following he passed the river of Po. & made as little noise as he could, and went unto Pla-CENTIA. The like shortly after did T. Semprovius Longus, who had bene restored fro banishment P. Cornelius by the Senate, and sent for out of Sicil E: because both the Consuls should gouerne the comon stitute and wealth by one felfe authoritie. Hannibal also followed them both with all his armie, and pitched T. Semprohis campe neare vnto the river of Trebia, hoping that because both camps lay so neare together, gus confuls, fome occasion would be offered to fight the which he chiefly defired, both because he could not againg long maintaine war for lacke of victuals, as also that he mistrusted the ficklenes of the GAVLES. who like as they foone fell in league and friendshippe with him, drawne vnto it with hope of change, and with the fame also of his victorie obtained: so he mistrusted that vpon any light occasion (as if the war should continue any long time in their countrey) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the Romaines, against him as the onely author of this warre. For these refgectstherefore, he deuised all the meanes he could to come to battell. In the meane time Sempronius the other Confull met with a troupe of the enemies, loden with spoile, straggling up and downethe fields, whom he charged and put to flight. So, imagining the like fucceffe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall, he had good hope of victorie, if once both thearmies might come to fight. Therefore being maruelloufly defirous to do fome noble enter-Prife before Soipio were recouered of his hurt, and that the new Confull should be chosen, he victory of the Confull Sempronius. determined to joyne battell against the will of his other colleague & fellow Conful Scipiowho thought nothing could be to leffe purpose, then to put all the state and commonwealth inico. pardie, specially having all the whole GAVI. B s in maner in the field against him. Now Hannibal had secret intelligence of all this variance, by spials he had sent into the enemies campe. Where, fore, he being politicke and subtill as he was, found out a place straight betweene both campes couered ouer with bushes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to lie in ambush, with a company of chosen men. Then he commanded the horsemen of the NVMIDIANS, to scurie to the trenches of the Romains, to intice them to come to battell; and thereupon made therefor due of his army to eate, and so put them in very good order of battell, to be readie vpon any oci casion offered. Now the Consult Sempronius, at the first tumult of the NVMIDIANS, sodainely fent his horsemen to encounter them, and after them put out fixe thousand footmen, and in the end came himselfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middest of winter, and extreme cold, and specially in the places inclosed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appe. nine. Now the NVMIDIANS as they were commanded, inticed the ROMAINES by litle and litle on this fide the river of Trebia, vntil they came to the place where they might discerne theiren. fignes: and then they suddenly turned vpon the enemies which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NVMIDIANS, oftentimes to flie of set purpose, and then to stay vponthe sodaine when they feetime, to charge the enemie more hotely and fiercely then before. Whereupon Sempronius incontinently gathered his horsemen together, and did set his men in battell ray, as time required, to give charge vpon his enemie, that stayed for him in order of battell. For Hapnibal had cast his men into squadrons, ready upon any occasion. The skirmish beganne first by the light horsemen, and afterwards increased hoter by supply of the men of armes: howbeitthe ROMAINE Knights being vnable to beare the shocke of the enemies, they were quickly broken; fo that the legions maintained the battell with such furie and noble courage, that they hadbene able to have refifted, fo they had fought but with footmen only. But on the one fide, the hosse men and Elephants made them affraid, and on the other fide the footemen followed them very luftily, and fought with great furie against famished and frozen men. Wherefore the Romain's notwithstanding, suffering all the miseries that vexed them on every side, with an vnspeakeable courage and magnanimitie, such as was about their force and strength, they fought still, vntill that Mago coming out of his ambush, came and sodainly assailed them with great shoutes and cries; and that the middle fquadron of the CARTHAGINIANS also (through Hannibals commandement) flew vponthe Cinomanians. Then the Romaines feeing their confederates flig. their hearts were done, and vtterly discouraged. It is faid that there were ten thousand footmen of the Romains gotto Placentia, and came through the enemies. The rest of the army that fled, were most part of them slaine by the CARTHAGINIANS. The Confull Sempronius also scaped very narrowly from the enemies. The victory cost Hannibal the setting on also for helosta great number of his men, and the most part of his Elephants were slaine. After this battell, Hanmibal ouercame all the countrie, and did put all to fire and fword, and tooke also certaine towness and with a few of his men made a great number of the countrimen flic, that were diforderly gathered together in battel. Then at y beginning of the Spring, he brought his army into the field fooner then time required: & meaning to go into THVs CAN, he was driven backe by a greatepest at the very top of the height of Appenine, and so compelled to bring his army about PLA-CENTIA: howbeit, shortly after he put himselfe again into the fields for divers vrgent & necessary rie causes. For had he not faued himself by that policie, he had almost bene taken tardie by the ambush of the Gavles, who being angry with him that the war cotinued so long in their country, they fought to be reuenged of him, as the only author & occasion of the war. Therforeperceiuing it was time for him to avoid this danger, he made all the hast he could to lead his army into some other prouinces. Furthermore, he thought it wold increase his estimation much among strangers, and also greatly encourage his owne people, if he could make the power of the Car-THAGINIANS to seeme so great, and also their captaine to be of so noble a courage, as to date to make war so neare to y city of Rome. All things therfore set a part, he marched with his campe by the mountaine Appenine, and so coming through the countrey of the LIGVRIANS, he came into Thys can by the way that bringeth the into the champion countrey, & to the marishesabout the river of Arnus. The river of Arnus at that time was very high, & had overflowne al the fields thereabouts. Hannibal therefore marching with fogreat an armie as he had, could not

annidit, but that he must needs lose a number of his men and horse, before he could get out of those cuill-fauoured marishes. Insomuch that he himselfe lost one of his eyes, by reason of the oreat paines he had taken day and night without fleepe or rest, and also through the cuill aire: loss one of though he was caried vpon a high Elephants backe, which onely was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meane time, C. Flaminius Confull, to whom the charge of Sempronius amie was ginen, he was come vnto Aretivm against the Senates mind, who were maruellously offended with him, because he left his companion Cn. Seruelius at Rome, and went vnto his prouince by stealth as it were, without the furniture of a Confull & his officers. This was a very serviting. hallie man of nature, & one that the people had brought to that dignitie & office: so that he was confult. hecome so proud & insolent, that men might see how he wold hazard all things without wit or indgement. Hannibal having intelligence thereof, thought it the best way to anger the Consult. andto do what he could possible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Consult should come to ioyne with him. Therefore he marching forward with his campe through the countrey of Februa Aretium, he burnt & spoiled all the country thereabouts, and filled them all with feare, neuer leaving to destroy all before him, vntill he came to the mountains Cortonenses, and Montes foto the lake called Thrasimene. When he had viewed the place he went about to surprise his Cortonerfes. enemie by fome ambush: whereupon he conucyed certaine horsemen under the hils, hard by the finetimes. fraight that goeth ynto Thrasimene, and behind the mountaines also he placed the light horsemen. Then he himfelfe with the rest of his army came downe into the field, supposing that the Confull would notbe quiet: and fo it fell out. For hore stirring heads are casily intrapped, & fall Theindge. into the enemies ambush, and oftentimes do put all in hazard, because they will follow no counfelnor good aduice. C. Flaminius therfore feeing their country vtterly fpoiled, the corne deftroyed&cut downe, & the houses burnt, he made great hast to lead his army against the enemy contrary to all mens minds, who would have had him taried for his copanion Cn. Servilius the other Conful. So even at Sun set, when he was come to the straights of the lake of Thrasimene, he caufedhis campe to fray there, although his men were not wearie with the long journey they had taken by the way. So the next morning by break of day making no view of the country, he went over the mountaines. Then Hannibal, (who long before was prepared for this) did but stay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he faw the Romain Bs come into the plaine, he gaue a fignall vnto all his men to give charge vpon the enemy. Therupon the CARTHAGINIANS brea- Battell beking out on every fide, came before and behind, and on the flankes to affaile the enemie, being with Hapflurin betweene the lake and the mountaines. Now in contrary manner, the ROMAINES, beginning to fight out of order, they fought inclosed together, that they could not see one ano- minist the ther, as if it had bene darke: so that it is to be wondered at, how, and with what minde they fought it out fo long confidering they were compaffed in on every fide. For they fought it out Thrafeabout three houres space, with such surie and courage, that they heard not the terrible earthquake that was at that present time, neither did they offer to flie or stirre a footwatil they heard that the Confull C. Flaminius going from ranke to ranke to encourage his men, was slaine by aman of armes called Ducarius. Then when they had lost their Generall, and being voide of all usling the hope, they fled, some towards the mountaines, and others towards the lake, of the which diuerfe of them flying, were ouertaken and flaine. So there were flaine * fifteene thousand in the the noise of field, and there scaped about ten thousand. Furthermore, the report went, that there were fixe anearththousand footemen which forcibly (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and chaminius thereflayed on a hill till the battell was ended, and at length came downe vpon Hannibals pro- the confut misebutthey were betrayed, and slaine euery mothers sonne of them. After this great victorie, flaine. Hannibal did let divers ITALIAN prisoners go free without ransome paying, after he had vied them maruellous courteoufly because that the same of his clemency & curtesie should be known vnto all nations, wheras indeed his own nature was contrary to all vertues. For he was hafty and additions cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought vp in wars, and exercised in murther, treason as many and ambushes laid for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor civil government. So by prisoners. this meanes he became one of the cruellest Captaines, the most subtile and craftics to deceive crassines to and intrap his enemie, that ever was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemy, fothose diffemble whom he could not our come in war by plaine force, he went about to intrap by fleight & policy. The which appeareth true by this present battel, and alto by the other he fought against the raidipos-Confull Sempronius, by the river of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leave this talke what till another time. Now when the newes of the overthrow & death of the Confull Flaminius Was reported at Rome, having lost the most part of his army: there was great moane and lamentation made through all the city of Rome bewailing the common miserie of the comonwealth. others lamenting their private particular loffe, & some also forowing for both together. But in deed it was a wofull fight, to fee a world of men & women to runto the gates of the city, euery one privately asking for their kin & friends, Some do write, that there were two women, who be ing very fory & penfiue despairing of the safetie of their sons, died sodainly for the extreme inv they had, when beyond their expectation and hope they faw their fons aline & fafe. At the felf fame time, Cn. Servilius, the other Confull with C. Flaminius, didfend him 4000 horfemen, nor vnderstanding yet of the battel that was fought by the lake of Thrasimene. But when they hear of the overthrow of their men by the way, & therefore thought to have fled into VMERIA, they were copassed in by the horsmen of the enemies, & so brought vnto Hannibal. Now the Empire of Rome being brought into fo great extremity, & danger, because of so many small offee one in the necke of another: it was ordained, that an extraordinary Gouernor or Magistrate should be chosen, who should be created Dictator: an office specially vsed to be reserved for the last hope and remedy in most extreme danger & perill of the state & comonwealth. But because the Co. full Servilins could not return at that time to Rom B, all the wales being kept by the enemy: the people contrary to their custome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, (who afterwards attained the fur. name of Maximus, to fay, Very great) who likewise did name M. Minutius Getterall of the hors. men. Now this Fabius was a grave & wife counfeller, and of great authority, & estimation in the comonwealth infomuch as the citizens had all their hope & confidence in him only, perfuading thefelues, that the honor of Rome might be better preserved vnder the government & conduct offuch a Generall rather then under the government of any other man what soever. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefully & diligently given order for all things necessary, he departed from Rome, and when he had received the army of the late Confull Cn. Servilin, he added vnto them two other legions, and so went vnto the enemy. Now Hannibal was gone from the lake of Thrasimene, and went directly towards the city of Spol Brum, to see if he could take it at the first affault. But when he saw that the townes-men stood vpo the rampiers of their wals, and valiantly defended themselues: he then left the towns and destroyed the countrey as he went, and burnt houses and villages, and so went into Apvilla, through the marches of Anco-NA, and the country of the MARSIANS and PELIGNIANS. The Dictator followed himatthe heeles, and camped hard by the city of ARPY, not farre from the campe of the enemy, to the end to draw out the war at length. For the rashnesse and foole-hardines of the former Captains aforetime, had brought the state of Rome into such miserie, that they thought it a victorievnto them, not to be ouercome by the enemy, that had so often ouercome them. Whereby all things were turned straight with the change and alteration of the Captaine: for though Hannibal had fet his men in battell ray, and afterwards perceiuing his enemies stirred not, went and destroyed the countrey, hoping thereby to intice the Dictator to fight, when he should see the country of his confederates fo fpoiled, as it was before his face, the Dictator, this not with standing, was not mooned withall, but still kept his men close together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Hannibal was in a maruellous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often removed his campe, to the end that going diverfe wayes, some occasion or oportunitie might fall out to deceiue the enemy, or elfe to give battell. So when he had passed the mountaine Appenine, he camevnto Samnivm. But because shortly after, some of Campania, who having bene taken prisoners by the lake of Thrasimene, had bin set at liberty without ransome: they putting himin hope that he might take the city of CAPVA, he made his army march forward, and took a guide that knew the countrey, to bring him vnto CASINVM. Now the guide ouerhearing CASINVM, vnderstood it CASILINVM, and so mistaking the sound of the word, brought the army a cleane contrary way vnto Calentiny m and Calenym, & frothence about Stella. So when they came into a countrey enuironed about with mountaines & rivers, Hannibal knew straight they had mistaken their way, and so did cruelly put the guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this patiently, and was contented to give Hannibal libertie to take his pleafure which way he would, vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Casilinum, where he placed his garrison, being places of great aduantage and commoditic. So the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS was in manner compassed in enery way, and they must needes have died for famine in that place, or else have fled, to their great shame and dishonour; had not Hanmibal by this stratageme prevented the danger. Who knowing the danger all his armie stood in. and having spied a fit time for it: he commanded his souldiers to bring foorth two thousand oxen which they had gotten in spoile in the fieldes, having great store of them, and then tying torches of fire-linkes vnto their hornes, he appointed the nimblest men he had to light thein,& to drive the oxen vp the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the reliefe of the first watch. All this was duely executed according to his commandement, and the oxen running vp to the ni against toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them faire Diffator. and foftly. Now the ROMAINES that had long before placed a strong garrison vpon the mountaines, they were affraid of this strange fight, and mistrusting some ambush, they foorthwith forfooketheir pecces and holdes. Fabins himfelfe mistrusting also that it was some stratageme of the enemy, kept his men within the campe, and could not well tell what to fay to it. In the certains meane time Hannibal got ouer the mountaine, not farre from the bathes of Swessa, which the countrimen do call, The tower of the bathes, and brought all his army safe into ALBA; and fhortly after, he marched directly as though he would go to Rome, howbeit he fuddenly turned tower of the out of the way, and went presently into Apvlia. There he tooke the citie of GLERENVM, avery rich and wealthy towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him hard, city in Atand came and camped by LAVRINV M, not farre from the CARTHAGINIANS camp. So he being palia. fent for to Rome about weightie affaires of the state, there was no remedie, but that he must needes depart from thence with all the speede he could; howbeit before he went, he left Marcus Minutius Generall of the horsemen, his Lieutenant of all the armie, and commanded him inhisablence not once to stir nor to meddle with the enemies. For he was fully bent to follow his determination, which was: not to vexe the enemie, nor to fight with him, though he were prouoked vnto it. Howbeit Marcus Minutins litle regarding the Dictators commandement, his backe was no sooner turned, but he set vpon a companie of the enemies dispersed in the field a foraging, and flue a great number of them, and fought with the rest even vnto their campe. The rumor of this skirmish flew straight to Rome, and there was such great account made of it, that it was esteemed for a victorie: and the common people were so joy full of it, that they straight madethe power of the Lieutenant equall with the Dictator Fabius, the which was never heard ofbefore. Fabius patiently bearing this extreme injurie with a noble courage, having no way deserved it, he returned againe into the campe. Thus there were two Dictators at one selfe time. Two Dictators (athing neuer scene nor heard of before) who after they had deuided the army betweene the, torstogether, neuer either of them commanded his armie apart, as the Consuls were wont to do before. Marcus heard of be-Minutius thereupon grew to fuch a pride and haughtie mind, that one day he ventured to gine fore. battel, and made not his companion Fabius of counsell withall: the which Hannibal having so often ouercome, durst feantly have enterprifed. So he led his armie into fuch a place, where the enemie had compassed them in: infomuch that Hannibal flue them at his pleasure, without any hopeleft them to escape, if Fabius had not come in time (as he did) to aide them, rather respecting the honour of his countrey, then remembring the private injuriehe had received. For he comming fresh with his armie to the battell, made Hannibal affraid, that the ROMAINE legions had libertie to retire with fafetie. Whereby Fabius wan great fame for his wisdome and valiantnesse, both of his owne fouldiers, as also of the enemies themselves. For it was reported that Hannibal should say (returning into his campe,) That in this battell he had ouercome M. Minutius, but withall, that he was also ouercome by Fabius. And Minutius himself also confessing Fabius wisedome, and confidering that (according to Hesiodus saying) it was good reason to obey a better manthen himselse: he came with all his army vnto Fabius camp, and renouncing his authoritie. came and humbly faluted Fabius as his father, and all that day there was greatioy, and reioycing among the fouldiers. So both the armics being placed in garrison for the winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two new Consuls created, L. Paulus Amylius, and C. and C.Te. Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the fauour of the common people) was brought to be Confull. So they had libertie and commission to leavie a greater army then the Generals before them had done. Whereby the legions were newly supplied, and also others added vnto them, more then were before. Now when the Confuls were come into the armie, as remeebe. they were of seuerall dispositions, so did they also observe diverse manners in their government. Panlus, and Lucius Paulas, who was a grave wife man, and one that purposed to follow Fabius counselland C. Torentias fashions: he did desire to draw out the warre in length, and to stay the enemy without fighting Varro on the other fide was a hasty man, and venturous, and defired nothing but to fight, So it chanced, that not long after it was knowne, to the great cost and danger of the citie of Rome. what difference there was betwixt the modestie of Amylius, and the foole-hardinesse of Varra. For Hannibal being affraid of some stir and tumult in his campe for lacke of victuals, he departed from CLERENY M, and going into the warmest place of ApvLIA, came and camped with all his armie, by a village called CANNES. So he was followed with both the Confuls, who came and camped feuerally hard by him, but so neare one to another, that there was but the river of Aufide that parted them. This river (as it is reported) doth alone devide the mountaine of the Appenine, and taketh his head on that fide of the mountaine that lyeth to the fea fide, from whence it runner to the fea Adriaticum. Now Lucius Paulus finding that it was impossible for Hannibal being in a strange countrey, to maintaine so great an armic of such fundrie nations together: he was fully bent to protract time, and to avoid battell, perfwading himfelfe that it was the right and onely way to ouercome him, being as much to the enemies disaduantage, as also maruellous profitable and beneficial for the common wealth. And sure if C. Terentius Vara re, had caried that minde, it had bene out of all doubt, that Hannibals armie had bene ouerthrowneby the Romaines, without stroke striking. Howbeit he had such a light head of his owne, and was fo fickle minded, that he neither regarded wife counfell, nor Paulus Amilius authoritie: but in contrary manner would fall out with him, and also complained before the fouldiers, for that he kept his men pent vp and idle, whileft the enemie did put foorth his men to the field in battell ray. So when his turne came, that he was abfolutely to command the whole armie, for they had both absolute power by turnes) he passed ouer the river of Auside by breake of day, and gaue the fignall of battell without the privitic of his companion A_{my} lins, who rather followed him against his will then willingly, because he could do none otherwife. So he caused a scarlet coat of armes to be put out very earely in the morning, for a sign nall of battell. Hannibal on the other fide being as glad of it as might be possible; that he had oc. casion offered him to fight: (considering that the continual delaying of battell did alter all his purpose) he passed his army ouer the river, and had straight put them in very good order. For he had taken great spoiles of his enemies to furnish himselfe very brauely. Nowthe armie of the Romaines stood South-ward, infomuch that the South winde (which the men Battell at of the countrey call Vulturnus) blew full in their faces: whereas the enemies in contrariemaner had the vantage of the winde and Sunne vpon their backes, and their battell stood in this manner. The African's were placed in both the wings, and the GAVLES and SPANIARDS fet in a squadron in the middest. The light horsemen first begannethe skirmish, and after them followed the men of armes: and because the space betwixt the river and the sootemen was very narrow, fo as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell fight for the time. though it lasted not long. So, the horsemen of the Romaines being ouerthrowne, the sootemen came with fuch a luftie courage to receive the charge, that they thought they fhould not have day enough to fight. Howbeit, the over-earnest defire they had to overcome their enemics, made their ouerthrow more miserable, then their joy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, (who as we have faid before kept the battell) not being able any longer to withstand the force of the Romain es, they retired towards the Afri-CAN'S in the wings. The ROMAINE'S perceiving that, ranne vpon the enemies with all the furie they could, and had them in chase and fought with them, till they were gotten in the middest of them. Then the CARTHAGINIAN's that were in both wings, came and compassed them in beforethey were aware. Moreouer, there were fine hundred of the Nymidian horsemen, that colourably fled vnto the Confuls, who received them very courteoufly, & placed them in the rereward of the army. They feeing their time, shewed behind the enemies, and did sodainely give them charge. Then the armie of the ROMAINES was vtterly ouerthrown, and Hannibal obtained victory. Linie writeth, that there were flain in this battel*forty thousand footmen, & aboue two thousand seven hundred horsemen. Polybins faith, that there were many more slaine. Well, letting this matter passe, it is certaine that the Romains had never greater losse, neither in the first war with Africke, nor in the fecond by the Carthaginians, as this ouerthrow that was full, flaine at the bat. giuen at CANNES. For there was flaine the Conful Paulus Amylius himfelfe, a man undoubted-

nf death: Cn. Servilius (Confull the yeare before) was also flaine there, and many other that had bene Consuls, Prators, and others of such like dignity, Captaines, Chiefteines, and many other Senators and honest citizens, and that such a number of them, that the very cruelty it selfe of the the battell enemy was fatisfied. The Conful Terentius Varro, who was the onely author of all this war and flaughter, feeing the enemy victor enery way, he faued himfelfe by flying. And Tutidanus a Chieftaine of a band, comming through his enemies with a good company of his men, he came vnto Canvs IV M. Thither came also about ten thousand me, that had escaped fro their enemies. as out of a dangerous storme: by whose consent, the charge of the whole army was given ynto Appius Pulcher, and also vnto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwards did end this war. Thus was the end of the battell fought by CANNES. Newes flew straight to Rome of this ouerthrow, the which though they infly filled all the city with forrow & calamity, yet the Senate & people of Rom B keptalwaies their countenance and greatnesse, euen in this extreame misery. Infomuch they had - stancing not onely good hope to keepe their city fafe, but furthermore they leavied a new army, and the Remains madeyong mento beare armor, and yet left not Sieile and Spaine vnprouided in the meane tie. time fo that they made the world to wonder at them, to confider these things, how they could inso great calamity and trouble haue so noble hearts, and such wise counsell. Butto let passe the former ouerthrowes, and great loffes they sustained at Ticinym, at Tree in, and at the lake of The Ro-THRACIMENE: what nation or people could have bornethis last plague, wherby y whole force and power of the Romaine swan in manner veterly descroyed and overthrowne and yet the battels to people of Rome so held it out, and that with so great wisedome and counsell, that they neither Hannibal lacked manhood nor magnanimity. Befides, to helpe them the more, Hannibal being conqueror, trifling time in taking his leifure, & refreshing his army the gaue the ROMAINES leifure that were Trasment. ouercome to take breath again, and to reftore themselues. For doubtlesse, if Hannibal being conqueror, had immediatly after the victory obtained, brought his army directly to Rome, furely & ROMAINES had bene viterly vidone, or at the least had bin copelled to have put al in venture. Soitis reported, that Hannibal oftentimes afterwards repented himselie he followed not his vidory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counfell which wished him to let his fouldiers rest, then Maharbals advice, generall of his horsemen, who would have had him gone Maharbal fraight to Rome, and so have ended all this war. But he seeing Hannibals delay, told him (as it General of isreported) this that is now commo in every mans mouth: Hannibal, thou knowest how to overcome, but thou knowest not how to vie victory. But what althings are not (as Neffor faith in Ho. Maharbals mer)giue to me altogether. For fome had no skill to ouercome, others knew not how to follow signing to their victory, and some also could not keepe that they had won. Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes that made war with the ROMAINES, was one of the famousest captains that ever was yet as men write of him, though he was maruellous fortunate to conquer realmes, he wold neuer keep the. Euenfo in like maner, some captaines have bin endued with excellent vertues, and yet not withflanding haue bene insufficient in martial affaires deseruing praise in a captaine, as we may reade indiners histories. Now after this battel fought by CANNES, the ATTELLANIANS, the CALA-TINIANS, the SAUNITES, after them also the BRVTIANS, LVCANIANS, & divers other nations and people of ITALY, carried away with the fame of this great victory they all came and yeelded to Hannibal. And the city of Capva alfo (which Hannibal was defirous to have won long before) for faking their old friends and confederates, made new league and friend ship with Hannibal; the which wan him great estimatio with other nations. For at that time the city of Capva was very populous and of great power, and the chiefest city of estimation of all ITALY next to Rome. Now to tell you in few words what is reported of CAPVA, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the Thus cans, y which was first called Vulturnym, & after that Capua, by y name of their gouernor called Capius; or otherwife, (as it is most likely) because of the fields round about it; for The city of onevery fide of it, there are goodly pleafant fields, ful of alkinds of fruits growing on the earth, capua, how called in Greek, Kepi. Furthermore, all the country is confined round about with famous nations. Towards the feathere dwell the SVESANIANS, the CVMANIANS, & the NEAPOLITANS. Onfirme land also towards the north, are the GALENTINIANS and the CALENIANS. On the East & Southside, the DVNIANS & the Nolians. Furthermore, y place is of a strong situation, and on the one fide is compassed in with the sea, & on y other side with great high mountaines. Nowthe CAMPANIANS florished maruellously at that time: & therfore seeing the Romains in maner vtterly vndon by the battel they had lost at CANNEs, quickly took part with the stroger, as it commonly falleth out; and furthermore besides that they made league with Hannibal, they received him into their citie with great triumph, hoping that the warre being ended, they should be the chiefest and wealthiest of all ITALY. But marke how men are commonly deceived intheir expectation. Now when Hannibal came into the citie of CAPVA, there was a world of people that went to fee him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy victories he had won of the enemy. So being come into the citie, they brought him vnto Pacuuius house, his very familiar friend, who was a man of great wealth and authoritic, as any among all the CAMPANIANS. Then he made him a notable banket, to the which no citizens were bidden, fauing onely Inbellius Taurea a front man, and the sonne of Pacunius his host: who through his fathers meanes, with much ado, was reconciled to Hannibal, for that Hannibal hated him as he did, because he followed Decius Magius, who alwaies tooke the Romaines part. But now let vs consider a litle I pray you, how great men sometimes vnawares are subject to great dangers and misfortunes. For this yong man diffembling his reconciliation with Hannibal, watching time and occasion notwithstanding to do him some displeasure, in the time of this feat. while they were making merry, he tooke his father aside into a secret corner of the house, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeeme the fauor and good will again. of the Romains, the which they had lost through their great wickednes. Then he told him how he was determined to kill Hannibal the enemy of his country, and all ITALY besides. His father that was a man of great countenance and authoritie, was maruelloufly amazed withall, to heare what his fonne faid: wherefore embracing him with the teares running downe his cheekes, he prayed him to leaue off his fword, and to let his guest be safe in his house. The which his sonne in the end yeelded with great ado. Thus Hannibal having before withstood all the force of his enemics, the ambushes of the GAVLES, and having brought with him also a great army from the fea, & the farthest part of Spaine, through so many great and mightie nations: he scaped killing very narrowly by the hand of a yong man, whileft he was at the table making merry. Thenext morning Hannibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promifes, and told them many things, which the CAMPANIAN's cafily beleeved; and therefore flattered themsclues, that they should be Lords of all ITALY: how beit they reckoned beside their host. And to conclude they did so cowardly submit themselves to Hannibal, that it seemed they had not only fuffred him to come into their city, but that they had also made him their absolute Lord, likemen that neither remembred nor regarded their libertie. And this appeareth plainly one example I will shew you amongst many. Hannibal willed them to deliner Decius Magius, the head of the country faction to him. Wherunto the Senate not only obeyed with all humilitie, but work of all, suffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the presence of all the people: who because he would not for sake the ancient league and friendship with the Romaines, had shewed himselfe a more faithfull citizen to his countrey and commonwealth, then vnto the barbarous people. Now whilest these things passed thus in Carva, Mago (Hannibals brother) went to CARTHAGE, to report the newes of his happy victory to his countrimen, which they had won of the enemies: and withall, before the Senate to declare the noble exploits of armes done by Hamibal. And to proue the words true he spake, he powred out at the coming in of the Senatehouse, the golden rings which had bin taken fro the Romains knights: of the which there were (as some do report) aboue a bushell ful, and as other some do write, aboue three bushels full and a half. After that, he prayed a new supply for Hannibals army; which was granted them by the Senate with greater ioy then afterwards it was fent. For the CARTHAGINIANS, perswaded themfelues by the things present, that the war would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was faire. they thereupon decreed to continue the warre, and to aid Hannibals attempts, by leaying of foldiers. Now no man withflood this new fupply to be fent to Hannibal, but Hanno a perpetual enemic of the Barcinian faction. Howbeitthe Carthaginians weighed not his counsell and aduice then, though it tended to peace, and was good counsell for them, as oftentimes before he had vied the like, So when Hannibal had made league with the CAMPANIANS, he led his camp before the citie of No LA, hoping they would yeeld of themselues without copulsion. And certainly fo it had come to passe, had not the sodaine coming thither of Marcellus the Prætor bene, who both kept the people in, pacified the fedition, and repulsed the enemy that was coming into the citie, by a fally he made vpon him at three feuerall gates, chasing and killing them euen to their campe with great losse. This is that noble Captaine and valiant fouldier Marcellus, who

with a noble courage made the world know, that Hannibal was not inuincible. Hannibal percei- Marcellus uing that there was no other way, but to let Nola alone til another time the came to Aceres, vistorie of and tooke and spoiled it without resistance. Then going on further with greater power vnto Ca. at the stile SILINVM, a fit place to offend the CAPVANS, he went about to win the that lay there in garrifo: of Wola. but when he saw that neither his faire promises, nor otherwise his threats could prevaile, he left nart of his army to befiege the citie, and bestowed the residue in garrisons before the winter seaion. Howbeit he chose for his chiefest seate and strength the citie of CAPVA, which stood very pleasantly, and had plentic of all things. There it was that Hannibals fouldiers being yfed to lichard, and easily to away with cold, hunger and thirst, became then of valiant men, rank cowards, of strong men weaklings, and of seruiceable and ready men, timorous and effeminate perfons. through the dayly pleasures they enjoyed at will. For sweete inticing pleasures do corrupt fouldiers thestrength and courage of the mind, and mans disposition vnto vertue: moreover they spoile marred hiswit, and take all good counsell from him, al which things are dangerous for men. And therefore Plato rightly calleth pleasure, the baite of all cuils. And doubtlesse in this case, the pleasures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS, more then otherwise the highest Alpes, & all the the baite of armies of the Romaines did. For one onely winter passed ouer in such pleasure and wanton- all emils. nesse, was of such great force to extinguish the vehement courage in the soldiers, that when they were brought into the field at the beginning of the spring, sure you would rightly have said that they had forgotten all martial discipline. Thus the winter being passed ouer, Hannibal returned againe to Casilinva, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeeld vnto him, afterthey had abidden fo long a fiege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extremity, before they would yeeld to their fo cruell an enemy, although they lacked victuals. Wherfore living first by spealt, or beare barley, and afterwards with nuts which they had received of the Romaines by the river of VVLTVRNVS: they held it out so long, that Hannibal in the end being angrie anstoline with the continuance of the fiege, he was content to take the citie vpon composition, the which during Hand hehadrefused before. Now this warre, in the which the CARTHAGINIANS had alwayes had great victories and good fortune, and received no losse worthy of memory, began at that time good forto decline, and to fall to great change and alteration. For the league that was made with Philip king of Macebon, and the new aid and supply that was sent from Carthage, and the taking of Petilia, Constantia, and of other cities of the countrey of the Brytians, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other fide, the great victories which the ROMAINES had wonne vpon the enemies of Spaine and Sardinia, did greatly encourage them, and gaue themalfogood hope that their affaires would prosper better and better. They had also chosen threeexcellent Captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Mircellus, a man Three famost worthy of praise for martiall discipline: who so wisely gouerned the affaires of the start, that Hampiled found he should make warre with an enemy, no lette politicle and wife, there has that Hannibal found he should make warre with an enemy, no lesse politicke and wise, then hardieand valiant. For first of all, he was driven from the citie of Cymes, with great slaughter of maines, his men, by Sempronius Gracehus, and forced to raife his fiege: and fhortly after he was our come Maximus, by Marcellus, in a battell he fought at Nola. For there were flaine about a thousand Roman's and 6000 CARTHAGINIANS flaine and taken flying. Now it is eafily seene what great importance that battell was of: because Hannibal immediatly upon it, raised his siege from Nola, and went into Africa to winter his army there. By this meanes came the Romaines to recouer againe, as out of a great ficknesse, and sent a great power against the enemy; and were not content onely to keepe their owne, but they durst also inuade others. So their chiefest intent was, against HZ to befige the city of CAPVA, for the injurie they had but lately received of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the battell was fought at CANNES, they for fooke the Romaines, euen in the life intheir greatest extremitie and miserie, and tooke part with Hannibal that was conquerour, forgetting the great pleasures their citie had received in old time by the ROMAINES. On the other fide, the CAMPANIANS knowing they had made a fault, and being afraid of this new pre-Paration of the Romaines, they fent to Hannibal into Apvila, to pray nim to come and ayd thaginians their citie (being of the number of the confederates) in their greatest necessitie. Hannibal departed out of Apvlia without delay, and came on with great journeys into Campania, hundred and camped by TIPATA ouer CAPVA, whereby he rather deferred till another time, then preuented the plague hanging ouer the CAMPANIANS heads: fo spoyling the countrey round about NAPLES, he began to take conceit of a new hope, that he might take Nola by treason.

For in Nola, the people & Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were like. wise in divers other cities of ITALY. The common people desirous of change, favored Hannibal and the noble men, and men of authority, tooke part with the people of Rome. So when Hannibal went to take the city of Nora, Marcellus met him with his army in battel ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, even at the first meeting. There y Romain's over came and draue the enemy with such manhood and readinesse, that if the horsemen which had taken another way had come in in time, as Marcellus commanded them; no question the CAB-THAGINIANS had bin veterly ouerthrown. Hamibal after he had retired his army into his camp with great flaughter, he shortly after departed thence, and went into the country of the Salen, TINIANS. For certain yong TANENTINES that had bin taken prisoners in former battels, where the Romain's had bin ouerthrowne, and that were afterwards deligered free without ransome they to flew themselves thankfull, had put Hannibal in hope to deliver him the city of TAREN. TVM, so he would bring his army before the city. Hannibal inticed by their promises, did whathe could to obtaine it, because he might have some city vponthe sea in his power, the which he had defired of long time. And indeed, of all the cities vpon the sea coast, there was none so meeters TARENTYM, to bring aid out of GRECE thither, and also to furnish the camp with many things that were to be occupied daily. So though this thing was drawn out in length, by the garrifon of the ROMAIN'S that valiantly refifted: yet Hannibal neuer gaue ouer his enterprife, vntill that Nico and Philomenes, the authors of the treason, had deliuered him the citie into his hands. The Ro. MAINS kept only the castle, the which is in maner enuironed with the sea on three sides: & on the fourth fide, that lay upon the firme land, it was very ftrong with rampiers & bulwarks. Hannibal perceiuing that he could do no good on that fide, because of their great strength: he determined to shut withe mouth of the hauen of TARENTYM, hoping that was the only way to make the Ro. MAIN'S yeeld, when their victuals should be cut from them. Yet the enterprise seemed very hard because the enemies had all the straights of the hauen in their power, & the ships also that should befrege the iffue of the hauen, were flut vp in a narrow litle place, and were to be drawneout of the hauen, at the foot of the caftle, to bring them into the next fea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuise how to bring this enterprise to passe: Hannibal himselse perceived that these ships might be drawne out of the hauen with certaine engines, and then to cartthem through the citie to the sea. So having his cunning workmen in hand with the matter, the ships within few daies after were taken out of the hauen, & caried into the fea, & then came & flewed before the bar of the hauen. Thus the city of TARENTYM being wonagain after the Romains had kept it the space of a hundred years. Hannibal leaving the castle besieged both by sea & land, hereturned into Samnivm. For the Confuls of the Romains had spoiled & stripped the Cam-PANIAN'S that went out to forrage, & having brought their army before CAPVA, they determine ned (if it might be) to win it by fiege. Wherfore Hantbal being very fory for the fiege of CAPVA, he came with all hisarmy against the enemy: and seeing shortly after that the Romains did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward, & doubtlesse to fight, it wold haue proued a bloudy battel, had not Sempronius army fenered them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracchus in the countrey of LVKE. For they feeing this army far off, before they could know who they were, the Romaines & Car-THAGINIANS were both affraid, and so retired into their campe. Afterwards the Consuls went into seuerall countries, the one into Lvke, and the other towards CvMes, to make Hannibalremoue from CAPVA: who went into LVCANIA, and found occasion to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly and desperatly did hazard his army left him in charge, against a subtill & dangerous enemy. The battel being begun, M. Centenius was flaine valiantly fighting, and few other escaped. After this also there hapned another losse; for Hannibal returning shortly after into A-PVLIA, he met with another army of the ROMAINES, the which Fabins the Prætor led, who also entrapped that army by ambushes, and slue the most of them: so that of 2000 men, 2000 scant escaped the edge of the sword. In the meane time the Confuls perceiving that Hannibal was gone, they came with all their army vnto CAPVA, and did befrege it round. This being come to Hannibals care, he came with his army into CAMPANIA, in very good order and well appointed: and at his first coming he set upon the campe of the Romaines, having first willed the Cam-PANIANS at the selfe same instant to make a sallie out on them. The Romaine Consuls at the first tumult of their enemies, deuided the army betweene them, and went against them. The

CAMPANIANS were easily driven againe into the city: how beit against Hannibal, the battell was very bloudy. For if euer he proued himselfe a valiant Captaine or noble souldier, that day he hewed it. He attempted alfoto furprise the Romains by some stratageme. For as his men were Hannibals about to breake into the Romaines campe, he fent one thither that had the Latine tong excellently well, who cried out by the commandement of the Confuls, that the ROMAINS shold faue themselves in the next mountaines, considering they had almost lost all their campe & strength. This cry made on y sudden had easily moved the that heard it, if the Romain's being throughly acquainted with Hannibal's subtilities, had not found out his deceit. Wherfore one of them incouraging another, they made the enemy retire, and compelled him in despite of his beard to fleinto the campe. When Hannibal had done what he could by all device and practife possible norallethe siege from CAPVA, & perceiuing al would not serue, being sory for the danger of his confederates: he then determined to call a counfel, the which he had passed ouer a long time, hauing reserved it for the last resuge. For he trussed vp his cariage, and marched away with his army and as quietly as he could, he passed ouer the river of Vulturnus, and coasting through the courries of $ Sidicinians, Arifanians, & Cassinians, he came to Rome with enfignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them raise their siege, being so earnestly bent to win CARVA. This flying straight to Rom B by currers, they were so afraid there, as Rom B was never inlike feare it stood in then. For they faw their mortal enemy come to the with enfignes displaid whom they had fo often proued, almost to the vtter destruction of their Empire; and now they fawhim present, whom they could not resist being absent, threatning to bring the Senate & peopleof Rome into subjection. So all Rome being in feare & rumult, it was ordained that Fuluius Flacess (one of the Confuls lying before CAPVA) should be sent for home. And that the new Confuls Sulpitius Galba, & Cornelius Centimalus, should lie in camp out of the city: & that C. Cal- Sulpitius parains Pretor should put a strong garrison into the Capitoll, and also that the citizens that had Gallascorhorneany office or dignitie, should be appointed by their countenance and authority to pacifie the fudden tumults that might happen in the citie. So Hannibal marched forward without flay- confuls. ine, till he came to the river of Anienes, & there camped within 24. furlongs of Rome: & shortly after that, he came with 2000 horse so neare vnto Rome, that riding frothe gate Colling, vnto Hereules temple, he had leifure to view at his pleafure, the fituation and wals of fo great a citie. Faluius Flaccus feeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent out certaine men at armes of the ROUAINES against him: who coming with great fury to give charge vpon him as they were commanded, they easily fent him packing. The next morning Hannibal brought his army out of Hannibal the campe, and did fer them in battell ray, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the invade enemy to battell. The Romain's onthe other fide did the like. So, both armies marched one against the other with such life and courage, that to see them, they appeared men that seared no danger, fothey might obtaine the victorie that day. For on the one fide, the CARTHAGINIANS were to fight (in manner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended your this battel, as being the last they shold fight. The Romatns in cotrary maner, they were to fight for their country liberty, & their goods, to fee whether they could keep them, or that they shold come into their enemies hands. Howbeit there fell out a thing worthy of memory. For asthey were ready fet in battell ray, tarying but for the fignall of battell to give charge, there fell fuch a wonderfull great shower and storme voon them, that both of them were driven in spite of their tethes, to bring backe their army into their forts again. The next day following in like maner, VIIIO the which it seemed the battell had bene deferred, when they had againe both of them see their men in battell ray, there fell the like storme vpon them, which did as much hurt the Ro-MAINES and CARTHAGINIANS, as the first so that it forced them onely to looke to saue themselves, & not to thinke otherwise to fight. Hannibal perceiving this, he turned to his friends and toldthe, that the first time he thought not to win to Rome, & that at the second time the occasio was taken from him. So there was a thing that greatly troubled Hannibal, and that was this. That though he came so neare to Rome, with an army of horsemen and sootmen: yet he heard that the ROMAINE'S had fent aid into Spaine, and that he had redeemed the country where he had bene, at a farre greater price then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he caused all the goldsmiths and bankers shops of the ROMAINES citizens to be fold by the Cryer. Butafterwards casting with himselfe, what a hard enterprise it was to take the citie of Rome, orelfebeing afraid to lacke victuals (for he had stored himselfeonely but for ten dayes,)

he raifed his campe, and remouing thence came vnto the holy wood of the goddeffe Feronia, and rifled the rich temple there, and afterwards went thence into the countrey of the BRVTIANS and Lycanians. The Carvans having intelligence thereof, being left out of all hope, they yeek ded vp their city vnto the ROMAINES. The city of CAPVA being thus yeelded vp, & broughts. gaine to the subjection of y ROMAINES, it was of great importance to all the people of ITATIL and withall brought great defire of change. Hannibal himfelfe also following euill counfell did spoile and destroy many cities he could not keepe: whereby he did stirre vp the hearts of diners. nations against him. For where before when he was conquerour, he had often let prisoners en without ransome paying, through which liberality he had won the hearts of many mencuents at that present time, his barbarous cruelty made divers cities (misliking to be subject to the Case THAGINIANS) to rebell against him, and to take part with the Romaines. Amongst them was SALAPIA, the which was yeelded up into the Confull Marcellus, by Blacius meanes chiefeofall the Romaine faction and a band also of choise horsinen which was left there in garison, were in maner flaine enery man of them. This is the city where Hannibal fell in fancy with a gentle. woman, & therefore they greatly reproue his immoderate luft & lasciuiousnesse. Howbeitthere are others, that greatly commending the continency of this Captaine, say, that he did neuer care lying, and neuer dranke aboue a pinte of wine, neither when he came to make war in ITALY, nor after that he returned into Africk E. Somethere be also that say, Hannibal was cruell & vicon. frant, & subject to diverse such other vices howbeit they make no maner of mention of hisch. flity or incotinency. But they report that his wife was a Spaniar d, borne in Castvio, agood towner and that the CARTHAGINIAN'S granted her many things, and trufted her very much be. cause of the great faith and constancy of that nation. Now Hamibal after he had lost (as we have told you) the city of Salapia, he found the meanes to cry quittance, & to make the Romains lose more then he had lost. For at the felfe same time Fuluius Viceconsull lay besieging of Har. DONE A, hoping to win the citie without resistance. And because he stood in no feare of any ene. mie round about him (for Hannibal was gone into the countrey of the BRYTIANS) he kept no watch, and was altogether negligent in martial affaires, contrary to the nature of the ROMAINE captaines. Hamnibal being advertifed thereof by spials, would not lose such a goodly oportunity; & therfore coming into Apvlia with his army ready, he came fo hastily vpo Herdonia, that he had almost stolne upon Fulnius, unprouided in his camp. How beit the Romains valiantly re. ceined the first charge with such courage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithstanding in the end, as the ROMAINS two yeares before that had bin ouercome not far from thence, with their Conful Fuluius; even so like wise under the conduct of this Fuluius Viceconful, the ROMAINE legions were viterly overthrowne, & their Captaine flaine, with the most part of his army. The Confull Marcellus was at that time in the city of Samnivm, who being aduertifed of this great ouerthrow, defired to be even with him: and though it feemed he cametoo late to helpe things past remedy, yet he brought his army into the countrey of the LveANIANS, whither he vnderstood Hannibal was gone after his victory, and came and camped directly our against his enemy, & soone after came to battel. The which the CARTHAGINTANS refused not, but gaue such a fierce onset on either fide, that they fought it out till Sunne-set, and no man knew who had the better, and fo the night parted them. The next morning the Romains shewing againe in field in battell ray, made it knowne that the enemies were afraid of them. For Hanmibal kept his men within the campe, and the next night following stole away without any noise, and went into Apvila. Marcellus also followed him foote by foote, and sought to put all to hazard by fome notable battell: for he bare himfelfe thus in hand, that of all the Romains Captaines there was none matchable with Hannibal but himfelte, either in counfell, wit, or policy, or else in martiall discipline, or warlike stratagemes. Howbeit the winter following kept him, that he could not fight any fet battell with the enemie; for after he had made a few light skirmishes, because he would not trouble his souldiers any more in vaine, he bestowed themin garrison for the winter time. At the beginning of the next spring, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Confuls for that yeare) and partly also through his owne dispofition, he brought out his garrifons sooner then they were looked for, and came with his army against Hannibal, who lay at that time at CANVSIVM. Now it chanced, that through the nearflifts of the nesse of both their camps, and the good desire they both had to fight, in few dayes they fought three feuerall times. The first battel, when they had fought it out till night, in maner like hope of both sides, and that it could not be judged which of them had the better they both of purpose retired into their campe againe. The second day Hannibal was conqueror, after he had slaine almost two thousand seven hundred enemies, and put the residue of the army to slight. The third day, the Romaines to recouer the shame and dishonor they had lost the day before, they were the first that prayed they might fight, & so Marcellus led them out to battell. Hannibal wondring artheir valiantnesse, said vnto his people, that he dealt with an enemy that could never be quiet conqueror, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloudy and cruell then any that was before: because the Romaines did their best to be revenged of their losse, and the Carthaginians on the other side were mad in their minds, to see that the vanquished durst prouoke the vanquificts vinto battell. In the end, the ROMAINES being sharply reproued, and also perswaded by words of Marcellus to sticke to it valiantly like men, that the news of their victory might come to Rome, beforethe newes of their ouerthrow: they flew in among the preasse of their enemies, and nenerlest fighting, till that after they had thrise broken their enemies, they made them all slie. At the selfe same time Fabius Maximus tooke the citie of TARBNTVM againe, almost after the selfe fame forthit was lost. This being reported vnto Hannibal, he said: the Romaines have also their Hannibal. The next yeare following, Marcellus & Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing Marcellus toput themselues in readinesse for warre, they led both the armies against the enemy. Hannibal and crispi. despairing that he was not able to refift the in battel, he fought all the wits he had to deuise some offices way to intrap the by fubrilty, whom he could not ouercome by battel. So Hannibals head being occupied thus, there was offered him a better occasion to bring this enterprise to passe, then he looked for Betweene both camps, there was a prety groue, in the which Hannibal laid certaine bands of the NVMIDIANS in ambush, to intrapthe enemies passing too & fro. On the other side, Hamibal the Confuls by confent of them all, thought it best to fend to view this groue, and to keepe it if laith am. need required: left in leaving it behind them, the enemies should come, and so be voon their biffor the iackes afterwards. Now before they removed their army, both the Consuls went out of their campe, with a finall company of horfmen with them, to view the fituation of this place; and fo going on very vndifercetly, and worse appointed then became men of their authority & place, they unfortunately fell into Hannibals ambush. So, when they saw themselves in a moment compassed about on every side with enemies, that they could not go forward, and were also fought withallbehind: they defended themselues the best they could, rather by copulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So, Marcellus was flaine fighting valiantly: and Crispinus the o- The death ther Confull also very fore hurt, who hardly scaped the enemies hads. Hannibal being advertised of Marei. that Marcellus was flaine, who was the chiefest man of althe Romain & Captains, that had most hindered the happy fuccesse of his victories, & had besides troubled him most: he presetly went and camped there where the battell was fought, & when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue ithonorable pompe and funerall. Hereby we may see how magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, The power are effected of all men: confidering that the cruell and most mortall enemy gaue honorable buriallto so noble and excellent a Captaine. The Romains in the meane time seeing one of their Confuls dead, and the other Confull very fore hurr, they drew straight to the next mountaines, and camped in a strong place. Howbeit Crispinus had sent to the next townes of the mountaines, to aduertife them that Marcellus his companion was dead, and that the enemy had gotten the ring he fealed his letters withall, wherfore he wished them to beware of any letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus messenger came but newly vnto Salapia, when letters were brought also from Hannibal in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they fent his messenger away, and carefully looked for Hannibals coming. About the fourth watch of the night, Hannibal came to the city of Salapia, who of purpose had put all the Romain Es that had fled, in the vaunt guard, because that they speaking the Latine tongue, might make them beleeue that Marcellus was there in person. So when the citizenes had suffered 600 of them to come in, they shut too the gates, and with their shot and darts thrust out the rest of the army, and then put all them to the sword they had let into the city. Thus Hamnibal being in a maruellous rage he had miffed of his purpole, he removed thence, & went into the country of the BRYTIANS, to aid the Lock IANS that were befreged by the ROMAINES, both by fea and by land. After all these things, at the earnest with the request of the Senate and people, two new Consuls were created, both famous captaines, & va- Nero conliant fouldiers, Marcus Liuius, & Claudius Nero: who having deuided y army betwixt them, went

The last battell Hanmibalfought in Italy was with Sempronius, in the which he ouercame Hannibal. Hannibal fent for to vaturne in to Africke after he had yeares in

vnto their seueral charge and prouinces. Claudius Nero went into the country of the SALENTH NIANS, & M. Liuius into GAVLE, against Hasdrubal BARCINIAN, who was come ouer the Alps & made hast to iown with his brother Hannibal, bringing with him a great army both of footma and horsemen. Now it chanced at the same time, that Hannibal had received great losse by Class dius the Cosul. For first of al, he ouercame him in the country of the Lycanians, vsing the like policies & fetches that Hannibal did. Afterwards again, meeting with Hanibal in Apvita, by the city of VENVSIA, he fought such a lusty battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by itin the field. By reason of the great losses, Hannibal suddenly went to METAPONT, to renew his army again. So having remained there a few daies, he received the army from Hanno, the which he joyned vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSIA. C. Nero lay not far from VENVSIA with his campe: who having intercepted letters of his enemies, he understood by them that Hafdrubal was at hand with his army. Therupon he bethought himself night & day, what policy hemight vie to preuent the ioyning of two fo great armies together as these. So, after he had taken aduice ofhimselfe, he followed in sight a dangerous determination, but peraduenture necessary, as the time required. For leaving the camp vnto the charge of his Lieutenant, he took part of the ar. my with him, & making great iourneyes, came to Pisenv M (being the marches of Ancona) fo that on the fixt day he came to SENA. There both the Consuls io yned their forces together, & fetting vpon Hafdrubal by the river of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell, For. as it is reported, there were fix and fifty thousand of the enemies flaine on that day: so that they almost had as great an ouerthrow, as the Romaines had received before at the battel of Can-NES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victory, returning as speedily voto VENY STARShe went thence, he set vp Hajdrubals head, where the enemies kept the watch: and did let certaine prisoners go, to carie news to Hannibal of this great ouerthrow. For afterwards it was knowne, that Hannibal knew nothing yet of Claudius fecret enterprise, nor of the speedy executio & great flaughter he had made. Whereat fure I can but wonder, that fo fubtle a Captaine as Hannibal, could be deceined by Clodius, confidering both their campes lay fo neare together: fo that he first heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and of all his army, before he vnderstood any thing of the Confuls departure, or heard of his returne against the campe. Now Hamibal having not only received a generall, but also a particular great losse by the death of hisbrother, he faid then, he plainly faw the change and alteration of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune: and shortly after remoued his campe, and went thence into the countrey of the BRYTIANS. For he knew that this great ouerthrow given by the river of Metaurum, was a maruellous incouragement to the Romaines, and would also be a great log in his way, for the successe of this warre. This notwithstading, he gathered together all his power he had left in ITALY, after so many great battels and conflicts, and to many cities taken and maintained the warre with an inuincible courage. But the most strangest thing in Hannibal was this, that through his authoritie & wisdome, he kept all his army in peace and amity together (being a medley of Spaniards, Africans, GAVLES, and of diverse other nations) & never man heard that there was any brawle or tumult among them. Howbeit the ROMAINES themselues, after they had wonne Sicile, Sardinia, and SPAINE againe, they could neuer vtterly ouercome him nor drive him out of ITALY, beforethey had fent P. Cornelius Scipio into Africk E: who making warre with the CARTHAGI-NIANS, he brought them to fuch great extremity, that they were driven to fend for Hannibal home out of ITALY. Hannibal at that time (as we have faid before) was in the countrey of the BRYTIANS, making war by inrodes and sudden inuations, rather then by any fought battell: fa uing that once there was a battell fought in hast betwixt him and the Consull Sempronius, and immediatly after he came & fet vpon the same Sempronius with all his army. At this battell Hannibal had the victory: but at the fecond, Sempronius ouercame him. Since that time, I can find in no Greeke nor Latine Author, that Hannibal did any famous act in ITALY worthie memorie. For being fent for into Africke by the Carthaginians, he left Italy fixteene yearesafter this Africk E war was begun, greatly complaining of the Senate of Carthage, & of himfell alfo. Of the Senate, because that all the time he had bene in his enemics countrey so long, they had allowed him so litle money; and so scanted him besides with all other things necessary for the wars. And of himself, because that after he had so often ouercome the Romains, he had al wayes delaied time after the victory, and had given the enemy liberty to gather force againe. I is reported also, that before he imbarked and tooke sea, he set vp atriumphing arch or pillar, by the temple of Iuno Lacinia, in the which were briefly grauen his noble victories, both in the Pu- Hannibais nickeand Greeketongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind ferued him so well. that in few daies he arrived at LEPTIS, & lading all his army, he first came to ADRVMENTYM, & Hammbal afterwards vnto ZAMA. There receiving advertisement how the affaires of the CARTHAGINI- departed ANS prospered, he thought it best to denise some way to end this war. For this cause he sent vnto scioio, to pray him to appoint him some convenient place where they might both meet, & talke rogether of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainely knowne, whether Hannibal didthis of his owne head, or by commandement of the Senate. Scipio refused not to come to parly. Wherefore at the day appointed, there met two famous Generals of mightie nations, in Hamiltonia agreat plaine together, either of them having his interpreter; to talke together of diverse matters and Scipios touching peace and warre. For Hannibal was altogether bentto peace, because he saw the affaires of § CARTHAGINIANS waxeworfe & worfe tuery day: that they had loft Sicil B; SAR. DINIA, and SPAIN E: because the warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICKE; because Sythan (a mighty king) was taken prisoner of the ROMAINEs: and also because that their last hope ronfissed in the army he had brought into Africk E, which was the only remaine and reliefe of folonga war as he had made in ITALY: and also because that the CARTHAGINIANS had so small apower left (both of strangers, and also of citizens) that there were scarce men inough to defind the city of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio with a long Oration he made, ratherto agree to peace, then to resolue of warre. Howbeit scipio that lived in hope to bring this warreto a good end, would not seeme to give eare to any peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either fide, in the end they brake off, & made no agreemet. Shortly after, wasthis famous battel striken by the city of ZAMA, in v which the Romains obtained victory. Scipioes  For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne vpon their owne army, so they of the that they did put all Hannibals horsemen out of order And I alive and Massille, upon models of Carthagini. that they did put all Hannibals horsemen out of order. And Lalius and Masinissa, who made both amatrice the wings, increasing their seare, gaue the horsemen no leisure to gather themselves in order a- battellof game. Howbeit the footmen fought it out a long time, and with a maruellous great courage: infomuch that the CARTHAGINIANS (trusting in their former victory) thought that all the safety and preservation of Africk f, was all in their hands, and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMAINES on the other fide had as greathearts as they, and befides, they stood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing indeed did the Romaines great service to helpe them to the vidory and that was, Lalius and Masinissaes returne from the chase of the horsemen, who rustedinto the battell of the enemy with great furie, and did put them in a maruellous feare. For atheir coming, the CARTHAGINIANS hearts were done, and they faw no other remedy for them, but to hope to scape by flying. So it is reported, that there were slaine that day, about twentythousand CARTHAGINIANS in the field, and as many more prisoners. Hannibal their Generall, after he had taried to see the end of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the Thoff, ing great flaughter. Afterwards when he was sent for to CARTHAGE, to help to sauchis country, he of Hanniperswaded the Senate not to hope any more in wars, but did couled them, that setting all devices apart, they should send vnto Scipio the ROMAINE Captaine, to make peace with him vpon any condition. When the ten Ambaffadors had brought the capitulation and agreement vnto CAR-THAGE of the articles of peace, it was reported that there was one Gifgo, who milliking to heare talke of peace, made an Oration, and perswaded all he could to renew warre against the Ro-MAINES. Wherefore Hannibal perceiuing that diverse men confirmed his opinion, and being Hannibal much offended to fee such beasts, & men of no vnderstanding, to dare to speake of such matters, sould not in sodangerous a time: he cast himselfe downe headlong, whilest he was yet in his Oration. So when he faw that the citizens and all the whole affembly thought this too presumptuous a part ofhim, & vnmeet altogether for a free citie, he himself got vp into the pulpit for Orations, and hid; Letno man be offended, if a man that from his youth had bene alway out of CARTHAGE, and brought up all his lifetime in wars, be ignorant of the lawes & ordinances of the city. After that, he spake so wisely of the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediatly moued by the authority of so great a person, they all agreed to accept the conditions which the vanquisher, & the necessitie of time offered them. The articles out of doubt were very extreme, and fuch as the vanquished are wont to receive with all extremity by the conquerours. But befides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were bound to pay the ROMAINES an anuall tribute, vntill a certaine time were runout. So when the day came that the first pension was to be

mity of all the city, he answered, that it was no laughter nor reioycing from the heart, but a scor. ning of their fond teares, that we'pt when there was lesse cause (and onely because it touched cuery private mans purse) then before, when the Romaines took from the Carthaginiant their ships, armor, and weapons, and their spoiles of the great victories which they had wonne before and now gaue lawes and ordinances vnto them that were vanquished. I know some An. thors write, that Hannibal immediatly after he had lost the battel, fled into As 1A, for that he was afraid they would deliuer him into Scipioes hands, that perhaps might demand him of them, But whether that was done fuddenly, or some time after the battell was lost at ZAMA, it makes no great matter:confidering that all the world knoweth, that when he faw things brought to extre. mity, he presently fled into Asia vnto king Antiochus. So it is most true, that king Antiochus receited him with great courtefie, and vied him very honorably: infomuch as he made him of councell with him all in all, both in private and publike causes. For the name of Hannibal carried great reputation with all men befides that he had a comon and mortal hate to the Romaines. which was a pricking spurre still to move warre against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy hour cinto that countrey, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king s. gainst them, but also to set wars at liberty against the ROMAINES. So he told him, that the only way to make warre with the Romaines, was to go into Italy to leavy Italian fouldiers, by whom only that victorious countrey of all other nations might be subdued. He requested of the king a hundred thips, 16000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen onely. With this small army he promifed to inuade ITALY, and that he would maruelloufly trouble the ITALIANS: whom he knew yer to stand in no small feare of him, for the very sound of his name onely, because of the late warres he had made there, so fresh yet in memorie. Furthermore, he tooke heart againeyn. to him to renew the warres of Africk E if the king would licence him to fend men vnto CAR. THAGE, to stirre up the Barcinian faction, whom he knew hated the Romaines to death. When he had gotten the king to grant him his request, he called Ariston TYRIAN vnto him. a fine fubtle fellow, and meete for fuch a purpose: to whom he made large promises, and per-Iwaded him to go to CARTHAGE to his friends, and to carie them letters from him. Thus Hannibal being a banished man, and fled out of his country, raised warre in all parts against the ROMAINES. And furely his counfell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his aduice, as he did at the first, then the vaine perswasions of his fine courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes courts, bread Hannibal great enemies. For they being afraid that by his counsels he should grow in great fauour with the king (for he was a wiscandpoliticke Captaine) and that thereby he should be are great sway and authority: to preuentit, they lacked no deuice to bring him in difgrace with the king. And it fo chanced at that time that P. Villins, who came Ambassador vnto Ep HESVS, had often conference with Hannibal. Hereupon his privice enemies tooke occasion to accuse him, and withall, the king himselfe became so italous of it, that from thenceforth he neuer more called him to counfell. At the felfe fametime alfo, as fome do report, Publius Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambassadours fent vnto king Antiochus) talking familiarly with Hannibal, prayed him amongst other things to tell him truly, whom he thought the worthiest Captaine of all others. Hannibal answered him. First he thought Alexander, king of MACE DON the chiefest next vnto him, Pyrrhu, king of the Epinores and thirdly, himfelfe. Then Scipio African fimiling, asked him: what wouldest thou say Hannibal, if thou hadst ouercome me? Truly said he, then I would bechie feft my felfe. This answer pleased Scipio maruellous wel, because he saw he was neither dispiled nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peerelesse, by some secret state tery of Hannibal. After these things Hannibal found occasion to talke with king Antiochus, and began to lay open his life vnto him from his youth, & bewray the malice he had alwayes borne VNTO the ROMAINES: whereby he fo satisfied the king, that he was againe received into his grace and fauour, which he had almost vtterly lost. Thereupon the king was determined to have made him Admirall of his army by sea, the which he had put in readinesse for Iraly, and alfor o make proofe of his great courage and feruice, whom he knew to be a worthie man, and a mortall enemie to the Romaines. But one Theas, Prince of the Atolians, thwarting this opinion, either for malice, or elfe for that his fancy was fuch he altered the kings mind, and rleane changed his purpose, the which was a matter of great importance for the war he preteded to make. For he gaue counfell vnto Antiochus, that he should go himselfe into Gi i e e ,& direct hisown affaires: & that he should not suffer another to cary away the honor & glory of this war. Hamnibal So king Antiochus shortly after went into GRECE, to make war with the ROMAINS. Within few counfelleth daies after, when he cofulted whether he shold make league with the THESSALIANS, Hannibals clousto opinion was specially asked who spake so wisely touching the state of the THESSALIANS, & the make war chiefest matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, & gaue their consents vnto it. Now his opinion was, that they should not need much to care for y Thessalians, but rather to make all the means they could to get king Philip of Mac a Don to take their part, or els to perswade him to be a. Newter, and to take neither part. Furthermore, he gaue counsell to make war with the Romains in their own country, & offered himfelf to aid him the best he could. Euery mangaue good eareto his words, but his opinion was rather comended, then followed. Wherforceurry man maruelled, that fuch a Captaine as he, that had fo many yeares made warre with the ROMAINS (who had in maner conquered all the world) should then be so light set by of the king, when it specially stood him vpon, to have such a mans help & counsell, For, what captaine liuing could a man haue foud more skilful or politike or meeter to make war with the Romains then him? Howbeit the king made no reckoning of him at the first beginning of this warre, but fortly after, difdaining all their counfell, he confessed that Hannibal onely saw what was to be King Antidone. For after the Romains had obtained victory in the warre he made in Grece, Antiochus ment of Hedout of Evrope into Ephesvs, where making merry, and following pleafure, he hoped Hammbal. toline in peace, little thinking the ROMAINES would come with an army into Asia. Now, thefe flattering courtiers fed ftil his humor:a perpetuall plague to kings & princes, that fufferthe felues to be flattered, & are cotented to be deceived, because they give good eare to that that pleaseth them. But Hannibal, who knew the power & ambition of the Romaines, perfwaded the king to hope for any thing rather then peace, & bad him trust to it, that the Romains would never stay. till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third partof the world, as they had done in Africk, & Evrope. Antiochus perswaded by the authority of fuch a man, straight comanded Polyxenidas, a very seruiceable man, & skilful in sea seruice, that he should go meet with the army of the Romaines that was coming thither. Then he sent Hannibal into Syria, to leavy a great number of ships together, and afterwards made him and Hannibal Apollonius (one of his fauoured courtiers) Generals of his army by sea: who notwithstanding rates Antithat Polyxenidas was put to the worst by the Romains, they went & fet vpon the Rhodians, that were confederates with them. Hannibal in this battel affailing Eudamus the Captaine of the by fea toge-RHODIANS, that led the left wing, he had already compassed in the Admirall galley, and doubtlesse had obtained the victory, but that y other wing came in to rescue, after they had followed Apollonius in chase, and tooke the victory from him, that was his owne. After this battell by sea. which had no great good fucces, we do not find that Hannibal did any thing worthy of memorie. For king Antiochus being ouercome, besides other conditions, the ROMAINES offered him, they defired that Hannibal (the mortall enemy of the countrey) should be deliuered vnto them. Hamibal foreseeing this long before, he suddenly stole from Antiochus, after this notable battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the kings power was ouerthrown. So, after Hannibal had wandred vp and downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Prusias king of BYTHINIA, for succor. Now he did not fo much trust to his friendship, but because he fought for the meetest place fedto Pru. he could come by, as also for the safest, the which he most defired: considering that the Ro- flat king of MAINE's had the most part of the sea and land in their subjection. Some say, that after king Aniochus was ouercome, Hannibal went into CRETA vnto the GORTYNIANS: and that the rumour ranimmediatly, he had brought a great masse of gold and filuer with him. Wherefore being a-fraid lest the CRETANS should offer him some violence, he denised this shift to scape the danger: he filled earthen pots with lead gilt, and fent them into the temple of Diana, faining that he was maruellous carefull for them, as though all his treasure had bene there. On the other side he had hidall his gold in images of braffe, the which he had left carelesly lying on the ground in the house. In the meanetime, whilest they watched the temple carefully, that these earthen pots should not be carried away without their privity, Hannibal hoised faile, and sted into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a village vpon the sea side, which the countrey men cal LIBYSSA, of the

The valiant corps of Hannibal, when he was dead and cold. There Hannibal lay, not spending his time idly, but passing it away in exercising of the marriners. riding of horses, and training of his souldiers. Some Authors also do write, that at that time Pruhis made war with Eumenes, king of PERGAMVS, who was a confederate and friend of the Ros NAINS and that he made Hannibal his Lieutenant generall of his army by fea: who affailing Fig. king Prusi-as Generall menes with a new found and vnknowne deuice, wan the victory of the battell by fea, For before they began to fight, it is reported that Hannibal had gotten an infinite number of Inakes into gainst Eu. earthen pots, and when the battell was begun, & they builly tending their fight: hethrew thojmenes, king pots with snakes into the enemies ships, and that by this fearefull and strange deuice he made them flie. Now whether this was true, or not, the old Chronicles do make no maner of mention. but only Amylius and Trogue: and therefore I report me to the Authors. So, the newes of the diffention betwixt these two kings, Prusias and Eumenes being brought to Rome, the Senare sent T. Q. Flaminius Ambassador into As 14, whose name was famous for the noble victories he had obtained in GR BC B to the end (as I coniecture) to make peace betwixt these two kings, Flaminius being come vnto king Prulia, he was maruelloully offended, and fory in his mindto fee Hannibal yet aliue (that was the mortallest enemy of the Romaines) after the conquest of so Titus Quintius Flami. many nations, and the facking of so many people: therefore he was very earnestly in hand with king Prussas, to deliver him Hannibal. Hannibal from the first beginning mistrusted king Prussas inconftancy very much, & therefore had digged diverfe vaults in his house, & made seven seven rall vents to flie out at if he were fuddenly taken. The report of Flaminius coming did increase his suspition the more, for that he thought him the greatest enemy he had in Rom B: both general. ly for the hate he bare vnto all y Romains, as also particularly for the remebrance of his father Flaminius, that was flaine in the battel fought by the lake of Thrafymene. So Hannibal being ful of care & griefe (as it is reported) he found deuices to escape, the which stood him to no purpose against such a great power. For when the kings guard which were sent to take him, had copassed his house about, Hannibal thought to flie at their first coming, & to saue himselfe by the secretest vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the guard, then he determined torid himself out of the Romains hand, by destroying himself. So some do report, that he was strangled by one of his men, whom he had comanded to helpe to dispatch him. Others write againe, that he had drunke buls bloud, & when he had drunke it, died, as Clitarchus, & Stratocles do fally report of Themistocles. Howbeit Titus Livius, that famous Historiographer writeth, that Hannibal called for the poy fon he had ready for fuch a mischiefe, & that holding this deadly drinkeinhis hand, before he dranke, he faid: Come on, let vs rid the Romains of this paine & care, fith their fpite & malice is fo great, to hafte y death of a poore old man, that is halfe dead already. After he had said, bitterly cursing king Prusias, he poysoned himself, being 70 yeares old, as some writers do testific. His body was buried in a tombe of stone by LIBYSSA, on the which was engrauen no more but this: Here lieth Hannibal. The ROMAINS being aduertised of his death, every man said his opinion, as his fancy served him. Some greatly blamed T. 9. Flaminius cruelty, who to make himselfe famous by some notable act (ashe thought) made a poore old man put himselse to death, that was in maner halfe dead by age, and besides, was past doing the state of Rome any more hurt, they being conquerors in maner, of all the world. But fome again on the other fide commended Flaminius for it, & faid, it was a good deed of him, to rid the Romain Es of their mortallenemy: who though he had a weake body, yet he lacked no wir, wife counfell, & great experience in wars, to intice king Prufias to make war, & to moleft all As I a besides, with new wars. For at that time, the power of $\dagger$ king of BITHYNIA was so great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates king of the same BITHINIA, did maruelloufly molest the Romains both by sea & by land, & moreover fought battels with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the Romaines. And fo the Romaines might also be afraid of Prusias, and specially having Hannibalhis Captaine. So some judge, that T. & Flaminius was specially sent Ambassador vnto king Prusias, secretly to practise Hannibals death. Howbeit

Howbeit it is to be supposed, that Q. Flaminius was not so desirous to have Hannibal so suddenly purto death, as he would haue bin glad otherwise to haue brought him again to Rome, that had done fuch mischiefe to his country; and this had bene a great benefit for Rome, & much honor alfo ynto himfelfe. Such was the death of Hannibal the CARTHAGINIAN, a famous man doubtleffe, and highly to be commended for martial praise, setting his other vertues asside. So we may Thepraises eafily judge, of what power and force his noblemind, his great wisdome and courage, and his perfit skill of martiall discipline was in all things. For in all the wars the CARTHAGINIANS had for whemently, and with fuch great preparation enterprifed, they never thought themselves ouercome, till Hannibal was ouerthrowne at that great battell by ZAMA. So it appeareth that all theirstrength and skill of warres began, and also ended with Hannibal their Captaine.

Vblius Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the family of the Cornely (who was the first Romaine Captaine against whom Hannibal fought in Italie) Theparen. was the father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards furnamed African, the first: tage of fo called, because he had conquered that nation. The same Scipio, after he had obtained many great victories in Spaine, and done notable feates of armes, was in the end flaine with a wound he had in a battell against his enemies, as he was plying and encouraging of his men from placeto place, thronging in the greatest danger and fury of the battell. Shortly after did his brother Cn. Scipio also end his life, much after one felf maner, & was flaine valiantly fighting. So these two Captains, besides the same they atchieuedby their noble deeds, left behind the great praise of their faithfulnesse, modesty, & courage: the which made them not only wished for of their souldiers that were then living, but also of all the Spaniar Ds besides. Cn. Scipio had a son called P. Cornelius Nasica, one that had bin Consul, and had also triumphed: who being but a yong man, was thought the meetest man of all the city of Rome to receive Idea the mother of the gods. This Publius had two sonnes, the so famous Scipioes: of the which the one was called Asian, because he conquered Asia: and the other African, because he subdued Africk at that famous battel of Zama, where he ouerthrew Hannibal and the Carthaginians, as we faid before. Whose life we purpose now to write, not so much to make the glory of his name (fo famous by all the Greeke and Latine Authors) the greater by our history, as for that we would make all menknow the order of his noble deeds, & morall ver. tues to the end that all Princes and noble Captains in reading it, should behold the lively image of perfit vertue, which many moue an earnest desire in the to follow the example of P.C. Scipioes life, who from his childhood gaue great hope and shew of a noble nature, and excellent vertue. after he followed the instruction of martiall discipline, vnder the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the fecond war with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the campe being but 17 yeares old, and in a very short time grew so toward and forward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all maner of paines like a fouldier, that he wan great commendation of his own father, and befides, great estimation also of all the army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharp wit and noble courage, that he made him beloued, and also feared of his enemies. For this Scipio was present at the battell of the horsemen, where P. Cornelius Scipio the Confull fought with Hannibal, by the river of Thefin: & some writers do affirme, that Corne. lius the father being hurt, was almost taken by the enemy, had not his son Scipio saued him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was so yong. After that also, at the battell that was fought by CANNES, to the great losse, and in maner vtter destruction of the Empire of Rome. when the 10000 menthat fled to CANVSIVM, had all together with one consent referred the gouernment of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Ædilis, & vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very yong; the same Scipio shewed then by his deeds, what noble mind and courage was in him. For when he faw certaine yong men confult rogether betweene themselues to forfake ITALY, he thrust in among them, and drawing out his sword, made them all sweare they would not for sake their country. These, and such like deeds done by him with a linely courage and noble mind, being then but a yong man, wan him fuch fauour with the Romaines, that not respecting his yong yeares, nor their ancient custome, they called him forward, & laid offices of great charge and gouernment vpon him. Infomuch that when he fued for the office of Ædilis before his duetime, norwithstanding that the Tribunes of the people were against his suite, because he was so young a man: yet the people suffered him to be brought from tribe to tribe, and fo was presently chosen Ædilis with the most voyces. So after his father and vnkle (both samous and noble Captaines) had bene flaine one after the other in SPAINE, and that the ROMAINES were in confultation to appoint some worthy Captaine in the roome: they could find no man that durst vindertake this so dangerous war, considering the losse of two so great Captaines beforc. Wherfore the whole affembly being called to chuse a Viceconful, all the other Princes and Peeres of the Realme being filent at fo worthy a motion: Scipio only of all the rest, being but 24 yeares old, stood vp in the middest of them, and said, with a good hope and considence he wold willingly take the charge vpon him. He had no sooner offered this promise, but he was presently made Viceconfull of SPAINE, with the wonderfull good wil and fauor of the people, who gaue him all their voices. Howbeitthe Senators afterwards confidering better of the matter, against what Captains and nations he should make warre, they thought it vnpossible so yong aman could performe so weighty a charge. Wherfore mens minds were wonderfully changed againe on the sudden, as if the tribes of the people had repented them of their voices & election. Scipio perceiuing it, called an affembly presently, and made such an Oration of his age, and discipline of wars, that every man that heard him wondred at him, and the people began againetorenew the good hope they had of him for the warres. For he had not only a noble courage in him, being indued with so many fingular vertues, but he was also a goodly gentleman, and very comly of person, and had besides a pleasant countenance: all which things together, are great meanes to win him the loue and good will of euery man, Moreouer, euen in his gesture and behaulor, there was a certaine Princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall discipline being joy ned vnto those his rare gifts of mind and nature, it was to be doubted, whether civil vertues made him moreacceptable vnto strangers, then wonderfull for his skill in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common peoples hearts with a certaine superstitious seare, because he did daily (after he had taken the mans gowne) vie to go vp to the Capitoll, and fo into the Church without any company: infomuch that all men began to thinke that he learned fome fecret things in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymph Ageria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of scipie, as in old time they had of Alexander king of Macedon, to wit, that oftentimes there was a snakeseene in his mothers chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with tenthousand footemen, and a fleete of thirty galleys, every one of them having five oares to a scipios banke, he failed into Spaines & in few daies arriving at Emporia, he landed his men, and marchedby land to TARRACON. There he kept a councell, and many Ambassadors of the cities their confederates came thither, who being courteoufly received, returned to their lodgings with fuch answer as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to prosecute the warre he had taken voon him, he thought it best to joyne the remain of the old bands with his army, which had bin faued through the manhood and valiantnesse of Lucius Martius. For after both the Scipioes were flaine, and both Spaines almost lost, and the Romaine legions also overthrowne and put to flight, Lucius Martius a Romaine Knight, hauing gathered together the remnant of both ar- The vallmies, refisted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies pussed up with glorie of the victorie they hadgotten, and with great valiantnesse, and vnspeakeable industrie he maintained warre in Martius SPAINE, against three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS. Now Scipio being come to this a Romaine army that lay in garrison for the winter time, every mandid certainly perswade themselves that the warre should prosper; and when they saw him, they remembred their old Captaines, insomuch that there was neuer a fouldier could have his fill with looking vpon this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the fouldiers for their noble courage, not despairing for the calamity of their country, he greatly honored Lucius Martius: to shew, that who so trusteth in his owne vertues, need not enuy the glory of another man. So winter being past, he tooke the old and new bands out of the garrifons, and first of all determined to go & lay siege vnto new CAR-THAGE, For of all the cities of Spaine it was the wealthiest, and none more meete to make war both by fea & land, then that, Moreouer, the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS had bestowed inthis city all their munition, and greatest treasure: and left a strong garrison, both in the city, and cassell. But the Gaptaines themselves were devided in diverse countries, to the end that they there might keepe the whole region fro spoile, least of all looking then, that CARTHAGE should bebesieged. But Scipio having put all in readinesse, he came and besieged new CARTHAGE with Scipiole. all his army both by sea and land. This seemed to be a maruellous hard enterprise, and would seguinese continue long both because the city was your strong of the long hard for the care of the care o continue long, both because the city was very strong of it selfe, and also for that the men within spaine, itwere so couragious, that they did not only thinke themselves able to defend the city, but their hearts served them also to make sallies out vpon the enemy, and to skirmish with them, even to the very trenches of the Romaines campe. Howbeit it hapneth often, that what a man cannot obtaine by force, he may winne by industry. Now Scipio knew, that the lake or meare which isnot farre from the wals of CARTHAGE, did ebbeand flow with the tide, and that it was pafsable by foord on that side where they might easiliest come to the wals: so, he thinking to imbracethis occasion, & that he could not possibly meete with a better device to take CARTHAGE: when he saw his time, he set his men in battell ray, and having devided them into severall squadrons, gaue a more desperate assault vpon the city, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose out a band of the valiantest men he had, and commanded them to wade ouer the lake. and to scale the wals on that side, where they within the towne made least account of it. So, these fouldiers that were commanded to give this attempt, after they had passed over the lake without any let or trouble, they found that part of the wall without any watch or guard, because the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other side of the citic. Therefore they easily getting vp on the wall, came and affailed the enemies behind them. The citizens, and those of thegarrison, perceiuing they were vnwares fallen into that great danger, they immediatly forsookethe wals, and seeing themselucs charged on enery side, betooke them to their legges, and fled. The ROMAINES purfued them fo horly, that they wan the citie, and facked it: where supposes they found a wonderfull great spoile, and abundance of all things necessarie for warre. Scipio the site of greatly praised his fouldiers, and did reward them, for that they had done so valiant service. new car-Howbeit when he should come to give the scaling crowne of the wals, vnto the first man that affails. got vpvponthe wals, there were two fouldiers at fuch variance for the matter, that all the army was in danger of division and mutiny vponthat occasion. Thereupon Scipio called his men together, and in open affembly told them, that he knew they both got up on the wall together, and so gauethem both a scaling crowne: and by this meanes their tumult was presently pacified. Afterwards he fent vnto all the cities of SPAINE, the hostages that were found in yeary, which were a maruellous number: the which wanne him great fame for his courtefie and clemencie, whereby he allured many nations to yeeld themselves vnto the Romaines, and to forsake the

CARTHAGINIANS. But one thing aboue all the rest chiesly increased his praise, and wanne him great loue and goodwill, as a mirrour and example of all vertue. There was a yong Ladie taken prisoner, that in beautic excelled all the women in CARTHAGE: whom he carefully caused tobe kept and preserved from violence and dishonour. And afterwards when he knew that she was maried vitto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS, he sent for her husband, that was a very yong man, and delivered her vnto him, vntouched or dishonoured. Luceius not forgetting his noble courtesse vnto her, did let all his subiects vnderstand the great bountie, modestie, and tare excellencie of all kind of vertues that were in this Romaine General, and shortly after, he returned again to the Romaine's camp with a great number of horsinen. The three Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago Haldrubal BARCINIAN, and the other Haldrubal; the sonne of Gileo knowing that the losse of new CARTHAGE did them great hurt; as well in the impairing of their credit with other strange nations; as also by the coiecture divers made of the successe of this war. they first practised to dissemble the losse of it, and then in speech to make light of it, as muchas they could. Scipio having loyned to him divers nations and Princes of SPAINE, (among the which were the two litle kings, Mandonius and Indibilis,) vnderstanding where Hasarubal Bar. CINIAN lay, he marched towards him with his army to fight with him, before Mago and thenther Hasdrubal came to joyne with him. Hasdrubal BARCINIAN lay in campe by the river of Befula, & was very defirous to fight, trufting wholy to his strength and army: but when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of prety strength. The ROMAINE legions followed him, and gaue him no respite, but pursued so neare, that he came and assaulted his campe at the first coming. So they fought it out vpon the trenches and rampires, as if they had bene at the affault of a citie. The CARTHAGINIAN's trufting to the strength of the place, and driuen vnto it of necessitie (which maketh cowards most desperate,) they valiantly resisted their enemies the best they could. The Romains in contrary maner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out luftily like men, and the fight was fo much more cruell, for that it was in the fight of their Generall scipio, & of all the army besides: insomuch that their valiant service there could not be hidden. Therfore they neuer gaue ouer the affault, vntill that having done their vttermost indeuour, they got vp vpon the rampiers, and entred in divers places into the enemies campe, and made them flie. Hafdrubal Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, faued himselfeby flying, with a few with him, before the ROMAINES entred into their fort. After this battel. Scipio according to his maner, caused all the Spanish prisoners to be brought before him, and then gaue them libertie to depart without paying of ransome. Among the prisoners, there was a yong Gentleman of the kings bloud, & nephew vnto Masinissa, who when he had vsed very honourably, he sent vnto Masimisa, with great and rich gifts: to shew therby, that a Generall of an armie, should be as bountifull and full of civill vertues, as otherwise skilfull and expert in martial distipline. For the end of war is victorie: the benefite whereof confisteth in bounty and clemencie. From thence cometh the glorie and all other praises due to Captaines: as it happened in those things whereof we now treate. For a great number of Spaniards being present, wondering at the great elemencie of the General of the Romains, they could do no leffe but call him king, to honor and recompence his vertue. But Scipio strake that word dead straight, the which wasno comon found to the Romaines eares, & therfore he would by no means allow that title, which he knew to be hateful to the Noble men of his coutry, & also vnmeet for the liberty of the Ro-MAINES. He only prayed the Spaniards, that if they had any mind & defire not to shew themfelues vnthankfull to him, that then they would be faithfull and louing to the people of Rome. So whilest these things were done by Scipio, the other two Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Hasdrubal the sonne of Gisgo) after they understood of the ouerthrow of their men by the river of Besula, made all the speede they could to ioyne together: and shortly after came and met with Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, to confult together, and to take order for the warre. So after they had layed their heades together, and confidered all things, they concluded thus: that Hafdrubal BARCINIAN should go into Italie to his brother Hannibal, where theware was greatest and that Mago, and the other Hasdrubal should remaine in Spaine, should send for aide from CARTHAGE, & should not fight with the Romains until all their forces looked for, were affembled, and so might make a great and puissant army. When Hasdrubal was gone into ITALY, Hanno was sent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practifing in his journey to make the CARTHAGINIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and set vpon him by Scipices commandement, and was so fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him prisoner. Now there was a Hanno the city which the country men called ORINGE, the which wasvery wealthy, & meete to renew v chiefe of the war Lucius Scipio was fent thither with part of the army to befiege it; but finding it a very firong contrary for the dion water fination, and too well manned to take it at the first assault, he environed the towne, and within Hasarubal few daies took & facked it. Winter came on apace, & the time of the yeare made the both to rerire into their garrisons, for the winter. So Scipio having had so good fortune in this war, he went battel, and VIIIO TARRACON: Mago, and the other Hafdrubal, the fonne of Gifgo, went to the fea fide, The taken prinext sommer, wars growing more bloudy & cruell then before in the lower Spaine, the Ro-MAINES & CARTHAGINIANS met, and loyned battell by the river of Befula, & fought fet batrels. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the victory, and made the enemies flie (of the which there were flaine a great number in the field) and giving them no leifureto gather together againe, and to make head against him, he fought with them, & followed the chase so hotly, that Hasdrubal and Maga were driven to leave the maine land, & to flie to Ga-DES, after they had lost all their army. In the army of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a yong man of a noble courage, and very wife, called Mafaiffa, who finding meanes to have fecret conference with syllanus, he was the first man that offered him friendship, either being brought to ithrough Scipioes liberality, or else because he thought the time was come, that it was the surest friendship way to take part with the Romains, which were the conquerors. It is that Masinissathat afterwards (through the goodnesse of the Romaines) became the great and mighty king of Nvшылы and indeed he was diverse waies a profitable friend vnto the Romaines. Furthermore. the selfe same yeare (which was the fourteenth of the second war with the Africans) Spain B was the first nation and people of the voland men dwelling in the heart of the Realme, that was conquered vnder the happy conduct of the Viceconfull Scipio: howbeit it was the last Realme that was made a province long time after, by Augustus Cefar. Now Scipio not cotenting himselfe with the great victories he had obtained, in very short time in Spaine (for he had an imaginatio and good hope also to conquer Africk) he thought it his best way, to make all the meanes he couldpossible, to get Syphax king of the Mas # SYLTANS, a fried to the Romains. Wherfore af- syphax ter he had felt the kings mind, perceining that he was well inclined to make league with the Ro-MAINES, he presently set all his other affaires aside, & sailed into Africk with two galleys only, at fine oares to a banke. At the selfe same time also came Hasdrubal, the son of Gifgo thither, from GADES: so that both these valiant and lusty Captaines came of purpose to the king, enuyingonethe other, to craue the kings goodwill, vnto their countrey and commonwealth. Syphan welcomed them both into his court, and did vie them very honourably and courteoufly, and appointed that they should both eate at one table, and lie in one selfe chamber, because the one should not thinke his entertainment better then the other. It is reported that Hasdrubal wonderingatthe magnanimity & great wildome of Scipio that was present, he considered with himself. the great danger the city of CARTHAGE and all AFRICKE besides was in, through that mans meanes: for he faw him yet a yong man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, Haldrubals and that had continually obtained fuch victories: and therefore confidering the lufty youth indgenera of this gentleman, he imagined that it was impossible to perswade him to embrace peace, rather then warre. Besides, he was afraidalso that Sypban, moued by the personage and authoritie of himthat was present, would take part with the ROMATNES: and indeed his mind gaue him rightly, for so it happened. For though Syphan at the first shewed himselfe indifferent to them both, & had moued talke to end the war betwixt the Romains and the Carthaginians: yet afterwards when Scipio told him he could conclude no peace without consent of the Senate of Rome, he rejected Hafdrubal, and inclining to Scipioes request, he made league with the people of syphax Rome. So Scipio being returned againe into Spaine, himselfe partly by force, and partly also king of the by L. Martius meanes, conquered ILITVRGIVM, CASTVLO, and certaine other places that refiled to yeeld themselves vnto the Romaines. And to the end nothing should be lacking for league with allkind of sports and pleasures, after he had so fortunately obtained so many famous victories: the Ro. when he was come to new CARTHAGE, he caused the sencers to prepare the selues to fight with great pompe, where there were many great estates, not onely to see that pastime, but also they themselnes to handle the weapons in person. But amongst other Spaniards of noble smattefight houses, there were two called, Corbis and Orsica, which were at strife together for the kingdome: of two coubut that day they ended their quarrell, the one being slaine by the others hand. The fight was mainer.

very lamentable and grieuous to the beholders: but the death of him that was flaine, troubled them much more, for they were both confin-germains. After all this, scipio having his mind fill occupied in matters of greater weight & importance, then those which he had already brought to passe, he sell sicke. His sicknesse being caried through all Spaine, and as it happeneth often. his discase being reported to be much greater and dangerous then it was indeed: thereupon, nor onely the nations of Spaine began to rise in hope of change, but the army it self also of the Ro-MAINES, the which he had left at SvcRo. First of all, martiall discipline was corrupted through the absence of the Generall. Afterwards also, the report of his sicknesse, and danger of his life being spred abroad in the armie, raised such a rebellion among them, that some of them littlem garding the authoritie and commandement of the head Captaines of the bandes, they draue them away, and chose two meane souldiers for their Captaines; who presumptuously tooke vo pon them the name given vnto them by men of no authoritie, and yet with more arrogancie. made the bundles of roddes and axesto be caried before them. Such folly doth furicand vaine ambition oftentimes worke in mens minds. On the other fide, the Spaniards flept not, & fige. cially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aspiring to the kingdome of SPAINE, came to Scipio when he was conquerour, after he had taken new CARTHAGE. But afterwards, being offended to fee the power of the Romaines increase daily, they sought occasion to made some alteration, So after they had heard, not onely of Scipioes ficknesse, but also how he was at deaths doore, and did beleeue it: they presently leauied an army, and went and made warre with the Swessitans which were confederates of the Romains. But Scipio being recovered again of his ficknes, like as vpon the false rumour of his death enery man beganto rife: enen so after the truth was known indeed of his recouery, they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durst proceedany further in their rebellion. Scipio being more skilfull in martial discipline, then acquainted with fedition and rebellion, although he was maruelloufly offended with the fouldiers that had committed this folly; yet in the end, left following his anger, men should have thought him to have exceeded all bounds of reason in punishing of them, he referred all vnto the Consult. The most part of them gaue aduice, that the authours of the rebellion should be punished, and all therest pardoned: for by this meanes, faid they, the punishment shall light upon a few that have described it, and all the reft shall take example by them. scipio followed that aduice, and prefently lent for all the feditious bands, to come to new CARTHAGE to receive their pay. The fouldiers obeyed his commandement, some of them making their fault lessethen it was, as men do often slatter themselues:others also trusting to the Captaines elemencie, as knowing him not to be extreme in punishment. For Scipio was wont to say, that he had rather faue the life of one Romaine citizen, then to kill a thousand enemies. This rumour ran also, that Scipio had another army readie, the which he looked for to ioyne with them, and then to set vpon the kings (Mandonius and In-*dibilis) who made warre with the Swessitans. These fouldiers departing from Svero, with good hope to obtaine pardon, came vnto Carthage. How beit the next day after they were come into the towne, they were brought into the market place: where their armor and weapons being taken from them, they were enuironed with all the legions armie. Then the ROMAINE Generall fitting in place of judgement, shewed himself beforeall the company in as good health and good disposition of body, as euer he was in all his youth. Then he made a sharpe and bittet oration, full of grieuous complaints: infomuch as there was not one of all the fouldiers that were vnarmed, that durst cast vp their eyes, or looke their Generall in the face, they were so ashamed. For their consciences did accuse them for the fault they had committed, and the scare of death did take their wits and sences from them, & the presence of their gracious Capraine, made them blush as well that were innocent, as the parties that were offenders. Wherfore there was a generall and forowfull filence of all men. So after he had ended his oration, he caused the chiefe authors of this rebellion to be brought forth before the wholeassembly: who after they had bene whipped according to the maner, were prefently beheaded, the which was a feareful and lamentable light to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other soldiers to be thors of the fworne again, and then went and proclaimed war against Mandonius and Indibilis. For they confidering with themselves, how the ROMAINE souldiers that had rebelled in the camp, were put to death, they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leauied an armie of twenty thousand footmen and two thousand horsemen, and came downe with them against the ROMAINS. Scipto having intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increase their army, & that other nations could rebell the departed from CARTHAGE, & went with as great speed as he could to meet with y enemy. The kings were camped in a very flrog place, & trufted foro their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemy, nor all to refuse y battel if it were offered them. Howbeit it chanced by the nearenesse of both campes, that within few daies, they being prouoked by the Romains, came downe and fet their men in battell ray, & joyned battel with Scipio: fo that a good while together, the fight was very bloudy & cruell. But at length the SPANIAR DS feeing themselves compassed in behind, & being driven to fight in a ring to defend the enemy on enery fide, they were ouercome: so that the third part of them scarcely saucd the selues by flying. Mandonius and Indibilis seeing themselues vtterly vndone, and that there was no hope nor remedy left, they fent Ambailadors vnto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receive them to mercy and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the Romains, yet thinking it more honorable to ouercome the enemy by curtefie and clemency, then by force: he did pardon them, & only commanded them to give him mony to pay thing to 6.

his souldiers. In the meane time Masinissa came from GADES, & landed: because he would him-Else in person confirme the friendship he had offered Scipio in his absence, by the meanes of M. Sollarus, & also speake with him face to face, who he judged to be a worthy man, for the famous Masiniffa great rare gifts of nature that Scipto had aboue all others, there was in him alfo a certain princely Aprincely grace and maiesty. Furthermore, he was maruellous gentle & courteous vnto them that came to Scipies Scipies Masinissa being come to salute him, when he saw him, he had him in such admiration, as it is reported, that he could not cast his eyes off him, nor hauehis fill of looking on him. So he thanked him maruelloufly for fending his nephew vnto him, & promised him that his deeds should confirme & witnesse the friendship agreed upon betweene them: the which he euer after inuiolably kept vnto the Romaines, euen to the houre of his death. So all the nations of Spaine became subject to the Empire of Rome, or at the least their cofederates: wherupon those of GADES also following vexample of others, came & yeelded themselues vnto the Romains. This is a very ancient nation, & if we may credit the report The Antiofit, as Carthage was in Africk, & Thebes in Boeotia, fowas Gades vpoy fea, a Colong of the Type and Science from the had connered al Spanish of the feather the had connered all the feather the had connered al Spanish of the feather the had connered all the feather the feather the had connered at Rome, the Senategaue him audience out of the city, in the temple of Bellona. There, when he turneout of had particularly told them of the things he had valiantly and fortunately brought to end: and further, that he had ouercome foure Captaines in diuerse foughten fields, and also put to flight four earmies of the enemies, and driven the CARTHAGINIANS out of both SPAINES, and that there was no nation left in all those parts, but was subdued to the Romaines: the Senate gaue iudgemet, that al these things were worthy of a noble triuph. But because neuer man yet was suffered to enter into Rom E in triumph, for any victories he had obtained, whilest he was only but Viceconfull, and had not yet bene Confull . The Senators thought it not good, and Scipio him-gers also that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and said both openly and prinately: that they should send him into Africk E, to make warre with the Carthaginians, at home in their owne countrey. Scipio also being of the same opinion, said, that he would aske aduice of the people, if the Senate would be against such a worthy enterprise. For amongst the Peeres and Senators, there were some that vehemently inueyed against that opinion, and amongst the rest, Fabius Maximus specially, a man of great fame and authoritie. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and shewed many reasons that there was no way to ouercome counfels were in vaine, & unprofitable. After this matter was long debated in councel, Significant was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commission to go with his army into AFRICKE, if he thought it meete and profitable for the commonwealth. The decree of the Senate being published energy mans mind ran of fo great enterprises, that they persuaded themfelues Africk B was already their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio faw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this journey, because of the pouerty of the com. mon treasure, and for lacke of yong men, the flower and choise of the which was vtterly gone. by the former great losses and ouerthrowes Hannibal had given them. Howbeitto satisfie every mans expectation of him, he made all the possible speed he could, to prepare things necessary for the warres. So diverse people of Thyscan, and of the VMBRIANS, offered to help him to their best powers fome of them gaue him timber to build his ships others holpe him with armor, and others also furnished him with corne, and all other kind of victuals, and munition for his army. The ships being built, and all the army by sea put in a readinesse, in the space of five and form dayes, a thing incredible to many, Scipio departed out of ITALIE, and failed towards Sicile. But when he came to take muster of his army, he specially chose those that had served long time in the warres, under the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for very expert fouldiers. And for the Sicilians, he partly wanne them by courtefic, and partly by compulfion compelled them to give him aid for the war he tooke in hand, the which he meant to make in Africk E, when the time of the yeare should serve for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio chose out of diverse cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the faid prouince, and commanded them to meete at acertaine day appointed, every man with horse and armour. They then coming at the day appointed, according to his commandement, the Confull bad them chuse whether they would follow him in the warres of AFRICKE, or els deliuer vp their armor and horse to as many other Romaines as they werein number. So when they all prayed they might be difinified from the warre, Scipio appointed 300, other yong Romaines in their places, whom he had brought out of Italy with him vnarmed, becau sche would mount & arme them at the Sicilians cost, as indeed it chanced. Afterwards they did him great feruice in Africk, in many great battels. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his army in garrison for the winter time, when he came to Syracvsa, taking order not only for the preparation of war, but also for the affaires of Stelle, There when it was told him by complaint of divers, that there was a great company of ITALIAN fouldiers in that city, who wold not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the wars, but kept the still in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enjoyeed them by speciall comandement to make restitution to the Syracvsans: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplish the Senates commandement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hearts of Sicile, and was reported to be a just and vpright Confull. In the meane time he was aduertised by Caius Lalins, that returned out of Africk E with great spoile, how king Masinista was very desirous of his coming thither, and that he inftantly prayed him he would come into Africk a, as soone as he could possible, so it were without the prejudice of the commonwealth. Moreouer, that diverse nations and people of Africk a had the like defire who hating the government of the Carthagini-Ans, defired nothing more then fome good occasion to rebell. Now this journey was not deferred through Scipioes fault or negligence, confidering that fuch a Captaine could hardly be found that was more careful & diligent in his charge then he. How beit the affaires of Sicize, and the oportunity he had to recouer Lock Es again, did hinder him that he could not bring his purpole to passe according to his mind. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius disorder grieued him much, because that having left him at Lock Es, he fell to all forts of insolencie, as to defloure women, and to spoile the poore citizens: insomuch that they being maruellously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subject to the government of so vile and wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of Lock as being arrived at Roma, and exhibiting their complaints in open Senate, of the great wrongs and iniuries Pleminius didthem: the noble men tooke the matter fo grienoully, that they made bitter decrees, not only against the same Pleminius, but also against P.C. Scipio himselfe. Whereupon Scipioes enemies having gotten matter inough to accuse him, they were P.C.Scipio then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the iniuries offered the Locatans, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his souldiers also: and that he had inferred all these things more negligently, then became the office or duty of a Consul. They added thereto moreouer, that his army he had in Sicil was altogether vnruly & vnseruiceable. and regarded not the ordinances of the camp and that the captaine himself was carelesse, and al- 2. Fabi together given over to pleasure & idlenesse. But about al others Fabius Maximus was his heavy enemie, and so vehement against him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modestie werfary va andreason, and thought good to call him presently home out of Sicile and to dismisse him of issepto. his charge. This decree was thought of all men very straight, & extreme. Wherefore, following Ountus Metellus counfell, the Senators appointed ten Ambaffadors to go into Sicile, to make diligent inquiry, whether the accusations objected against Scipio were true; and if they found him in fault, that then they should command him in the name of the Senate presently to returne into ITALY. And on the other fide, if they found that he was vniustly accused, and onely through the procurement of his malicious enemies & detracters: the that they should send him to his army, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this war. So when the Ambassadors were arrised in Sicil & after they had made diligent inquiry according to the articles of their comissionthey could not finde that Scipio was faulty in any thing, fauing that he had too lightly paffed merthe wrongs and injuries Pleminius had done vnto the Loca IANs. For Scipio was very libe- Scipios nafallin rewarding of his men, and exceeding curreous, & merciful also in punishing of them. But ture. when they faw his army, his ships, and all his other furniture & munition for war: it is reported that they wondered so much to see the great abundance, and good order taken for althings, that whenthey returned to Rom E, they greatly commended Scipio, and rejecting all the acculations of his accusers, they did promise the Senat & people of Rom Bassured hope of victory. So when althefe home-troubles at Rome were take away, there chanced other outward troubles abroad that grieuced him much. For y Ambassadors of king Syphan came and told him, that their master King Si. hadmade new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, & was become friend vnto Hafdrubal, whose pharrened daughter he had maried; and therfore that he wished him if he meant to do his country good, to make no attempt vpon Africk E, for he was determined to reckon the Carthaginians his mainet, fiends, & alfo to fet vpon them who the CARTHAGINIAN'S account their enemies. Scipio quicklyreturned the ambaffadors againe vnto Syphax, because the effect of their comming should not beblownabroad in his camp; and gaue them letters, in which he praidking Syphax, that remembring his league & faithful promise, he shold beware he attempted nothing vinworthy the name ofaRomain, & faith of a king. Afterwards calling his men together, he told them that the Ambassadors of king Syphax were come into Sicil E, to coplain of his long tarying, as Masinissa had done before. Therfore he was to hasten his journy to go into A FRICK, and therupon commandedallhis fouldiers to put themfelues in readinesse, and to prouide all things necessary for their journy. The Confuls comandement being published through al Sicil B, there repaired immediatly vnto LILYBEA a multitude of people, not only of those that were to faile into Africk, but of others also that came to see the fleete & army of the Romain Es: because they never saw marmy better furnished, nor fet out with all things necessary for warre, nor better replenished with fouldiers, then that. So Scipio, althings being ready imbarked at LILYBEA with fo earnest a desire to passe ouer the sea, that neither oares nor wind did cotent his mind. Yet he was brought infewdaies failing, to the promontory or mountaine called Faire, & there he put all his men on land. The newes of his arrival flying straight to CARTHAGE, althouity was presently in such an vprore, that sodainly they sounded the alarme, and guarded the gates & walles, as appeareth by tellimony of some in writing. For from M. Regulus time vnto that present day, it was almost fifty yeers space since any Romain captain ener entred Africk with force of armes. And therfore it was no maruell though they were afraid, and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did increase their feare the more, because the CARTHAGINIANS had no captaine marchable with him. Has drubal the sonne of Gifeo had the name at that time of a lusty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithstanding bene ouercome, and driven out of Spaine by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope and fafety of their country in him, and in king Syphax that mighty king: they never left in-

lous great flaughter of the Carnoble and wealthy a city, and being besides so commodious for the wars both by sea and land At the selfesame time Masinissa came to the Romains camp, and was inflamed with a vehement defire to make war against king Syphax, by whom he had before bin driven out of his kingdom & inheritance, Scipio that had known him in Spains, a yong Prince of an excellent wit, & quick & valiant of his hand, he fent him to discouer the army of the enemies, before the CARTHAGI MIANS could gather any greater power, and willed him to vie al the device and meanes he could possible to intice Hanno to fight. Masinisas he was commanded, beganto prouoke the enemie and drawing him out by litle & litle, he brought him where Scipio lay with al his legions armed looking for a good houre to fight. The army of the enemies was now wearied, when the Ro. MAINES came to fet vpon them with their fresharmy. Hanno at the first onset was ouercome & flaine, with most of his men: and all the rest fled and dispersed themselues here and there, where they thought they might best scape. After this victory, scipio returning back againe to besiege the city of Vrica, the fodaine coming of Hafdrubal and king Syphax, made him to leane office enterprise, for that they brought with them a great army both of footmen and horsemen, and came and camped not far from the ROMAINES. Scipio perceiuing that, raised his siege immedia atly, and came and fortified his camp vpon a hill, from whence he might go and fight with the enemy, and molest them of Vrica, and also keepe his ships safe that rode at anker. Howbeitthe time of the yeare being come, that both armies were to dispose their me in garrisos for the winter season, he determined to send vnto king Syphax to feele his mind, and to make him leauethe friendship of the Carthaginians if it were possible. For he knew welit was his mariage with Sophoniba, which through her flattering perswasios had broght him to that fury, that he had not only for faken the friendship of the Romaines, but also meant to destroy them, contrary to his faith and promise; and that if he had once satisfied the heate of his love with her, he thought then he might becalled home againc. Syphax having understood Scipices message sent him, heanswered, that indeed it was time, not only to leave the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but allow give vp all thought of war; and so promised, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Sci. piogauegood care vnto it, and caught hold of an excellent fine device. He chose the valiantest fouldiers in his army, apparelled them like flaues, and made them waitevponthe Ambassadors, and gaue them instructions what they should do. These fellowes, whilest the Ambassadors and King Syphax were in talke together about the articles and conditions of peace, and that the confultation held longer then it was wont to do, they went and walked vp and downer through the enemies campe, to fee all the waies and entries into it, according vnto Scipioes instructions. After they had done this divers times, they came againe to Scipio. Truce was take for a time, the which being expired, Scipio seemed to make preparation for wars, (as being out of hope of any peace) and to make his army ready by fea, preparing engines of battery to returne to befiege VTIGA, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumorthrough althe country to perswade his enemies that it was true: howbeit having called the Captaines & pettie Captaines of his army together, he made them privile to his intent and enterprise. He told them that both the enemies camps lay not farre a funder, of the which, the one of them had all their tents and cabines of wood; and the building of the other camp was all of reeds, for that they were both eafle to be burnt. Wherupon having sent for Masinisa and Cains Lalius to come vnto him, he gave them charge about midnight to give alarme vnto Syphax camp, and to fet it on fire: & that he himselfe on the other side, would fet vpon the CARTHAGINIAN'S camp. They two obeyed Scipioes commandement, performed his will without delay, & came at the houre appointed them to affaile the NYMIDIANS camp, and so did set the houses of reeds on fire; which took fire in such fort, as the slame was immediatly roud about the camp. The NVMIDIANS at the first thinking the fire had come by milfortune, ranne thither straight vnarmedto quench it. But when they found themselues among the legions of the Romaines, and that there was nothing but killing downeright, seeing themselues so compassed in on al sides, they saw their best remedie was to slie. On the other sidealso, where Scipioes army was, the CARTHAGINIANS camp was almost alburnt, and the enemies put to flight with such cruell slaughter, that some writers affirme, there were slaine that night about forty thousand men, aswell Carthaginians as Nymidians. This great ouerthrow and flaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in such a feare and terror, that fomethought best to send for Hannibal out of ITALY, & others gaue aduice to make peace with Scipio. Howbeir the Bancinian faction which was rich and wealthy, and altogether against the

neacemakers, they so prevailed, that they leavied a new power to begin war againe. King Syphas and Haldrubal having leavied a great multitude of footmen and horsemen againe, renged their armie sooner then was looked for, & came againe to pitch their campe directly ouer against the enemies. Scipie hauing understanding of that, would not taric, but determined to give the battel, whilest his men were in good heart & willing to fight. So it chanced at the first, by the nearenes of both their camps, that there were certaine skirmishes: but in the end, the armies came to joyne battel & the Romains fought with fuch courage & terror; that at the first onset they made the Nymidians & Carthagintans flie, and flue the most part of them. Haldrubal & Syphax scaped, by flying out of the flaughter. Scipio fent Masinisa and Cains Lalius with the light horsemen to give the chase. Syphax being come into Nymidia, and from thence into his own realme and kingdome, he leavied an army in hast of all forts of people, and came to meete with Masinista & Caim Lelius, & was not afraid to give them battell But it was a fond part of him, confidering that hewas nothing like fostrong as his enemy neither for number of fighting men, nor yet in likelihood of fouldiers. For neither the fouldiers nor captaines of his army were matchable with the fouldiers and captaines of the Romaines camp: and therfore king Syphan was eafily ouercome by such skilful fouldiers, & moreouer was himselferaken in battel, with many other great noble Makelimen, whom Masinissa would hardly have looked for: and then they were brought vnto Scipio. At antonorthe first there was a maruellous ioy among them, when it was told them that king Syphax should taken in bebrought prisoner vnto the camp: but afterwards when they saw him bound, they were alsory basted. to fee him in fuch pitifull state, remembring his former greatnes & regall maiefly. For they called to mind how famous the name of this King had bin but a litle before, what wonderfull great wealth he had, & also the power of sogreat a realine & kingdome. Howbeit Scipio the Romain Confull received him very curreoufly, and gently asked him whathe meant to change his mind in that fort, & what moued him to make war with the ROMAINES. The the king remebring his former friendship & faithful promise broken, he boldly told him, that it was the love he bare to his wife Sophonisba, who only had procured him to deale fo dishonorably with the Romaines; howbeit, that he had so smarted for it, as al others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promise. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreme misery to see that his mortal enemy Masinisa was so taken with that frenzie and mad humor, wher with he before was possessed. For after Syphax was ouercome & taken, Masinisa went into CYRTHA, the wan the chiefe city of the realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonishathere, with whom he felin fan- city of cyrtiewho after she had finely wrapped him in with her deceitful flatteries & kindnes, he promised heralfo to deliuer her out of the Romains hands and because he might the better performe his lour with promise made, he took her to his wife & maried her. When Scipio was informed of these things, itgrieued him maruellously. For it was knowne to all men, that Syphax was ouercome vnder the conduct, & through the Romains meanes: and therfore althat was belonging to Syphan, was at the disposition of the Romains. Wherfore if Masinisa had without Scipioes consent, vndertaken to defend sophonisbaes quarell, then it appeared plainly, he despised the authority of the Consul, and the maiefly of the people of Rome. Furthermore, his filthy lust did aggrauate his fault the more, the which seemed so much more intolerable, by how much the cotinecy of the ROMAIN Consul was the greater, the which Masinisa saw daily before his eyes, and might have bene apaterneand example vnto him. For Scipio besides many other proofes & shewes of his vertues, in of scipio. alplaces where he obtained victory, he alwaies kept the women undefiled, which were take prifoners. So Scipio being offended with Masinista, (though he shewed it not before company) reteiuedhim very louingly at his returne to the camp; yet afterwards notwithstanding, taking him aside, he so sharply reproued him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a seuere captaine. Whereupon Masinissa went into his tent and wept, and could not tel what way he should take howbeit shortly after, perceiuing that it was vnpossible for him to keep promilewith Sophonisba, which grieued him to the heart : he fent her poy son, and a message withall; possend her the which she dranke immediatly, and so willingly made her selfer away: Furthermore, the CAR

P.Scipio about peace: either because he was afraid of the good fortune of this yong man, or elle for that he mistrusted he could not otherwise helpe his countrey and commonwealth, which he faw decaying & like to be destroyed. Wherfore a place was appointed, where they might meet according to his defire: where when they were both met, they had long talketogether about the ending of this war. In the end Scipio offered Hannibal fuch conditions of peace, that by them it appeared the ROMAINES were not weary of war, and that Scipio himselfe being a yong man, had better hope to obtaine victory, then great defire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being fet afide, they brake off their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthy Captaines of the most noble nations that could be, prepared themselves to battel, either to give or takeawav in short time from their common-weales, the seigniorie and Empire of all the world. The place where they employed altheir force, and where this famous battel was fought, as it is reported was by the city ZAMA: in the which the ROMAINES being conquerours, did first make the Eles phants flie, then the horsemen, and in the endbrake so fiercely into the footmen, that they ouer. threw al the armie. It is reported that there were flaine & taken by the Romaine's about font thousand Carthaginians. Hannibal fled out of the fury of the battel, & saued himself, though that day he had shewed himselse like a valiant & famous Captaine. For at this battell he had see his army in better order then euer he had done before, and had strengthened it both with the commodity of the place, and reliefe beside: and euen in the very fury and terror of the battelhe fo bestirred himself among his souldiers, that the enemies themselves did commend and praise him for anoble Captaine. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Vermina king Syphax fon, that brought aide to the CARTHAGINIANS, he put Ifim to flight, and came and brought his army to the walles and hauen of CARTHAGE, thinking (as indeed it fell out) that the CARTHAGINIANS would fue to him for peace. For as the CARTHAGINIAN's before had bene very good foldiers. and ready to make wars: so were they now become timorous and faint hearted, specially when they faw their General Hannibal ouercome, in whom they chiefly reposed at their hope & trust, for defence of their country. Wherefore they being (as I have faid) out of heart, fent ambassadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accustomed elemencie, he would grant them peace. Now was great suite made at Rome, to have the gouernmet of the province of Africk and one of the new Confuls made hafte to come and make war, with such charge and preparation as was meet for his dignity and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that another should carie away the glory for ending of so great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the CARTHAGINIAN ambassadors requests. So the capitulation of the articles of peace was offered vnto the CARTHAGINIAN'S, according to the conquerors mind: and besides all other things, the whole fleet of all their ships and gallies (in the which their hope consisted much) were taken fro them. For when the whole fleet was burnt, it was such a lamentable fight vnto them al, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole city, as if CARTHAGE had bindestroyed and razed to the very ground. For as some do write, there were fine hundredships burnt of all forts. These things therfore should make vs al beware of humane frailty, the which we often forget in our prosperity. For they that before perswaded themselves to conquerthe world, after they had wonne so many great battels & victories of the enemy, and in maner conquered all ITALY, and so valiantly besides besieged the city of Rome, were in shorttime after brought to such misery and extremity, that all their power and force being onercome, they had no more left them but the walles of CARTHAGE, and yet they were not fure to keepe them, but through the speciall grace and fauour of the enemy. After these things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not onely restore King Masinisa to his Realme againe, but also adding thereunto the best part of all king Syphax countrey, they made him one of the mightiest kings of all Africk: and afterwards he gaue honourable gifts vnto euery man as he haddescrued. In fine, after he had set all the affaires of Africk a at good stay, he brought his army back agains into ITAL Y:at what time there came to Rom a world of people, to fee fo great & famous a captaine, returning from such wonderfull great victories. So he entred into Kom with pompeof triumph, Terentius Culeo following him with a hat on his head, because that through his fauor and friendship he was taken out of bondage. Polybius writeth, that king Syphax was led intriumph: howbeit some say he died before Scipio triumphed. Indeed divers that did triumph, some before him during the warres of the CARTHAGINIANS, and others afterwards in the warres of MACEDONIA & ASIA, they made greater shew of plate, both of gold & silver in their triumph, and led also a great number of prisoners: howbeit one only Hannibal that was our come, and the glory of fogreat a warreended, did make the triumph of P. Scipio fo excellent and famous, that it far passed all the gold and magnificent pompe of all others triumphs. For after Africk E was conquered, no nation then was ashamed to be ouercome by the Romaines. For he made this province as it were a bridge and open passage to increase and enlarge the Empire of Rome, hoth in Macedon, and also in Asia, & in other parts of the world besides. Now Scipio (whom Imay rightly call African, after y conquest of Africk) being returned to Rome, he lacked notemporall dignities nor honours. For in the Counsell holden for the election of Censors, although there were divers others of the noblest houses of Roma that sued for that office, yet he himlelf, and Alius Pettu were preferred before all the rest, and after they were created Censors, Aliun Fe they did gouerne in their office like good men, and with good quietnesse. Afterwards the Cenforsthat followed them, did still one after another chuse Scipio African Prince of the Senate: Scipio the which dignity was wont to be given to them onely, that obtained the type of all honour, Prince of through their great conquests and benefits done to their country. Shortly after, he was againe the Senate. chosen Consul with Sempronius Longus, the sonne of that Sempronius whom Hannibal overcame Scipis and in that great ouerthrow, at the battell by the river of Trebia. They two were the first (as it is reported) that deuided the Noblemen and Senators from the people, in the shew-place to see pafime. This separation was very odious to the people of Rome, and they were mariellously offended with the Consuls for it, because they tooke it, that increasing the honour of the state of the Senators, they thereby did discountenance and imbase them. Some say also, that Scipio A-FRICAN afterwards repented himselfe that he had taken away the old custome, & brought in a new. At that time there fell out great variance betwixt Masinisa and the Carthaginians, touching their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate fent Scipio thither with two other commissioners: who after they had heard the cause of their quarrell, they left the matter as they foundit, and would proceed no further in it. And this they did, because that the CARTHAGI- The craftie NIANS being troubled with civill warres at home, should take vpon them no other warres a- counsel of broad, neither should have ley fure to attempt any alteration otherwise. For the Romaines had greatwar with king Antiochus, and Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN was there with him, who still firred vp the old enemies against the Romains, and practised to raise vp new enemies against them, and in all things to counsell the Carthaginians to cast away the yoke of bondage, which the Romains nad brought the into under the title of peace, & to proue the friendship of thekings. Howbeit shortly after, the ROMAINES having obtained victory, & driven king Antiochus out of GRECE, they intended allo to conquer As IA: and therfore all their hope was in Scipio African, as a manthat was borne to end wars of great importance. Howbeit Lucius Scipio and Caius Lalius were Consuls, and either orthern made suite for the gouernment of As 14. The matter being confulted vpon, the Senate flood doubtfull what judgement they should give, betwixttwo fo famous men. Howbeit, because Lelius was in better fauour with the Senate, and in greater estimation: the Senate began to take his part. But when P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the ederbrother of Lucius Scipio, praied the Senate that they would not dishonour his house so, and told them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was besides very wise, and that he him. selfealso would be his Lieutenant: he had no sooner spoken the words, but the Senators receiuedhim with great ioy, and presently did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordained in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio should go into GRECE to make warre with the Arolians, and that from thence he should go into As IA, if he thought good, to make war with King Antiochus: and also that he should take his brother Scipio African with him, because he should goe against Hannibal, that was in Antiochus army. Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection The natural of Publius Cornelius Scipio African, the which he first shewed from his youth vnto his father lone of Sci-Cornelius, and afterwards also vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, considering the great things he had to his brodone? For, notwithstanding he was that AFRICAN by name that had ouercome Hannibal, that ther Lucius had triumphed ouer the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praise of martiall discipline: yet of his own good nature he made himfelfe inferior to his yonger brother, because he might haue the honour of obtaining the gouernement of that province from his fellow Conful Lelius, that was fo well beloued, and of great estimation. Lucius Scipio the Consul brought great honourto his country by that war, for that he followed the found and faithfull counfell of his brother. For first of all going into GRECE, he took truce for fixe moneths with § ÆTOLIANS, through the aduice of his brother AFRICAN: who counfelled him, that fetting all things apath he should straight go into Asia, wherethe warre was rifest. Afterwards also he wanne Prusa king of Bythinia from Antiochus friendship, who before was waucring vp and downe, doubt full which fideto take, and all through his brother African's meanes and practife. So the au. thority of the African wasvery great, and all those that would obtain any thing of the Con. ful came first to the AFRICAN to be their meane & interceffor. Now when he came into Asia. Antiochus ambassador, and Heraclides Bizantian; came unto him to offerto make peace, and after they had openly told their message perceiving that they could not obtaine reasonable conditions of peace, they privatly talked with Scipio African, as they were commanded, and Dra. Clifed the best they could to make him king Antiochus friend. For they told him, that Antiochus would fend his yonger sonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the gouernement of all his Realme, onely referring the name and title of King. Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no leffe in faithfulneffe and bountie, then in many other vertues, after he had answered them to all other matters, he told them, that for his sonlie would take him for a maruellous friendly gift: & that for a private good turne, he would dothe beft he could to require him with the like: Howbeit, that he would counfell the King about things to leave off thought of warre, and to receive those offers and conditions of peace which the Senate and people of Rome would offer him. Shortly after, Antiochue fent P. Scipio his son according to his promise: who (as it is reported) had bin taken prisoner from the first beginning of the war, as he went from CHALCIDE VINTO ORICYM: or as other writers fay, as he paffedby in a pinnace. Yet some hold opinion, that he was taken as he went to discouer the counsell'of the enemies, and that he was then fent againe vnto his father, lying ficke at the city of Elea. This great curtefic of king Antiochus was maruellous well thought of by the African, & not with our cause: for to see his son after he had bene away so long, it did greatly lighten his spirits, and diseased body. But P. Scipio to shew some token of a thankfull mind, prayed the Ambassadours that came vnto him, greatly to thanke King Antiochus for the exceeding pleasurehe haddone him, to fend him his sonne. Afterwards he gaue Antiochus aduice also, that he should not gine battell, till he understood of his returne from EL BA to the camp. So Antiochus being perswaded by the authority of so worthy a man, he kept close in his camp for a certaine time, and determined to draw the warre out at length, hoping in the end that he might come to speake with the Confull, by the African's meanes. But afterwards, the Conful camping hard by Magnesta, did so vexe and prouoke the enemie, that the King came out to battell, and set his men inbattell ray. It is reported that Hannibal himselse was present at the battell, being one of the Generals for the King. So Antiochus being ouercome, and his army discomfited, perceiuing that there was no helpe in his affaires, he came vnto the African, (who being newly recovered of his ficknesse, came to the campe a little after the field was wonne) and by his meanes obtained of the Confull to be contented to talke of peace. When Antiochus ambassadours were come to the campe, and had humbly craued pardon in the behalfe of their King, and also prayed that they would give them fuch conditions of peace, as they best liked of: Scipio A FRICAN with the confent of them all answered them, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to yeeld to aductfity, neither also to be proud in prosperity: and therefore that he now made him the selfe same offer and conditions of peace, which he did before the victory. That the king should not meddle with EVROPE: that he should surrender vp all he had in Asia, from the mountaine Taurus, vnto the river of Tanais: that he should pay tribute twenty yeares together: that he should also put in such hostages as the Consull would chuse out: and that specially about all the rest, they should deliuer Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN Vnto the Consull, who was the only author and procurer of this warre. But he, as we have written in his life, perceiuing that king Antiochus army was ouerthrowne both by sea and by land, escaped the Romaine's hands, and went vnto Prifias King of BYTHINIA. Antiochus hauing accepted the offers and conditions of peace, faid, that the ROMAINES vsed him very fauourably, to rid him of so great care, and to appoint himso small a kingdome. For great kingdomes, and ouer-much wealth which every man covereth, are full of great and fundrie troubles: infomuch that Theoriens words are as true, as otherwiseescellently written.

So when the mighty King of Asia was our come, and that so great a war was so easily ended beyond all mens opinion; the Confull L. Scipio returned to Rom B, and made his entrie into the city, shewing a great and honourable triumph. He also deserved the surname of the province and countrey subduced by him. Sothat, as his eldest brother was called African, for that he had conquered Africk: euen fo was Lucius Scipio furnamed As IAN, for conquering Asia vnto Rome. And P. Scipio, through whose counsell his brother Lucius had brought his watres to happieend, he went not cleare without honour also. For shortly after, two noble Censors, 7. 9. Flaminius, and Marcus Claudius Marcellus chosehim Prince of the Senate the third time. of Mis. Now at that time, the house and family of the Scipioes and Cornelians flourished with supreme nin, de.c. degree of honour: and the authority of Scipio African was growner o fuch height and great. degree of nonour; and the authority of scipto African was growners fuch height and great-nefle, as no private man could wish to be any greater in a free city. Howbeit the secret malice of the time of wicked hearts, which could no longer abide this greatnesse and authority, began at length to the souriburst out, and to light vpon those that were the authors of so great things. For two Tribunes of some formers the people, suborned (asit is reported) by Porcius Cato, accused P. Scipio African for keeping The inconbacke king Introchus mony, and because he brought it not into the common chamber or trea. Saucie of furie. Scipio African knowing his innocencie, being called by the Magistrate, shewed himselfe worldly obedient, and came into the market place with a bold countenance, and there made an oration, declaring what things he had done for the benefit and commodity of his country and commonwealth. The rehearfal of the fethings did not mislike the common people that were present: because he did it rather to avoid the danger prepared for him, then otherwise for any vaineglory or oftentation. Howbeit the Tribunes not being so contented, were vehement against him, and spared no iniurious words, but accused him as though he had indeed bene in fault, howbeit vpon suspicion, rather then of any due proofe. The next morning being commanded to come before them againe, he appeared at the houre appointed, and being well accompanied with his friends, he came through the whole affembly, & went up to the pulpit for oratios When he faw that enery ma kept filence, then he spake in this maner: I remember, my lords, that on such a day asthis, I wan that famous victory of Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, and therefore leaving asidethis contention, I think it good we go vnto the Capitol, to give God thanks for the victory. So he departed thence, and all the whole affembly followed him, not onely to the Capitoll, but also to all the other temples of the city, leaving the two Tribunes al alone with their Sergeants. That day was the very last day of the African's good fortune, for the great affembly and multinde of people that waited upon him, and for the great good will they bare him. For from that fortunate day forward he determined to get him into the country form that for the day of the day forward he determined to get him into the country, farre from all ambition, and the company of people : and fo went vnto Linternymin a maruellous rage, that for reward of his fo great seruice, and so sundry benefits, as he had brought vnto his country, he received but shame. The volunand reproch: or elfe for that indeed being (as he was) of a noble mind, he thought it more honor willingly to give place to his enemies, then to feel to maintaine his greatnes by force of armes. willingly to giue place to his enemies, then to feek to maintaine his greatnes by force of armes. Sowhen the Tribunes did accuse him of contempt, and that his brother Lucius did excuse his Rome. ablenceby reason of his sicknesse: Tiberius Gracebus, one of the Tribunes that was against the T. Gracebus AFRICAN, tooke his excuse (beyond all mens opinions) for good payment, and did so well defend Scipioes cause, sometime honourably praising him, another time also threatning his enemies, that the Senate afterwards thanked him very greatly for it. For they were maruelloufly offended for the great iniurie they did him. Some do write that P. Scipio himself, before he went vato Linternym, did with his own handsteare the booke his brother had brought vato the Scnate, to deliuer the account of his charge: and that he did it not for any deceit or pride, but with that felfe boldnesse of mind he aforetime vsed to the treasurers, when he did against the law require the keyes of the common treasure, to supply the present need of the State. Now Divers opi. fome there be also that say, it was not the African, but Scipio Asian that was accused before nions about the Tribunes: and that Scipio African was fent incommission at that time into Thyscan. the accusation of the scan was fent incommission at that time into Thyscan. Who, vnderstanding of his brothers accusation, at his returne to Rome, and finding his brother African, Lucius condemned, and the Sergeants waiting on him to carrie him, being bound, into prison, he was in such a rage withall, that he rescued his brother by force out of the Sergeants hands, and from the Tribunes of the people. And they report beside, that Tiberius Gracchus one of the Tribunes, complaining first that the authority of the Tribuneship was trode vnder fecte by a private person, he afterwards letting fall all the malice and envie he bare vnto the seiproes, defended their cause, because the Tribunes should rather seeme to be ouercome by a Tribune, then by a prinate person. They said moreouer, that the selfe same day the Senate suppedin the Capitol, he perswaded the African to let Tiberius Gracebus marrie his yonger daughter. This promife was no fooner made, but P. Scipio coming home to his house, told his wife that he had be flowed their daughter: wherupon she being angry, told him againe, that he should not have maried her without confent of her mother, though he could have bestowed her vpon Tiberius Gracchus. This answerliked Scipiomaruellous well, when he saw that his wife was of his mind, touching the mariage of their daughter. I know it is thought of some, that it was attributed to Tiberius the sonne, and to Appins Claudius his father in law. For Polybius, and other ancient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caius and Tiberius Gracchi, was maried vnto Gracchin after the Africans death. For Scipio African was maried vnto Amylia the daughter of L. Paulus Emylius Conful, that was flaine at the battel of CANNES. By her he had two daughters, of the which the eldest was maried vnto P. Cornelius Nasica, and the yonger vnto Tiberius Gracchus, either before or after the death of his father. Now touching his sonne, there is litle mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certaintie to be true. We have spoken of his yonger sonne that was taken by king Antiochus, and afterwards frankly sent vnto his fatherof whom notwithstanding afterwards I find no mention in writing, saving that some say he was afterwards Prætor, and that he came to this office by meanes of Cicercius his fathers Secretaric.

There appeareth in writing also, that the yonger African was adopted by the son of P. Scipia. Cicero in his booke intituled Cato Maior faith, how weake (faid he) was the fonne of P. African that adopted thee his fon? And in his fixt book also derepub. Amylius the father exhorteth sal pio his son, to follow instice and pietie, as his grandfather Scipio African had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio African, writers do diverfly varie: for some say, that he died and was buried at Rome. And for proofe thereof, they do bring forth the monument that was fet vp for him by the gate Capena, ouer the which stood three statues or images, two whereof were the images of Publius and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of 2 Emnius the Poet. And furely that steeme of which Cicero wrote, scemeth to confirme it true: our Ennius, faid he, was maruellously belowed of African the great, and therefore it is thought that he was buried in Scipioes tombe. Other authors write alfo(& furely they agree best with the common report) that Scipio Africandied at LINTERNYM, & that there he was buried at his own appointment; because his country form. Poet, by the thankfully acknowledging his feruice, should do him no honour at his death; and that therethey fet him vp a tombe, and his statue vpon that, the which afterwards was blownedowne by a tempest of wind, and the which Linie himselfe wirnesseth he saw. Furthermore, by CALETAthis Linternum.

Whom neither Europe could with stand, nor Africke in times past, (Behold mans frailtie) here he lies in little roome at last.

Now touching the time of his death, having made great fearch for it, I have found in certains Greeke authors, that the African lived foure and fiftie yeares, and died shortly after. Further more he was a noble Captaine, and worthy of al commendation for martiall discipline, and befides excelled in other vertues: the which did fo delight his mind, that he was wont to fay, he was neuer lesse idle, then when he tooke his ease: neither lesse solitarie, then when he was alone. For fometimes he would withdraw himselfe out of the assembly, and from all mens companie, and thought himselfe safe when he was alone. The same of his noble deeds was so great, that wherefoeuer he went, all forts of people would come and fee him. The common report went, that when he was at LINTERNYM, there came certaine rouers vnto him, to see so famous a man, and to kiffe that so faithfull and victorious a hand. For vertue hath great force and power with all forts, of people: because it doth not onely make the good, but the cuill allo to loue and honour it.

POW let vs compare Hannibal and Scipioes deedes together, as touching their civil discipline. First, if we remember their deedes in warres, it is manifest, that both of them have bene great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they have not onely bene comparable with the noblest Kings and Princes in their time (being also in that age when warres flourished most) but with those also that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much at them, that they hauing great and heavie enemies in their countrey, (who fought to ouerthrow all their doings and enterprises) could possibly goe through with so great matters, and to obtaine such happie and famous victories, in strange and forreinewarres. Therefore passing ouer all other matters, what ado had Publius Scipio before he could obtaine to be sent into Africke, to make warre with the Carthaginians? Fabius Maximus, and other Noblemen of the city being greatly against it. Againe, what enemie had Hannibal of Hanno, who was prince and head of the contrary faction against him? Now they both having overcome such great troubles at home, did notwithstanding bring things to endworthy perpetuall memorie: not by chance, as it happeneth vnto many; but through their industrie, great wisdome, and counsell. So divers do wonder greatly at Hannibals courage and noblemind: who after he had facked the citie of SAGVNTVS, came boldly from the farthest part of the world into ITALY, and brought with him a great army of footemen and horsemen. and came to make warre with a great State and common-wealth, the which his predeceffors alwaies dreaded; and after he had wonne many battels, and slaine sundrie Consuls and Captaines of the Romaines, he came and camped hard by the city of Rome it selfe, and procured strange Kings and farre nations to make warre with the ROMAINES. He that was able to do logreat things as these, men cannot otherwise thinke of him, but that he was a great and valian Captaine. Othersalso speaking of Scipio, do greatly praise and commend him for the foure Chieftaines he ouercame, and for the foure great armies which hee defeated and put to fightin Spaine, and also for that he ouercame and tookethat great King Syphax prisoner. In fine, they come to praise that famous battell, in the which Scipio ouercame Hannibal at ZAMA. Forif Fabius (faid they) were praised, because he was not overcome by Hannibal, what estimation will they make of the African, who in a pitched battell ouercame that so famous and dreadfull Captaine Hannibal, and also did end so dangerous a warre? Besides also that Scipio did alwaies make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemie in plaine field: where Hannibal in contrary manner did alwaies viecraft and subtilitie, and was full of stratagemes and policie. And therefore all Authors, both Greeke and Latine, do count him very fine and subtill.

offered him: and for that he was maruellous angry with the people of Rome, because they would have made him perpetuall Confull and Dictator; and confidering also that he commaunded they should set up no statue of him, neither in the place of the assembly, nor in the judgement seate, nor in the Capitoll: all which honours afterwards were given by the citizens vnto Cafar, that had ouercome Pompey. These were the civill vertues of the African, which were great and true praises of continencie. Now therefore, to deliuer you the summe and effect of these things, these two so famous Captaines are not so much to be compared together in their civill vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the discipline of warres, and in the glory of their famous victories. To conclude, their deaths were somewhat alike: for they both died out of their countries, although Scipio was not condemned by his country as Hanni- .

Furthermore, they greatly commend Hannibal for that he maintained this armie of fo fin drie nations, so long time in peace, as he had warre with the ROMAINES: and yet that there was neuer any mutinie or rebellion in his campe. On the other fide, they blame him againe because he did not follow his victorie, when he had ouercome the ROMAINES at that famore battell of CANNES: and also because he spoyled his souldiers with too much ease, and the pleasures of CAMPANIA and APVLIA, whereby they were so changed, that they seemed to be other souldiers then those that had ouercome the Romaines, at the fundry battels of TREBIA, THRASIMENE, and CANNES. All writers do reproue these things in Hannibal, but specially his cruelty. For amongst other things, what crueltie was it of him to make awa man with her children to come from ARPI to his campe, and afterwards to burne them aliue? What shall a man say of them whom he cruelly put to death in the temple of lune 14. cinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio African on the other fide, if we shallow ther credit the best authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malicious with ters, we may fay, he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely lively and valiant in fight, but also curteous and mercifull after victory. For oftentimes his enemies prouedlik valiantnesse, the vanquished his mercy and elemencie, and all other men his faithfulnesse. Now therefore, let vstell you what his continencie and liberality was, which he shewed in Spaint vnto a young Ladictaken prisoner, and vnto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: dothir not describe great praise. Now for their private doings, they were both vertuously brought va and both of them embraced learned men. For as it is reported, Hannibal was very familia with Socillus Laced Emonian, as the African was with Ennius the Poet. Some fay allo that Hannibal was fo well learned in the Greeke tongue, that he wrote an historie in Greeke touching the deeds of Manlius Volfo. Now truly I do agree with Cicero, that faid in his book de Oratore, that Hannibal heard Phormio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHESVS, discourfing very largely of the office and duty of a Chieferaine and Generall, and of the Martiall lawes and ordinances: and that immediatly after being asked what he thought of that Philosopher, he should answer in no very perfect Greeke, but yet in Greeke, that he had seene many old doting sooles, but that he had neuer seene a greater doterd then Phormie. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, and Hannibal had a sharpe taunting wit in his answers. When King Antiochus on a time prepared to make war with the Romaines, and had put his army into the field, not so well furnished with armour and weapon, as with gold and silver : heasked Hannibal if he thought his army fufficient for the ROMAINES! Yea Sir, quoth he, that they be, were the enemies neuer fo couetous. This may truly be faid of Hannibal, that he obtained many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the destruction of his countrey. Scipio in contrary manner did preserve his countrey in such safety, and also did so much increase thedo. minions thereof, that as many as shall looke into his deserts, they cannot but call Rome va thankfull, which liked rather that the African (preserver of the city) should go out of Rome, then that they should represse the furicand insolencie of a few. And for mine owner opinion, I cannot thinke well of that city, that fo vnthankfully hath suffered so worthie and innocent a person to bee injured: and so would I also have thought it more blame-worthic, if the city had bene an aider of the iniurie offered him. In fine, the Senate (as all men do repon) gaue great thankes vnto Tiberius Gracchus, because he did defend the Scipioes cause: and the common peoplealfo following the African, when he visited the temples of Rome, and left the Tribunes alone that accused him, did thereby shew how much they did love and ho nour the name of the Scipioes, And therefore, if we should judge the citizens hearts and goodwils by those things, men would rather condemne them for cowards to have suffered such outrage, then vnthankfull for forgetting his benefits: for there were very few that conferted to so wicked a deed, and all of them in manner were very sorie for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of great mind, not much regarding the malice of his enemies, was content rather to leave the citie, then by civill warres to destroy it. For he would not come against his countrey with enfignes displayed, neither would he solicite strange nations and mighty kings to come with forceand their aide to destroy the city, the which he had beautified with so many spoiles and triumphs, as Martin Coriolanus, Alcibiades, and divers others did, by record of ancient stories. For we may easily perceive how carefull he wasto preserve the libertieof ROME, because when he wasin Spaine, he refused the title and name of King which was

O onely like thy selfe the world alwaies Admireth thy great valour grace and wit: And thinking to have all good parts in it, By having thee triumpheth in thy praise.

Riters of histories report that Cadmus the sonne of Agenor having taken sea out of Phenicia into Evrope, by commandement of an Oracle he left the countrey of Thracia where he haddwelt, and came into Bozoria, where he had great doings against a certaine neighbor-people called Sparrans: of whom having overcome part of them by fubtilities, he made alliance with the chiefe of those that were left aline, and grew into such fauour with them, that hedrewthem and their people vnto Theres, where these great men which were of noble house tooke them wines, and so had a great number of worthy men of noblerace descended from them. Of which some of them were very rich men, and attained to the tipe of royall dignity: as Creen and Iocastus. Now because they were deuided into two principall houses, it is hard to judge out of which of the two families of the Chronians or Echionides, Polymnis the father of Epaminondas was descended. Some are of opinion that he came out of the house of another chiefe man of the Spartans, called Vdaus, from whom descended thediuine Tiresias. But howsoeuer it was, he descended from one of the most noble and ancient houses of the Thebans, of whom they report this notable thing: that the most part of this noble lines exist man their holds over for a normall hind. this noble linage caried upon their body even for a naturall birth-marke from their mothers wombe, a Snake: and so did they beare it in their armes in deuice of their Scutchions. Touching this matter, I hold the faying of the Poet Euripides to be true: that the honor of noble houles falleth to decay, if once their goods faile them. Epaminondas exercifer in his youth. Epaminon.

das ancestors made profession of vertue, seemed to be the cause that they were made small ac. count of. Otherwise I cannot allow that the said Poet spake of, that a noble and vertuous man is no body if he be poore. For one Epaminondas onely throughly confuted this opinion, who notwithstanding he was exceeding poore, obtained neuerthelesse the chiefest places of honor in the common wealth: for he was one of the best learned and most excellent Philosophers of the world, being Platoes follower & familiar, and the most renowmed man of all the GREEKS. as appeareth by the discourse of his life. Now Polymnis had two sonnes, to wit, Caphissas, and Epaminondas, whom he was very carefull to fee well brought vp and taught all the liberall and honest sciences, especially Epaminondas, who had the most stayed wit, and best inclined to vertue, desirous to hearken and to learne, humble, obedient, and wonderfull apt and docible. and according to the discipline of the THEBANS, he learned of one Dionysius to be very skilfull in fong and playing vpon inftruments. And as for learning, and in Philosophy chiefly, it happened well for him that he fell into good mens hands by fuch a meane. When the colledges and companies of the Pythagorian Philosophers that were dispersed through the cities of ITALY, were banished by the faction of the Cylonians: they that kept still together, met in councell at METAPONT to determine of their affaires. But fome feditious persons arose against them, setfire on all parts of the house where they were, and burnt them all together, sauing Philolaus and Ly. fis, who being young and lustie, faued themselues through the fire. As for Philolaus, he recounred the country of the Lycanians, and kept there with his friends: but Lysis went further, and got to THEBES, where when he was arrived, Polymnu received him, and prayed him to be Epaminondas schoolemaster, who was but a young boy, but yet of good capacity, and of very 27/6: agood great hope. This Philosopher imployed his endeuour to manure this noble and quickewit of Epaminondas, and in short time made him ready and perfect in all science and vertue: so that it is hard to find a more wise, graue, and vertuous person then he was, of whom it is fit we should fay somewhat more at large. When he was but fifteene yeares of age, he gaue himselfe to all manner of exercises of the body, as to run, wrestle, play at the weapons, and to practise all manner of armes : and being quickly skilfull in all thefe, he then gaue himfelfe to his booke, being naturally filent, tearefull to speake, but never wearied to heare, and to learne. Whereupon spinthares the TARENTINE having benea long timewithhim in THEBES, said, he never spaketo any man that knew so much and spake so little as Epaminondas. If he fortuned to be in any company where there was talke of Philosophy, or of state matters, he would never from thence till he faw the matter ended that was propounded. Furthermore, he had no great liking of these darke & mysticall arguments of some, that think to hide vertue in the obscurity of their words, but he gaue himselfe wholly to the true practise thereof: though otherwise he was as pleasanta man to giue a fine slent in discourse, as could be possible to be found, as the disputation betwixt him and T beanor, touching pouertie and riches doth witnesse, which worthily deserueth tobe mentioned here, as in his proper place.

EPAMINONDAS.

Lysis after he had lived a long time in THEDES, died, and was honorably interred by hisdifciple Epaminondas, who had honored and entertained him whilest he lived, & at his death omitted no ceremonies requisite at his funerall. Arcesus, one of the chiefe of the Pythagorian Philosophers that stayed in Sicilia, understanding that Lysis was at Thebes, through age notableto go to him: appointed by his will and testament, that they should bring Lysis aliue againe into ITALY if it were possible, or at least wife the rest of his bones, if so it happened he were dead. The warres that fell out in the interim were a hinderance that that could not be done so specdily. But when the wayes were open and free, the Pythagorians fent Theanor of their fecto THEBES, where he found Lysis dead and buried: and so coming to Epaminondas, after salutation ons and preambles, told him before Polymnis and Caphifias, that his companions which were very rich, willed him to give Polymne and his children a good summe of money, in recompense of their courteous entertainement which they had giuen to Lysis. Whereupon after pleasantexcuses made, Epaminondas concluded, that none could be received: and added further that Isfon a Captaine of the THESSALIANS thought I had given him a rude and vnciuill answer, when he having earnestly intreated me to take a good summe of gold which he gaue me, I sent him word that he did me wrong, and began to make warre with me: for that he afpiring to make himselfe a Lord, would corrupt me with money, a plaine citizen of a free towne, and liuing vnder the law. But for thee, Theaner, I commend thy good will, because it is honest EPAMINONDAS.

and vertuous, and I loue it with all my heart: but I tell thee, thou bringeft physicke to men that be not ficke. Admit then that thou hearing we had bene in warres, haddeft brought vs armes to defend vs, and then in the same place thou haddest found vs quiet, and in good peace and amitie with our neighbours: thou wouldest not have thought it good to have bestowed these armes, and left them with those that had no need of them. Euen so thou art come to relieue our nouerty, as if it were a gricfe vnto vs: whereas to the contrary it is an easie and pleasant thing for vsto cary, and we are glad we have it in our house amongst vs: and therefore we need no armes descontents nor mony against that that doth vs no hurt at all. But thou shalt tell thy brethren there, that ment with they do yse their goods very honestly: and also that they have friends here which yse their ponerty well. And as for Lysis entertainement & burial, he himself hath fully recompensed vs. hauing taught vs amoght many other goodly things, not to be afraid of pouerty, nor to be gricued tofee it amongst vs. After Theaner had made some reply touching the good or euill of riches, as that if pouerty were not euill of it selfe, neither was riches to be had in contempt, and despised; No.truly faid Epaminondus:yet confidering with my selfethat we have a world of couctous defires of many things, some naturall as they call them, and borne with vs, bred in our flesh by the lufts pertaining to it; others ftrange vnto vs, grounded vpon vaine opinions, which taking a feeling and habit in vs by tract of time, and long vie through euill education, oftentimes doe pluckevs downe, and withdraw our foules with more force and violence, then those that be naturall vnto vs. For reason, by daily exercise of vertue and practise thereof, is a meane to take many of those things away from vs that are borne and bred within vs: yet this notwithstanding, we must vie continual force and exercise against our concupiscences that are frangers yntoys, to quench them in vs., and by all possible meanes to represse and subdue them. Now hauing made fufficient proofe of that, there is also, said he, an exercise of Iustice against greedy controusnesse of getting, which is not, not to go rob and rifle his neighbors houses in the night, nor not to rob men on the high way fide, nor if any man betray not his friends nor his country formony: fuch one doth not exercise himselfe against couerous herse, for law possible, or feare, bridlethhis couetous defire to offend any man: but that man that oftentimes willingly abstainutifrom just gaines, which he may lawfully take, he it is that by continuall exercise keepeth himselfe farre off from vniust and vnlawfull taking of money. For it is vnpossible that in great pleafures, yea wicked and dangerous, the foule should containe it selfe from coueting of them. valesse being oftentimes at his choise to vie them, he had not contemned them. And it is not caffe to oue recome them, nor to refuse great riches euill gotten being offered, unlesse he had long before killed in him this couetous defire of getting, the which belides many other habitudes and actions, is still greedily bent shamefully to gaine, pleasing himselfe in the pursuite of iniuffice, hardly sparing to wrong another, so he in any thing profit himselfe. But to a man that distaineth to receive liberality and gifts of his friends, and refuseth to take presents offered him by kings, and that hath rejected the benefits of fortune, putting by all couctous defires of glifteringtreafure layed before him: he shall neuer be affailed or attempted to do that that is vniust. nor his mind shall never be troubled, but will content himselfe quietly to do any thing that is honest, carying an vpright heart, finding nothing in it but that that is good and commendable.

But his life is farre more excellent then his discourse; and as touching that, I will yet speake somewhat ofit. Diomedon Dyzicenian, at Artaxerxes request, promised to win Epaminondas totake the Persians part. To bring this to paffe, he came to Theres, & brought a great maffe of gold with him, and bestowing three thousand crownes, he bribed a yong man called Mycithus, whom Epaminondas loued dearely. This young man went to Epaminondas, and acquainted him with the occasion of the other mans coming to THERES. But Epaminondas straight answeredhim, Diomedon being present: I have no need of money: if the king wish well to the THE-BANS, I am at his commandement without taking one penny: if he have any other meaning, he not be won hathnot gold nor filuer enough for me: for I will not fell the loue I beare to my country for all by bribes the gold in the world. As for thee that hast now attempted me, not knowing me, haply thinking with the meto belike thy felfe, I pardon thee: but get thee away quickly or of the city, lest thou seduce Persans. some other, having failed to corrupt me. And for thee Mycithus, deliuer him his crownes againe: and if thou doest it not presently. I will send thee before a Justice. Thereupon Diomedon befought him he would let him go away with fafetie, and cary that with him he brought thither. Yes mary, faid Epaminondas, but it shall not be for thy sake, but for mine honor; being afraid that if thy gold and filuer should be taken from thee, some man would accuse me that I had a sharein that which I refused to take openly. Then he asked him: Whither wouldest thou I should cause thee to be conneyed? Diomedon faid, to ATHENS: which was done, and he had a very good conuoy with him: and because he should not be troubled by the way betwixt the gates of THERES. and the hauen where he should imbarke himselfe, Epaminondas gaue Chabrias the ATHENIAN charge of this man, that he should see him safe at his waies end, and so he straight returned backe

Now though he was very poore, yet he would never take any thing of hiscity or friends he was fo well acquainted with pourty, which he bare more patiently through his studie of Philofophy. For on a time having the leading of an army of the THEBANS into the country of Pr. LOPONNE SVS; he borrowed about flue crownes of a citizen for his expenses in his journy, Pelo. pidas being a man of great wealth, and his exceeding good friend, could not possibly euer make him take any part of his goods, but rather Pelopidas learned of him to loue pouertie. For Epani. nondas taught him to thinke it an honor to him to go plainely apparelled, to eate moderally, to take paines willingly, and to make warre luftily. But to releeue others, he would make bold to vie his friends goods, and in fuch a cafetheir goods were common to him. If any of his citizens were taken prifoner with the enemy, or any friend of his had a daughter to be maried, and was not able to befow her the called his friends together, and feiffed every man of them at a certaine fumme, and afterwards brought him before them that should have this money, and told him how much every man had bestowed upon him, that he might thanke them all. But on a timehe went far beyond this for he fent a poore friend of his to a rich citize of There's, to askeofhim fixe hundred crownes, and to tell him that Epaminondus willed him to let him haue them. The citizen being amazed at this demaund, went vnto Epaminondas to know what he meant to charge him fo deepely, to make him disburfe thefe fix hundred crownes vnto him. It is, faithhe because this man being an honest man is poore; and thou that hast robbed the commonwealth of much, art rich. He lived to foberly, and was fuch an enemy vnto all superfluitic and excesse. that being on a time inuited to supper to one of his neighbours, when he saw great preparation of fine meates, baked meates, made diffies, and perfumes: he faid vnto him: I thought thought dest made a facrifice, not an excesse of superfluity, and even so went his way. Even the like he spake of his own table, saying, that such an ordinary neuer received treason. On a time being at a feast with his peeres and companions, he drank vineger. And when they asked him what rea. fon he had to do fo, and if it were good for his health? I cannot tell, faith he, but well I wote its good to put me in remembrance how I line at home. Now it was not for that his nature milliked Tweet meates, that he lived thus firstly, and did love and embrace poverty, for he was manuellous high and nobly minded: but by his straight and vareprougable life he led, he thoughto bridle many infolencies & diforders then reigning among it the THEBANS, and to reduce them to the former temperance of their ancestors. As vpon a time a cooke giving vp an accountto him and his fellowes of their ordinary expences for certaine daies, he could find fault with nothing, but with the quantity of oyle that was spent. His companions maruelling at it: Tush, said he, it is not the expence that offendeth me, but because they have powred in so much oyle into their bodies. The city of THERES made an open feaft, and they were all of them in their banquets, feasts, and great affemblies one with the other: but Epaminondas to the contrarie, he went drie vp and downe the towne very fad, without being annointed with any oyle of perfume, or decked with braucapparel. Some of his familiar friends met him in this estate, & wondering at him, asked him why he walked to alone, & ill apparelled through the city? Becaufe, faid he, you might in the mean time fafely gine your felues to drink drunke, and make merie, taking thought for nothing. Thus have we spoken enough touching his temperance and as for his other vertues they are most famous in armes, the which he with great good fortune and happinesse managed for the good of his countrie.

Now his modefly would in no wife fuffer him to feeke his aduancement, but contrariwife he withdrew himfelfe from gouernment, onely to give himfelfe quietly to the studie of Philofophic. Howbeit it happened that the LACED EMONIANS on a time prayed aide of the THE-BANS, at that time being in league with them, who fent them certaine foot bands. Epaminondate being about fine and thirty yeares of age, armed himselfe, and went with the rest. Thenit was that that friendship began betwixt Pelopidas and him, which constantly continued evento the end. For they being both in battell ray, the one by the other, against the ARCADIANS, whom Theoreasson they had in front against them in the plaine of MANTINEA, it chanced that one of the points of of friend. the battell of the LACED EMONIANS, in the which they were retired, & many of them left their Epaminonal rankes: but they being resolute, determining rather to die then to flie, stood to it like men, vn- das and Fe. illihat Pelopidas being hurt in feuen places, fell downe vpon an heape of dead bodies: then Enaminondas though he tooke him to be but a dead man, stepped manfully before him to defend hisbodie and armes, and he alone fought against many, resolued to die in the place, rather then tolcaue Pelopidas among the dead men, vntil that himfelf being thrust into the breast with a pike and wounded in thearme with a blow of a fword, (ready to give ouer) by good fortune, and ina happie time, King Agespolis came on with the other point of the battell; and saued them hoth. Afterwards the LACED EMONIAN'S finely wanne the castle of THEBE'S called CADMEA. putinastrong garrison there, and gaue the gouernment of the citie vnto Archias, Philippus, and Leontidas, authors of all the mischiefe. Whereupon to avoide their violence, Pelopidas and many others with speed fled and saued themselues, and were banished by sound of trumpet. And as for Examinendas, they faid nothing to him, but let him alone in the city: for he was contemned as a man of no reckoning, because he was so given to his booke; and if he should have had any will to have stirred against them, he could have done them no hurt for his povertie. Now whilest Pelopidas and his companions being at ATHENS, had layd a plot to free THEBES, Epaminondas making no shew of any thing, had long before deuised another practise, which was, to lift up the hearts and courage of the young men of THEDES. For when they went out to play and exercifetheir bodies, he alwaies found a way to make them wrestle with the LACED EMONIANS. Afterwards when he faw the LACED EMONIAN'S fiercely throw them, and give them shrewd falles, they being the stronger, he rebuked the Thebans, and told them, it was a shame for them for want of courage to fuffer y LACED AMONIANS to fet their feet vpon their throats, that were not halfe so strong, rough, and boisterous as they were. All this while Pelopidas & his followers went on with their complot, and they had so good successe in their purpose, that one night they got privily into the city of THEBES, and met at Charens house, where they were to the number of eight and forty. Epaminondas knew all well enough, and fome towards night taking him aside, went about to perswade him to joyne with them in this enterprise, and to take armes with them to fet vponthese tyrants; maruelling much, that hee would be so backward, the liberty of his countrey standing upon it. He answered, that he had taken order with his friends and Gorgidusthat they should put themselves in readinesse vpon any occasion; howbeit that he would put none of his citizens to death, vnleffe they were condemned by law: yet if you will make an attempt for delivery of the city, so it be without murther, and shedding the bloud of the citizens, I will helpe you (faid he) with all my heart. If you will not beleeve me, but persevere in your determination, I pray you let me alone, pure and undefiled with the bloud of my citizens, and fo blamelesse to attend occasion, whereby I may justly take hold of that which may turne to the good of the commonwealth: for the murrher that wil be committed, cannot possibly be contained within reasonable bound. I do certainly beleeue that Pherecides and Pelopidas peraduenture will specially set upon the authors of the tyrannie: but Eumolpidas and Samiadas, both cholericke andfiercemen, taking the liberty of the night, they will neuer lay downe their armes, nor put their swords vp into their sheathes, before they have filled all the city with murthers, and slaine discreptible chiefe personages. Moreoucr, it is very convenient for the people of THERES, that some be left free, and blamelesse of this murther, and guiltlesse of al that shall be done in this futicefaction: for fo the people shall least suspect that we give any encouragement to their rising, although to good end. Notwithstanding al this the enterprise was executed, and the tyrants put The tyrants to death, the city restored to her ancient liberty, and the castle of Ca D in B a rendred vp by com-Polition, and Lyfandridas the LACED AMONIAN, and other commanders within, suffered to depart, with fafetie of their goods and the fouldiers. These were the beginnings of the long wars of the LACED EMONIANS against the THEBANS, with whom the ATHENIANS ioyned in league. For Epaminondas, he quietly gaue himselfe to his book hot with standing he was put forward by Pammenes, a principall man of THEEEs, & he began to follow the wars very hotly, and in divers encounters made great proofe of his wifedome, hardinesse and valour: insomuch that by degrees he attained at the length to the highest highest detharges of gouernment in the commonwealth. And his citizens having made no further reckoning of him being a man of forty yeares old: after that they came to know him, and had truled him with their army, he faued the city of THEBES that was like to have bin vindone, and freedal GRECE from the feruitude & bondage of the LACED EMONIANS: making vertue as in a cleare light shine with glory, shewing her effects when time serueth. Furthermore, Agesilaus being entred into Bo For I A with an army of twenty thousand footmen, and five thousand horse, preyed and spoyled all the plaine countrey, and presented the THEBANS in open field that which they would not accept, finding themselves the weaker: howbeit they defended themselves so well through the alle of the ATHENIANS, and of the wife conduction of Epaminondas and Pelopidas. that Agestlaus returned home with his army. But after he was gone, the THEBANS went with their troupes before the city of THESPIES, where they surprised and put to the sword two hundred men of the garrifon, and afterwards gaue divers affaults one vpon another vnto the wall, and feeing their labour loft, they returned with their army back against o Thebes, How. beit Phabidas the LACED EMONIAN, hee that had taken the castle of CADMEA by treason. (whereupon rofe all this warre that followed) and was then gouernour of THESPIES, made a fallie out of the towne, and rashly went to give a charge vpon the THEBANS in their retreate. where he loft fine hundred of his men, and himfelfe was flaine in the field. Not long after, the LACED EMONIANS with the felf same power returned agains to make war with the THEBANS, who having wonne certaine streights and places of advantage, so blocked up the way, as they could not our rune the country, and spoyle it as they had done before. Neuerthelesse, Agestianu had so harried and troubled them, that by little and little they came to a maine battell, which held very long and cruell. Now though Agefilaus at the first had the better, yet the THEEANS charged him to hotly, that at the length he himselfe was hurt, and conftrained to retire, being well payed for teaching the THEBANS militarie discipline. And this was the first time that the THEBANS knew themselves to be as strong and lustic as the LACED #MONIANS: whereupon they triumphed in figne of victory, and from that time forwards they waxed more couragious to make head against the enemy, and to present them battell. But the onely thing that did most encourage them, was the presence of Epaminondas, who counselled, commanded, and executions ted very wifely, valiantly, and most fortunately. A certaine time after that, they went with a great number of good chosen men before ORCHOMENE, where they prevailed not because there was a strong garrison of the LACED EMONIANS, that sallied out vpon them to give them battell, which was very sharpe between them. And yet, albeit the LACED & MONIANS were many against one, the THEBANS gaue them the ouerthrow, which neuer happened to thembefore; but what nation focuer they had bene, they thought they had done a great feate, if with a greater number by many, they had opercome a small number of the LACED EMONIANS. But this victory, and the encountring of TEGYRE, where the THEBANS obtained another victory vnder the conduct of Pelopidas, lift vp their hearts on high, and made their valure more famous then before.

The next yeare following, Artaxerxes king of PERSIA, meaning to make warre in Agree, and therefore to retaine divers firangers, determined to appeale the warres against the GREEKES, in hope that they being at peace, would more eafily be contented that fouldiers should be leavied in their countrey; and thereupon sent his Ambassadours to all the townes of GREECE, to perswade & intreate them to be at peace together. The GREEKE'S were very willing to hearken vnto it, being wearied of all fides with folong a warre, and were eafily drawne to treate of peace; wherby it was especially agreed and concluded, that all the cities of GRERCE should be free, and vse their owne lawes; and commissioners were sent all about to withdraw the garrifons in enery place where any was kept. Vnto this the THEBAN'S onely refused to a gree, that every towne should by it selfe severally capitulate this treatie, requesting that the townes in the countrey of BOEOTIA should be comprehended under the city of THEBES Thereunto the ATHENIANS mightily opposed themselves, and there was one of their Orators called Callifratus, that touching this matter made a notable oration before the affembly of the States of GREECE. And Epaminon das on the other fide also, made a wonderfull and wehement oration indefence of the right of the THERANS: infomuch as this controversie was left undecided, and the treatie of peace was vniuerfally agreed and concluded amongst all the other GREEKES, the THERANS onely excepted, who were not comprised within the treatie. So through the motion of Epaminondas, they were bold to withstand the decrees of all the rest of GREECE. GREECE. For the ATHENIANS and LACED EMONIANS that many yeares before had conten- The Ather ded for the principality of GREECE, made then division together: so that the one should command by sea, and the other by land. Thus they could not like in no wise, that the THEBANS monians hould afpire to be chiefe, and therfore they fought to difmember the other towns of Bo Bot IA Parethe from the city of THEBES. And the rather for that the THEBANS being strong and lusty of government between the hodie, and encouraged for that of late they had oftentimes beaten the LACED EMONI- to keepe ANS. Matters resting thus doubtfull, the citizens of PLATÆES, a towne of BOEOTIA, defrous to be at league with the ATHENIANS, they fent to request some soldiers of them, promifine to put the town into their hands. The gouernors of the country of Bororia having intelligence of it, defirous to preuent the garrison of the ATHENIANS, brought a troupe of fouldiers against them, and they alcame before PLATÆES, before the townes men had any knowledge of their coming: infomuch that part of them were furprifed in the fields by the horsemen, and theother fled into the towne. But having no body to aide them, they were compelled to receineand accept fuch composition as it pleased the THEBANS to grant them: which was, to leaue their towne, and to go fafely with bagge and baggage, and neuer to return e againe into the COUNTRY Of BOBOTIA. After this, the THEBANS razed the city of PLATÆES to the ground, and The Thebans had the facke of the towne of THE SPIES, enemy vnto them. All the GREEK's folicited againe razePlaby the ambassadors of Persia, thought it good to make a generall peace, and so assembled the father commissioners of al the townes at Sparta. Epaminondas that was yet scarce knowne, because he loued nor to shew himselfe, and in all his exploits of warre had ever preferred the advancement of his great friend and companion in armes Pelopidas, before himselfe: yet famous among the GREEKE'S for his great knowledge and experience, was fent thither by the THEBANS. Epaminudas finding that the other commissioners did leane to Agesilaus, began to speake boldly and plainely, and made an oration, not onely in the Thebans behalfe, but for all Grece also: making them plainely fee, that war did ftill increase the greatnesse of the city of Sparta onely, andkeepe all the rest of the townes of GRECE vnder. Therfore he gaue counsel to alto establish afirme peace indifferently betwixt them, that thereby it might have the longer continuance, when all comprized within the contract should be equals. Agefilaus perceiving all the GREEKS affiliant at this affembly, to give very attentive care vnto him, and to be tickled, hearing him speakeso freely of peace: he asked him aloud if he thought it iust and reasonable, that all Bo BO- day round ris should be set at liberty. Eparainondas on the other side, did presently and boldly aske him and sharpe againe, if he thought not also that it was just and reasonable, that all LACONIA should be set at liberty. Thereupon Agestlaus in anger stood vp on his feete, and commanded him to answer laus. plainely, if they should not restore all the prouince of Bobor in to her liberty. Epaminondas returned the felfe same speech againe vnto him: if they should not also put that of Laconta in her liberty. This did so anger Agestlaus, besides that it did him good to have this colour for an old grudgehe barevnto the THEBANS, that forthwith he put the names of the THEBANS out of the in of those that should be comprized within the peace, and immediatly proclaimed open war against them. But this being done had euill successe afterwards, and by reason of the sodaine and Talhenterprise of the LACED & MONIANS, it turned to their vtter ouerthrow. For the THE-MANS, there was no remedy but they must beare the whole brunt alone: for there was not a townethat durst send them any aide, because they were all agreed and sworne to this peace, insomuch as euery one thought them vtterly cast away and vndone, Many pitied their estate, and they that loued them not, rejoyced: they made fo full account, that the LACED EMONIANS should find nothing that could stand before them. Sothe LACED EMONIANS made king Cleombrotus march with his army towards THEBES: fix comfetand being come neare to CHERONEA with ten thousand footmen and a thousand horse, he lors for afficient pitched his camp there to flay for the rest of his allies. The THEBANS having intelligence of the approch of the enemy, chose Epaminondas to be captaine generall, giving him the charge of this two fores warre, with fixe other Councellers, whom they call Bastarches, as who would fay, Gouernours of BOEOTIA, to be of his counsell, and to affist him. Now there came Oracles to the Therans bowshey from all parts: some promising victory, others threatning ouerthrow. He commanded them toletthose on the right hand of the chaire for Orations, that promised victory: and those that threatened overthrow, on the left hand. They being thus disposed of the got vp to the chair fail Orations, and faid to the THEBANS: If you will be obedient to your Captaines, and couragions of heart to encounter your enemies, these here (shewing the good Oracles on the right hand) are yours: but if for faint hearts you refuse danger, those there (shewing the bad on theleft hand) shall be for you. Thereupon enrolling all the THEBAN'S names that were of age to beam armes, and of fome parts of Bo For IA those that he thought fittest for wars; word was brought him that a very honest and valiant man of his person died in his bed. O Hercules, said he, what had this man ley fure to die in all these troubles? His presence reioyced, and made all his army lively: also all the time he was Captaine of the THEBANS, they never fawany of these terrous happen in this campe without manifest cause, which they call sodaine feares. He was wonten fay, that there was no death more honest then to die in the warres: and that the body of a loul. dier should not onely be kept in exercise like the champions that fight for mastery, but rather more hardned to endure any labour or paines meet for a good fouldier. And ther fore he could notabide very fat men, but caffiered a whole band of the for that cause only: saying, that scarce three or four etargets could couer fo great a belly as did keepe him that he could not fee his own privities. So he drew his army out of THEBES, having in all but fixe thousand fighting men. P. uen as they were marching away out of THEBES, divers of the fouldiers thought they had had many valuckie fignes. For as they were going out of the gates, Epaminondas met on his wava Herald, that following an ancient ceremony and custome of theirs, brought an old blindman as if he hadbenerun away, and the Herald crying out aloud, Bring him not out of There so, nor put him not to death, but cary him backe againe, and faue his life. The old men tooke this mee. ting and cry for an cuill figne: but the young men kept filence, and spake neuer a word for feare it should be thought that their hearts failing them, they would feeke to diffwade Epaminonda from going the journey he had vindertaken. And he himfelfe, vinto fome that were bold total him, that it were well done before he went any further, to confider first what successet the first what successes the successes ing of the birds did promise vnto him, answered this verse of Homer:

It is a happy signe, to fight for his countrey. Such a present and franke resolution stopped the mouthes of all those that were not very constant. But there happened yet another signe worse then the first. For there went a Secretariebefore him carying a Iauelin, vnto y which was tyed a fcroll, to make the foldiers know that they should do what the Generall commanded them. The wind rose and blew of this scroll and caried it away, folding it vpon a fquare pillar that flood vpon a tombe of certain LACED AMONI-ANS, and PELOPONNESIANS that had bene flaine in that place when Ageflaus brought his army thither. Alfo there came againe certaine old men vnto him to speake with him, perswading and protesting that he ought not to go any further with his army, fince the gods were so manifeftly against it. All this notwithstanding he never ceased to march with his campe, thinking that the conscience and resolution to fight in a good cause, ought to be much stronger and of more force to put him in good hope, then these euill figues that appeared, to make him mistrust the worst. And as in marching to meete with the LACED EMONIANS they heard it hunder: they that were neare vnto him, asked him, what that thunder meant? That, faith he, betokeneth that the enemies braines are troubled & aftonied: feeing they having hard by them so commodious places, to campe in they now lye encamped where they are. Indeed they halted, staying for divers of their allies that came not all of them having at better ley fure confidered of the dicourse Epaminondas made in Sparta in open affembly of all the commissioners of every towne, against the ambition of the Laced Amonians. Epaminondas therfore applying to good purpose at that time all the goodly discourse he had learned by the studie of Philosophie, for the present time the common people blamed him much; but after the fortunate successe of his intention, euery manthen judged him to be a man ripely vinderstanding the dutie of a wise and valiant chieftaine of war. For making his army march with speed, he wanne the straights hard by the city of CORONEA, and camped there. Cleombrotus on the other fide, understanding that the THEBANS had gained that paffage, despairing he could not paffe that way, made his army goa great compasse about the countrey of Phocips; and marching along the sea side in a very troublous and dangerous way, at the last he pierced into the country of Borotta without any danger. And as he went also he tooke in little townes, and certaine gallies that lay along that coast, and in the end arrived at L By CTRES; and there fate downe to refresh his men a litle, ouer wearied with trauell in their journey. The Bosotians marched presently that way to meete with them, and so passing ouer some little mountaines, they discouered them in the plaine of Levetres, which did amaze them, seeing so great an army.

The Baotarches thereupon came together to consult whether they should go forward, and to connell & fight one against many or else retire, and find out some better place of advantage. In this counfell their opinions fell out to be equall: for three of them thought it good to retire: the other in war. three with Epaminondas, said, they must tarrie and fight. So the conclusion of this counsell being doubtfull, and the Baotarches disagreeing, Pelopidas captaine of the holy band came to them, who was of the second opinion: so that they all agreed together to put it to the hazard of battel. But The policy of Enaminondas seeing their souldiers affraid through the superstition of these signes, deuising by fome like remedy to put this mistrust out of their heads: to bring this to passe, some being newly come from THEBES, he will them to fay & giue it out enery where, that no man could tell perfitious at THEBES what was become of the armes that hung vp in Hercules temple: but that the voice feare. was all the town ouer, that the ancient demigods their ancestors had come and taken them away, for the aide of their descendants at this present time. He suborned another also, that gaue itout he was newly come from Trophonius truncke or hole, and that the god which giveth the Oracles in the same, comanded him to tell the Bobotians that after they had direcome their enemies in the plaine of Levetres, they should celebrate yeerely plaies in the honor of inpiter. And thereof it came that & BOEOTIAN's long time after that did yearely celebrate a feast, which is made in LEBADIA. Now to end the painting of this artificiall denice, Leandrias a Spartan, being a banished man out of his countrey, and fighting at that time for the Boeotians, being brought before the fouldiers, whom they encouraged to fight like men the day of the battel:he did sweare vnto them that the LACED EMONIAN'S had an ancient Oracle, that said they should lose their principality, when they should be our come by the THEBANS in a pitched field, in the plaine of Levetres. It is true indeed that the LACED EMONIANS had had many oracles and forewarnings to bid them beware of the anger of Levetres: but the common people vnderflood not what this warning meant, but were deceived by the equinocation of the word: for that there were three Levetres: towit, in LACONIA, ARCADIA, and BOEOTIA. Howbeit, the vision of Pelopidas, whereof is made large mention in his life, and the facrifice he made of the yong Filly that came into his camp, confirmed all the former inventions, and made them bold that were most discouraged. Adding withall, that Epaminondas having affembled all his army, began to encourage them with these strong and lively reasons to shew their valour: insomuch, that being freed from this superstitious feare, they longed for nothing more then to come to blowes. Epaminondas cuer concluded all his orations in this manner: O worthy men, embrace How Epafacred death, advancing your felues to the most honorable and famous fight for your country, minorates concluded for the tombes of your ancestors, and for the holy things. Euen at the same time came to the bis orations. THERANS an aide of fine hundred horse, & fifteene hundred footmen THESSALIANS, conducted by Islan: who practifed with both fides to make a peace for certaine daics, telling them he Thebans was not wise that seared not the euents. Some judge it was not at that time that Infon trauelled with 500. betweene them both, but rather it was after the iourney of Leverres. Howbeit, I have followed that which Diodoras the Sicilian writeth, as a thing most likely. Now as Cleombrotus men. retired with his army out of Borotia, he met with a great fupply of naturall LACED EMONI-Ans, and of some of their allies, brought to him by Archidamus, Agestlaus sonne. The LACE- senter cle-DEMONIANS secing the THEBANS so resolute, and fearing their desperate boldnesse: sent these ombroiss. two troupes the casilier to daunt the courage of their enemies. These two being ioyned together they were ashamed to be afraid of the Boeotians, and whether it was that the truce taken was neare expired, or that they forced not of it, they returned on the fodaine again into the plaine of LEVCTRES fully bent to fight. The BOEOTIAN'S also for their part shrunke not an inchbacke, Epaminonand so on both sides they set their men in order of battell. For Epaminondas, he set his battell after a new fashion, neuer before shewed by any other Captaine. For having chosen out of his army the best men and valiantest souldiers he had, he placed them together in one of the points of fastion. his battel, where he should be himselfe & fight in person, seconded with Pelopidas, with his three hundred chosenmen, called the holy band: and in the other corner he placed his weaker men, commanding them expresly not to abide the charge of the enemies that should come to assaile them in front, but faire and foftly to retire when they faw them come nearethem. So the matter city of Mantinea; that was the cause the Thebans loyned with the Arcabians, and being followed with their allies, led by Epaminondas, they entred into Laconia with an armie of

ATHENIANS fent Iphicrates Captaine with twelve thousand men to aide the Spartans but before his comming Epaminondus entred into LACONIA in divers places, and facked all the whole countrey, which had not bene laid wast by any enemy in fixe hundred yeares space before, when the Dor ian's came to inhabit there. The Spartan's feeing their countrey wafted and destroyed before their eyes, were desirous to go out with all the force they could make: but

Jeeflans would not fuffer them, telling them how dangerous it was to leave the city, to fet voon fuch a mighry enemic. So they were quiet, and Epaminondas in the meane space def-cended the mountaine Taugete with his army, towards the river of Eurotas, the which at that time was rifen very high by reason of the winter. He fought what he could to draw Acessaus to fight, who beholding Epaminondas a great while, marching in battell ray along it the river fide at the head of his troupes; he wondred at his boldnesse and valour, but would by no meanes come out of his fort. Infomuch as after this army had preyed and foraged all LACONIA, Epami-nondas led them backe againe laden with booty. And though Agestlans had won himselfe great honour for his wisedome, in looking to the safetic of his city: yet Epaminondas had made his power it had before. Furthermore, notwithstanding all the aide of the ATHENIANS, and the experience of Iphicrates, Epaminondas returned with his whole armie as he came. And the more to keep the Laced Amonians still under their feet, & to heape new troubles you them:

hegane counfell to the ARCADIANS and other their allies, to reed fie and replenish the city of the space of four escore and fine daies having reedified the ruined houses, he set on foot against one of the noblest and most ancient cities of GREECE, and left there a strong garrison: for the forty thousand men of warre, and with thirty thousand others that followed the campe. The fell out as he wished: and he hoped to determine the battell by the vertue and prowesse of that point where he had placed all the flower and choife of his army.

Now the figne to fight being given, the LACED EMONIAN'S marched of even hand with the two horns of their battel, ordered in forme of a Cressant. On the contrary part, one of the wings of the battell of the Bosorians began to give backe, and the other with great fury rar neto charge the enemie in the flancke: straight they were both come to the sword together. Andat the first, because either side fought very desperatly, the victory was doubtfull for a certain time: but at the length Epaminondas troupes brake in amongst the LACED AMONIANS, and killed the most part of them that were about king Cleombrotus. So long as the king was aliue, he kept backe the THEBAN'S from victory, because he was accompanied with all the most valiant men of his army, valiantly fighting about him. But after he fell downe dead on the ground, having received an infinit number of wounds, and striken downe many of his enemies: then they thronged together on all fides, & there was a cruell fight about his body, where were heapes of mens bodies flaine one vponanother. And although Epaminondas did sharply follow his point, yet the LACED EMONIANS made such refistance at the last, that they did a little repulse the Boe of IANS. and cleared the body of the king out of the presse and multitude: but that held not long. For Epaminondas through his perswasiions did so lift vp the hearts and courage of his men, that they gaue a second and so fierce a charge vponthem, that they wholly ouerthrew the LACED AMO. NIANS, & made them flie for life. Then Epaminondas ficrcely pursuing the flying enemies, made great flaughter, and wan one of the most gloriousest victories that ever Captaine did: having in a pitched field ouercome the most noble and warlike nation of all GREECE, with a farre smaller number of men then his enemies had. Also he tooke more glory of that aboue all his other exploits, and specially because it hapned vnto him in his father Polymnis life time. And oftentimes he had these words vp in his mouth: that of all the honest and happie fortunes that euer chanced vnto him, nothing loyed his heart more, then that he had vanquished the LACED EMONI-ANS at the battel of LEVCTRES, his father and mother that begat him being both aliue. And to fay truly, he that day preserved the life of his father and mother, and of his whole country befides: for the LACED EMONIANS were fully resolued veterly to destroy the THEBANS. Now he vfing at all other times to shew himselfe amongst them, fine and near, with a pleasant countenance: the next day after the battel at Levetres he came out openly very fad, heavy and penfine. Whereupon his friends asked him prefently if he had heard any cuill newes, or fome miffortune had happened to him. None, faidhe, but I perceined by my felfe yesterday, that ouerioyed with the victory that I obtained, I lift up my felfe more then became me: and therfore to day I correct this ioy, which yesterday was too exceeding in me. He knowing that it was the maner of the Spartans to hide and couer (as well as they could possible) all such missortunes: defirous openly to expresse and shew the greatnesse of the lossethey had sustained, he would not fuffer them to carrie away their dead bodies by great all together, but every city one after another; and so by this meanes it appeared that there were about a thousand LACED EMONIA ANS slaine. Some make the number of the dead to be greater, and say they were foure thousand naturall LACED EMONIANS, but that must be understood of them and their allies: and of the BOE OTIANS, there were not about three hundred or thereabouts found dead. This battell of

LEVETRES was strickenat the beginning of the 2. yeare of the hundred and second Olympiade. The LACED EMONIANS having at that battell lost the greatest part of their honour & greatnesse, which men had seene before in their estate, lost northeir courage for all this: but to keepe their youth still in heart, and to take away all feare which had possessed them that had escaped from this ouerthrow, Agestlaus entred Arcadia with anarmy, and was contented to take a finall towne of the MANTINEANS, and to prey and spoile the country; which done, he returned homeagaine. Some thinke that this was the cause that brought Epaminondas into LACONIA. Othersome report it otherwise, and say that Agesilaus would not suffer the Mantineaus to reedifie their city. And there be that are of another opinion, which is: that Lycomedes Captaine of the Arcadians having made a rode hard to Orchomene, he flue vpon an encounter Polytropus Captaine of the LACED EMONIANS, and 2. hundred Spartans with him, his purpose being to win Orchomene: and thereupon they finding themselues too weake to stand against the LACED ÆMONIANS, they sought the alliance and aide of the THEBANS. Howsoeuer it was, the LACED EMONIANS and ARCADIANS being enemies, by reason of their chiefe country to poore with the former loffes sustained, especially at the ouerthrow at LEVETRES: Sparta in that Sparra could neuer afterwards recouer that losse againe, nor grow into that reputation & pours speed

MESSINA with new inhabitants againe, which the LACED EMONIANS had long before that Epaninondestroyed. All the whole councell giving their consents vnto it, he made diligent inquirie forthwith to feeke out all those that till that time had beneancient inhabitants in MESSINA: and in berequired which he was as much estremed and rather more, then for any other service he had ever done. The LACED EMONIANS being lightened of a maruellous great feare, made an agreement with the ATHENIANS, and left them the chiefe command by fea, referring to them felues that by land. Afterwards through the aide of the Athenians, and the supply that was sent vnto them out of Sicilia, they wan their townes againe by litle and litle. The Arcadians to ftop their course, affaulted the city of PALLENE in LACONIA, put althe garrison there to the sword, razed the towne, and preyed all the countrey thereabout: and doubting that the LACED Æ-MONIANS Would be reuenged, they prayed aide of the THEBANS, who fent Epaminondas this ther and the other Bæstarches, with fix thousand footmen, and five hundred horse. The Athe-NIANS having intelligence thereof, fent their army before under the leading of Chabrias, who marched directly to Corinth, and there had supply of souldiers, of the MEGARIANS, PAL-LENIANS, and Corinthians, to that he had made up a regiment of tenthonfand men. And afterwards the army of the LACED EMONIANS and of their allies, being arrived at the very place of Corinth, they made all together the number of twenty thousand fighting men. So they determined to repaire and fortific althe passages and entrances into the country of PELO- The Lace. PONNESVS, to stop the passage of the Bosorians. And beginning from y city of CENCRES demonians vnto the hauen of LECHEVM, they shut and blocked up all the waies from the one sea to the fortifiethe other, with mighty great peeces of timber acrosse, and with a maruellous deepe ditch. And this to pelopongreat peece of worke was followed with such speed, both by meanes of the great multitude of nesses, from people, as alfothrough the goodwils of those that laboured it hard: that they had finished and fearester. done all before the Bo E OTIANS could arrive there. Epaminondas at his comming having diligently viewed and confidered this fortification, perceived that the eafiest way to be forced, was that which the Laced Amonians themselves kept. So he sentto give them defiance, though they were thrice as many men in number as his own. For all this that they had the defiance, they durst not come out, but kept them close vader this fortification, which receiving certain affaults, they were repulsed. Now al of them doing their best indeuour, being occupied, some affailing, other defending, Epaminordas chose out the best men in all his armie, and lustily charging the guard of the LACED EMONIANS enforced them to give him way, and in despite of them he entred into Peroponnesvs, which was a wonderfull and memorable exploit of alothers. Fro thence he marched towards the cities of EPIDAVRE & TROEZEN, and so foraged all the country: howbeithe could take none of the townes, because they were defended with strong garri. fons. Neuertheleffe he put Sicyone, Phevnte, and some other townes in such feare, that they yeelded themselves vnto him. That being done, he went to Corinth, & there ouercame the CORINTHIANS in a fet battell, and beate them home fighting cuento the wals of their citie. There were some of his men so rash, and presuming of their valour, that they entred hand ouer head with those that fled, even within the gares of their city: which put the Corinthia Ans in such a terrible feare, that they ran with all speed possible to get their houses ouer their heads. Chabrias beatethem out againe, and killed some of them. Wherupon he caused a token of triumph to be fet vp, as if it had bene an ouerthrow. Epaminondas laughing him to fcome forit faid he should not call it a Trophec, or token of triumph, but rather Hecateste, as one would say, a statue of Proferpina: because in times past they commonly serthis image of Proferpina at the first gallowesthey found before the gate of any city. The Bo BOTIAN's therefore came on with their battell as neare vinto Corinth as they could, and Chabrias with his troupes camped without in a very strong place of aduantage for him: so there were many skirmishes betweene them, in the which Chabrias shewed such valour, that he wan great fame and reputation even of Epaminondas himselfe. Who being asked on a time whom he thought the greatest captaine, himselfe. Chabrias, or Iphicrates: It is hard to judge, faid he, whileft we are all aliue. Another brought him word that the ATHENIANS had fent an army againeinto PELOPONNESVS, furnished with new armours. Well, answered he, doth Anigenidas weepe when he knoweth that Tellin hathnew flutes? This Tellin was a very bad player of the flute, and Antigenidas excellent good and skilfull. Touching the supply of this army, they were ten thousand Spaniards and Gavies, whom Dionylius the tyrant fent out of Sicilia to aide the Laced Emonians, having payed them for fine moneths. They had ferued reasonably well in this war, and so in the end of sommer returned home againe.

Now it fortuned in these last encounters, that Epaminondas having forced the LACED EMO-NIANS that flood to the defence of the fortification about mentioned, and having them in his power to have flaughtered a great number of them at his will: he contented himfelfe only with this glory, that in despite of them he had entred into Peloponnesus, and sought to do them no more hurt: which gaue those occasion that did enuichis glory to blame him, and to accuse him of treason, as having willingly spared the enemies, because they should particularly thanke him onely. But now that we have begun to speake of this matter, we must see how he behaved himselfe among his citizens, and the wisedome he vsed in defence of his integrity. Among all those that could not endure the glory of his vertues, was Meneclides the Oratour, an eloquent man, but withall most wicked and malicious. He finding that Epaminondas wan such honour by warres, neuer left perswading the THEBANS to embrace peace, and to preferre it before warre: because they should not line alwaies under the obedience and command of one man. Examinonaustold him one day in open councell: Thou wilt deceive the THEBANS, going about to counfell them to leaue warres; and highly commending eafe, thou goeft about to put iron bolts vpon their feete. For warre begetteth peace, the which cannot hold long but among those that know how to secke and keepe it with the edge of the sword. Then speaking to the citizens: If ye will haue the principality and command of all GREECE, before all others: you must shrowd your selues in your tents and paullions in the open field, and not follow games & wrestlings here at home. Also he knew well enough that the Bobotians spoiled and vidid themselves by ease and idlenesse: which was the cause that he constantly bare this mind to keepe them continually in wars. Whereupon when time came that they fell to choosing of Captaines, and that they went about to chuse him Baotarche: he said to the citizens: My masters, I pray you consider of it now you are at ley sure, before you chooseme: for I tell you plainely, if I be chosen your captaine, you must to the warres. He called the country of Bo E o TIA, which is all plaine champion, the scatfold of war: saying it was vnpossible to keepe it, vnlesse the inhabitants had their targets on their armes, and their fwords in their hands. This was not because he did not loue peace, and folitarinesse to studie Philosophy, and that he was not more fearful of them he had in his charge then for himselfe, vsing alwaies to watch and forbeare his meate, when the Thebans were at their banquets and feasts giving themselves to all pleasures: but he knew them well enough, and Epaminon. he was neuer more carefull of any thing, then to keepe his army from idlenesse. For on a time the Arcadian's intreating that his troupes might enter into one of their towns, to lie driethere his army incouert all the winter, he would by no meanes yeeld to it. For now (said he to his fouldiers) from idlethat they see you exercise your selues in arms, they wonder at you as braue & valiant souldiers: but if they should see you at the fire side parching of beanes, they would esteeme no better of vou then of themselves. No more could be endure coverousnesse: for if sometime be gave his men leaue to go a booting, his meaning was, that what soeuer they got should be bestowed in furnishing of armes. For if any man went about to fill his purse with mony, he thought him vnworthie to be a fouldier. As on a time when he perceived that his Target bearer had received a great summe of money for the ransome of a prisoner, he said vnto him: Giue me my target, and go thou thy waies, and buy theea Tauerne to leade the rest of thy life there: for I perceive thou wilt no more like an honest man put thy selfe in danger in the warres, as before thou hast done; because thou art now rich and wealthy. Now Epaminondas being such a one as you have heard. Meneclides notwithstanding would never cease controlling of him:and one day he went so farre asto reproch him that he had no children, that he was not married, & that he magnified himself more then ever king Agamemnon had done. Epaminondas answered him, thou hast nothing to do to counsell me to marrie: for in that respect there is neuer a man here in all this councell whom I would leffe vie then thou. And this he spake, because the other was suspected to be an adulterer. And where thou thinkest that I do enuie the glory and same of Agamemnon, thou art fouly deceiued: yet I tell thee he was not a little troubled to win a town inten yeares; where I to the contraty putting the LACED EMONIANS to flight in one day, have delivered our city and al GREECE from them. But thankes beto you, my Lord THEBANS, (speaking to all the whole assembly;) through you I did it, and ouerthrew and ruined the power and gouernment of our enemies. Neuerthelesse, Pelopidas and he were very euill recompensed for this good service of theirs: for at their returne from LACONIA, they with some other of the Baotarches were accused, for that after the time of their charge & gouernment was expired, they had kept it foure moneths beyond the time the law had appointed them. With much ado Pelopidas was absolued: but Epaminondas willed his companions to lay all the fault vpon him, as being forced vnto it by his authority: and that for his part his words could be no better then his deedes. So vpon this he being called before the Iudges, and after he had instified that he had passed the time limited of his authority: in stead of excusing himselfe, he went and told brauely his worthy exploits he had done in this iourney at that time: adding withall, that he was willing and ready to die, so they caused his condemnation to be written upon the pillar of his tombe, to the end the GREEKES should underfland that they had put Epaminondas to death, because he had compelled the THEBANS, against their wils to burn the country of LACONIA, the which in fine hundred yeares before had never once bene spoiled; that he had restored the city of Messina with inhabitants againe, two hundred and thirty yeares after the LACED EMONIANS had laid it wast that he had brought all the people and townes of Arcadia to be as one bodie in league together, and had fet all the GREEKES at liberty: and all these things, said he, we did in our journey. The Judges vnderstanding this worthy and true defence, they all rose from their seates and laughed a good, and would neuer take their bals to ballot against him.

But as for his second accusation, that he had shewed fauour vnto the Laced Emonians Epaninonfor his own particular honour, he would make no answer before the people of THERES to this day refuseh false imputation, but he rose out of the Theater, and passing through the assembly walked into in saferer the parke of exercises. The people being in vprore against him, made no choise of him againe imparation, as they were wont to do, although there was great need: but created other Bastarches to go into THESSALY. And the more (as they thought) to despite Epaminondas, they commanded him to go that voyage as a private fouldier: the which he refused not, but went very willingly, and vpon this occasion. Pelopidas being sent the second time into THESSALY, to make accord betwixtthe people and Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was by this tyrant (not respecting the Pelopidus dignity of an Ambassador, nor of his countrey) made prisoner with Ismenias. Whereupon the imprisoned. THEBAN'S being justly offended, sent thither an army of eight thousand footmen, and five hundred horse, howbeit under the leading of unskilfull Captaines, who wanting judgement to vse the time, thought it good to returne home againe without doing any thing. But as they went their way, Alexander being stronger in horsmen then they, followed them, and gaue charge voon the rere, killed some, and grieuously wounded others. So they knowing neither how to go forward nor backward, were in great distresse, & the rather because their victuals fell shorter enerv day then other. But being now almost out of all hope to retire home with saftetie, Epaminondas being then amongst the foote, was earnestly intreated by the souldiers and Captaines to helpe to redresse this disorder. Thereupon he chose certaine footmen light armed, and all the horse. men, and so falling himself amongst them in the rereward of the army, he so lustily repulsed the enemies, that the rest of the army afterwards marched in great safetie and did so well, fighting at times, making head as occasion served, and keeping his troupes in so good order, that he brought them all away fafe. This act crowned him with a new glory, confounded his ene. mies, and wanne him great honour every where, besides the love and good will of his citizens: who set great fines vpon their Captaines, because they had behaued themselues so cuill in this iourney. Againe, the people feeing that by fo many worthy deeds Epaminondas razed out all the flanders and accusations which his euill willers had vomited out against him : they chose him anew their Captaine generall, to returne into THESSALT with another army. At whose coming all the countrey straight reioyced for the reputation of so great and famous a Captaine. and there wanted little euen to breake this tyrants necke altogether, his friends and Captaines stood in such feare, and his subjects in good mind to rebell, and very joyfull for the hopether had shortly to see the tyrant at one blow well recompensed for all his cursed and wicked deeds he had done long before. Neuertheleffe Epaminondas setting aside the consideration of his honour and glory, in respect of the deliuerance and safety of his friend Pelopidus, and being afraid that Alexander, when he should see his estate in danger to be ouerthrowne. would take reuenge in his madnesse vpon Pelopidas: he purposely drew this warre in length, wheeling about in enery place, refraining to fet on him in earnest, dissembling to make his preparations, and still delaying, because he would prepare and soften the heart of this tyrantby this deuice, not to leave him too much to his bold vnbridled will; neither to stirre vp(to the danger of Pelopidas) the sharpe and inhumane anger of this bloud sucker. Who being a monster. compounded of cruelty and cowardice, was so afraid onely of the name and reputation of Epaminondas, and hanging the wing, as they fay: that he presently sent men vnto him to excuse and iustifiehim. But Epaminondas would not that the THEBANS through his slacknesse should make peace and alliance with fo wicked a man, but onely he was contented to take a truce with him for thirty dayes, taking Pelopidas and Ismenias out of his hands. So with them he returned backe againe to THEBES, and alwaies continued faithfull friendship with Pelopidas, refusing everto haue any part of his goods, but did still perseuere in his wonted simplicity and discipline, Now speaking of this friendship, they report that Epaminondas having committed a man of bale condition for some light fault to prison, Pelopidas prayed him to set the poore man at liberty, but he denied him: and yet afterward being intreated by a woman he kept, he did it at her request, faying that harlots were to be granted fuch requests, not Captaines.

This boldnesse he shewed in all places, and to all men yet mingled with a great sweetnesse, and with a good lively grace: whereof we will bring many examples, besides that he spakeat SPARTA against the LACED EMONIANS & Agesslaus, in the presence of all the commissioners of GRECE. The ARGIANS having made league with the THEBANS, the ATHENIANS fent their Ambassadors into ARCADIA, to see if they could gaine the ARCADIANS to be their friends. So these Ambassadors began roundly and hotly to charge and accuse both the one and the other: insomuch as Callistratus speaking for them, reproued the other two cities ORESTES and OEDI-PVS. Epaminondas being present arthat affembly of counsell, stood vp, and said: My Lords, we confesse that in times past we had a man that killed his father in our city, and in AR GOS one that killed his mother: but for vs, we have driven out of our countrey, and banished all such wicked murtherers, and the Athenians haue received them both. And to the Spartans that had layd many great and grieuous imputations vponthe THERANS: If they have done nothing else, my Lords of Sparta, answered Epaminondas, yet at the least they have made you forgetto speake litle. The ATHENIANS had made league with Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, mortallenemy of the THEBANS, who promifed the THEBANS that he would let them have a pound of flesh for an halfe peny. Epaminondas hearing of it, Well said he, and we will find them wood that shall cost them nothing to seeth this flesh withall: for we will go fell and cut downe all the trees they have in their country, if they goe about to make any alteration other then good. So when he went into Thessaly, and brought backe Pelopidas againe, the Athenians made no great flirre against him: and the tyrant that promised siesh so good cheape, had much ado at that time to keepe his skin whole. But afterwards he had his payment, as you may reade in the latter end of Pelopidas life. But that which did excell in Epaminondas, and did cut the throate of enuy it felfe, was his moderation and temperance, knowing how to vie any state or condition The mode. offered him, & neuer to rage against himselfe nor others, alwaies bearing this mind, that howsoever they tooke him, and in what place focuer they fet him, he was well contented, and all for of Epamis the good of his country: for proofe whereof I will shew you this example. His enill willers on atime thinking to bring him in difgrace, as they fay, for spite they made him superintendant and ouerfeer of al the customes, whilest others his inferiors, vinworthy to be compared to him, were placed in the most honourable offices. This not with standing he despited not this office, but did discharge it very faithfully; for, said he, office or authority sheweth not onely what the man is, but also the man what the office is.

EPAMINONDAS.

But now further: shortly after Epaminondas returne out of THESSALY, the ARCADIANS Were ourcome by Archidamus and the LACEDEMONIANS, and they lost not a man: and therefore this dayes iourney was called for them, the teareleffe battell. Epaminondas for efeeing that the Arcadians should yet have a storme, gave them counsell to fortific themselves; whose counfell they following, they built the towne which afterwards was called MEGALIPOLIS, fimated in a very convenient place. Whilest they made warre with the Elians their neighbours. Epaminondas heart neuer fainted, but his minde was alwaies given to high enterprifes for the good of his country; where being respected and honoured about all others the made an oration vito his citizens, perfwading them to make themfelues ftrong by fea, and to attend the conquest of the principality, making themselves Lords of it. This oration of his had bene long thought of Eloquence before, being full of lively reasons, which did shew and prove vnto them that the enterprise was ble in a cap both honourable and profitable, as well by other arguments he alledged, as also for that he told sains. them it was an easiething for them that were now the stronger by land to make themselves also the strongest by sea: and the rather for that the ATHENIANS in the warre against Xerxes, notwith standing that they had a med and set forth two hundred galleys well appointed with men. they neuertheleffe willingly fubmitted themselves vnto the LACED EMONIANS. So alledging many other reasons to this purpose, he prevailed so much, that the THEBANS inclined to yndertake the enterprise by sea. Thereupon the people gaue present order they should build a hundredgalleys, & withall an arfenall with fo many roomes, to lay them under couert in the docke: and that they should send to them of RHODEs, of CHIO, and of BYZANCE, to pray them to further them in this enterprise. And for this purpose Epaminondas was fent with an army vnto these cities. So in this course he met with Laches, a captaine of the ATHENIANS, and a good number of ships in his fleete, sent of purpose to hinder the intention of the THEBANS. Notwithstan. ding, Epaminondas made him so afraid, that he draue him backe againe: and he holding on his Voyage, brought the cities before named to make league with the THEBANS, who on the other fide were at warre with the city of Or CHOMENE, which had done great hurt and mischiese in their estate. So they having won it by assault, they flue every man that was able to beare armes. and moreouer made all the women and children flaues.

Sometime after Pelopidas death, certaine private men of MANTINEA, fearing to be called to account for their bad behaulours and robberies they had done, if the ARCADIANS & ELIANS fell to agreement: they practifed so, that they raised vp a new quarrell within the countrey deuided into two factions, of the which the MANTINEANS were chiefe of the one fide, and the quarrell be-TEGEATES on the other part. This quarrell went fo farre, that the parties would try it by twint the Mantiness armes. The TEGEATES, they fent to demandaide of the THEBANS, who choic Epaminon- and the Tedas their Captaine generall, and fent him with a good number of men of warre to aide the TE- genes. CEATES. The Mantineans aftonied at this aide coming out of Boe ot 14 to their enemies. and at the reputation of this Captaine: they immediatly sent vnto the Athenians and Lage DEMONIANS, the greatest enemies of the BOROTIANS for aide, which both the cities granted. Wherupon there fell out often and many great skirmishes indiuerse parts of Peropone sys. Epaminondas being not far off MANTINEA, understood by the same country men, that Agesilaus and the LACED EMONIANS were come into the field, & that they wasted althe territory of the

TEGEATES. Whereupon imagining straight that there were few men left in the city of Spare TA to defend it, he went about a great exploit, and a wonderfull stratageme of a man of warre. and had brought it to passe, if the maruellous great good fortune of Sparta had not hindred it. So he departed from TEGRA by night, the MANTINEANS knowing nothing of it, and taking another way then Agesilaus, he had taken Sparta without one stroke striken, but fora post of Candia that with speed brought Agestians word of it: who forthwith sent out a horseman to give them intelligence that were left at Sparta, that they should beware they were not surprised vpon the sudden: and he himselfe came speedily after, and arrived there a litle before the THEBANS coming thither: who being very neare the city by breake of day. gaue affault to them that were within to defend the towne. Then Agefilais bestirred him throughly, beyond the power of an old man. But his sonne Archidamus, and Isadas the sonne of Phabidas, fought valiantly on all parts. Epaminondas feeing the Spartans in order of battell, began then to mistrust that his enterprise was discouered. This notwithstanding, he left not off to force them all he could, albeit he fought with great difaduantage for the inconuenience of the places he occupied: and continued alwaies couragiously doing and recei. uing hurt, vntill the army of the LACED EMONIANS came on, and the night also: where upon he made them found the retraite. Now he being aduertifed that the MANTINEANS came on also with their forces, he drew his troupes somewhat further off the towne, and there camped. After that he caused his men to refresh themselves with victuals, and hauing left certaine horsemen in the campe, he commanded them to make fires in the morning, and he himselfe went in the meane space, to surprise those that remained at MANTINEA before any man wift he was gone. Neuertheleffe he failed of his purpose, albeit he had forethought him of all misfortunes that any man possible could have considered in so weighty a cause. But the prosperity of the THERANS was come to his height, and the course of Epaminondas life drawing neare to an end, would very shortly deprine GRECE of this noble and famous perfon, from whom was taken a most notable victory, and that twife, by a most strange accident. For at this second time, when he was neare vnto MANTINEA, left without guard and defence on the other fide of the towne there arrived fix thousand Athenians led by their Captain Heele eus: who having put sufficient force into the towns, he ordered all the rest in battell without the towne wals, as though he meant to have fought a field: and immediately after them came also the LACED EMONIANS and MANTINEANS together, who prepared themselves to put all to the hazard of a battell, and therefore fent for their allies out of all parts. They were in all five and twenty thousand footmen, and two thousand horse. The Arcadians, Bobotians, and their partakers, made the number of thirty thousand footmen and about, and three thousand horse, First the horsemen charged with so great furie as was possible, insomuch as the horsemen of the ATHENIANS finding § THEBANS in front, were the weaker; not because they were less valiant and hardy then the other, but because they had not so good leaders, and had few archers among their troupes. The THEBANS on the other fide they were wel appointed, & specially of THES-SALIANS amongst others, men very skilfull in their bowes, who so plied the Athenians, that they brake them, and put them all to rout. Yet they did not flie amongst their footmen which made them somewhat recourt heir honour they had lost by running away, and all because they had not broken the rankes of their allies. On the cotrary part, as they fled they met with certain troupes of fouldiers of NEGROPONT, whom the ARCADIANS fent to take in certaine hils hard by the plaine where the battell was fought, and they put them all to the fword. The men atarmes of the Theban's feeing them turnetheir backes, did not pursue them at all, but gaue charge vpon a great battalion of footmen, forcing them all they could to breake & run through them: fo the fight was very cruell and sharpe, but in the end the ATHENIAN's left the place. This notwithstanding, the Colonell of the horsemen of the Elians being appointed for the safety of the reregard, defended them, and comming to the encounter of the Borotan's herefilted them, and made them speedily give backe: and this reformed the fault againe of the left point of their army. But in the right point, after the horsemen had charged one vpon another, the fight was foone tried. For, by reason of the great number of the men at armes of the THEDAN'S and THESSALIANS, the partakers of the Mantineans were presently put to rout, and after they had lost a great number of their men, they succoured themselves about y battalion of their footmen. And this was the fucceife of the fight of the horsemen. As touching the battalion of the

footmen, after they came once to the fword, it was a maruellous bloudy and most cruell fight; for neuer before that time was there so great number of GREEKES in battell one against the other, nor so great Captaines, nor of better fighting and more valiant men. The two nations that at that time bare the name to be the brauest souldiers for footmen of althe world, to wit, the THEE ANS, and LACED EMONIANS, they were set in front in the battel one directly against the other. So y first began to charge, neither sparing life nor limme. The first charge they gaue was with their pikes, which being broken by force of the great blowes they gaue to each other, the they fought with their swords, and laying about them body to body, there was no kind of slashing and wounding but they both gave and received; and neither part shrunke nor gave over, but flucke to it manfully. And so continuing this dangerous fight along time, by reason of the valiantnesse of either sides the victory stood doubtfull a great while, and could hardly be judged Adoubtful which fide were like to haue the vpper hand. For every one that fought had this resolution in fight. hisheart, not to feare death what soeuer hapned : but rather desiring to make proofe of the va. lour of his person, worthily gaue his life in prey, to win honour in exchange. By reason whereof, though the fight was most sharpe and violent, the euent of it remained a long space betwixt two irons, not to be discerned of whether side the victory should fall. Vntill such time as Epaminondas seeing that there was no remedy, but that the resolution of this doubtfull fight depended vpon his owne vertue and valour: he resolued with himselse to venter his life vpon it. Sohe presently gathered about him all the best and choise men of his army, and of them having made a company of resolute men, he ran with great furie into the greatest presse of all the enemies, marching himselfethe foremost man before his troupe, with a speare in his hand, with the which at the first blow he gaue, he slue the captain of the LACED EMONIANS, straight way the other began to affaile their enemies. But Epaminondas killed so many in the place with his owne hands, and did so terrifie the others, that at the last he opened the battell of his enemies, and layed on them so lustily, that they not able any longer to defend themselues against the valotous force of himselfe and his followers, were enforced to give backe, and to leave the place to the Bo fotians: who were straight at their heeles, beating and following them so eagerly that in a short space all the field was coucred with dead bodies, lying on heapes one vpon another. But in the end, the LACED EMONIANS feeing they could by no meanes faue then selucs, because Epaminondas followed them so neare (given over too much to his passionate counge) they gathered a troupe together, and running all on heapes they fet vpon him, throwing infinit numbers of darts at him, of the which he put by some, and received others upon his target: but yet there were many that flucke in his body, which he pulled out himselfe, and with the selfe same weapons fought with them that had throwne them at him. At the last, when he had fought more then a man, and beyond all the force a man could vie to give his countrey the victory: a LACONIAN called Anticrates thrust him into the breast with a dart with such a Epaninos force, that the wood brake, and the iron with the tronchion remained in his body. Having wounded. received this great wound, he suddenly fell downero the ground: but then was there a wore cruell fight about him then before, with great flaughter of both sides: vntill that the Thebans which had much stronger bodies then the LACED EMONIANS, made them slie for life; and after they had followed them a little way, they returned againe to the campe where the battell was fought, to the end they might have the dead bodies in their power, and so the whole victory. Thereupon they founded the retraite, and thus the battell cealed, for the which both of them fee Vptokens of triumph, either fide pretending they had the better. For the ATHENIANS having overthrowne those of Negroport and their adherents which were sent to take the hils of that plaine: they kept the bodies in their power. The THEBANS on the other fide having overcome the Spartans, had the bodies of those that were dead in that battell in their power. being the farre greater number also: wherefore they said that they were victours. So standing inthese termes, it was a good while before they sent trumpeter or herauld the one to the other, tobury their dead: untill that the LACED EMONIANS sent first of all, and then they all tooke their dead bodies and buried them. And furthermore, he that had killed Epaminondas was fo wel thought of, and highly effeemed for this valiant act of his, for the great feare all the Spartans had had of Epaminondas in time past: that they gave him many great presents and honours, and besides, made those that came after him free from all publike charges and contributions in the common wealth. And Plutarch also said, that in his time one Callicrates, a nephew of Anticrates aboue named, did then enjoy that freedome. Touching Epaminondas, he was brought yet alive into his tent: howbeit the physicions and surgeons being called together to dresse him, they all agreed, that so soone as ever they pulled out the head and splent of the dart out of his body, he must needs die. So he made a most worthy and noble end of his life: for first he called for his target-bearer, who was alwaics at his hand in battell, and asked him, Is my target fafe : He brought it straight to shew it him. Then he asked who had the victory: The Bo EOTIANS, faid the target-bearer. Then he commanded they should bring him Diophantus and Iolidas : butbeing told they were both dead, he willed his citizens to make peace with their enemies, for that now they had no more Captaines of skill to leade them to the warres. Adding further to that aboue spoken, It is now time I die, and so commanded them to plucke this spell of the dartout of his body. At that word all his friends about him fetched grieuous fighes and cried out; and one of them weeping, said vnto him: Alas Epaminondas, thou diest now, and leauest no children behindthee. No that I do not, faid he: but I leave two faire daughter behind me, whereof the one is the victory of LEVETRES, and the other that of MANTINEA. Immediatly they pelled out the spell of the dart, and at that instant he gaue up the ghost, without shewing any figne or token that he was troubled in his mind. And thus did he embrace that bleffed death: that fortuning vnto him which he often had in his mouth; that warre is the bed of honour, and also that it is a sweete death to die for his countrey. Now may we well see, that he excelled all the Captainesthat ener were before him, did accompany, or follow him. For who focuer would compare all their vertues with the deeds and glory of Epaminondas, he shall see that the vertue of him was more noble and excellent, then any of theirs. For in them will appeare at the first fight fome speciall thing more eminent then all the rest, which hath made their same great and glorious: but in this man onely were joyned together all the vertues and good parts that could be wished for in grave, politicke, and a great Captaine, to make him perfect and complete in all things. For in the liberall sciences, in experience, ripe vnderstanding, force of eloquence, strength of body, disposition of his person, in height and greatnesse of courage, in temperance, wisedome, watching, sweetnesse and courtesse: and moreouer in hardinesse, prowesse, good iudgement, and sufficiencie in military discipline: I know not where there is to be found so compleate a man. For my opinion, I compare Epaminondas to himself. Also in his time he wanto his country by force of armes, the principality of GREECE: but after his death his citizens loft it immediatly, and fell daily to decay: that at the last Alexander the Great vtterly ouercame them, made them that were aliue flaues, and destroyed their city to the very ground. To conclude, before, and after Epaminondas, THEBES was under foote, and yet commanded all others whiles he stood on his feete. And so we must conclude, that THEBES was vtterly ouerthrowne in the battell of MANTINEA, and that Epaminondas at that time wan an immortall glory. And as in his life time he had caried himfelfe modestly, and alwaies detested couetousnesses.

so after his decease the THEBANS brought him to his graue at the common charge of the towne, because they found no money in his house to defray the least charges of his funerall.

Philip: that wisedome booteth not at all, Which Corning instice, hopes to clime on high. Let Princes that behold thy sudden fall, Loue right and meekeneffe, left like thee they die.

Myntas, the second of that name, and seventeenth King of MACEDON, Philips po. of the race of Temenides or Caranides, descended from Hercules, and that degree, reigned foure hundred and ninety eight yeares, reckoning from Caranus vnto Antipater, in whom began another race: he had three sonnes by his first wife called Eurydice, borne in ILLYRIA: to wit, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip. Alexander having succeeded his father, reigned but one yeare, during which time he made warre with his base brother Ptolomaus Alorites. But to appeale the strife betwixt them, they sent for Pelopidas, who was atthattime in THESSALIE. Hetookevp all their quarrels, restored those that were banished ento their houses, and (because this peace should be more surely kept) he tooke of them for hostages, Philip, and thirty other of the noblest Philips mens fonnes in MACEDON, and brought them all away with him to THEBES. Now during the frace with time that Perdiccas reigned, which was the space of five yeares, Philip kept at Pammenes house, 30. others. with whom Epaminondas was very great: and hereofit came, that some thought Philip was a hearer of Lysis Epaminondas schoolemaster, and that they conferred together in Philosophie. Howbeit Epaminondas was then much older then he, and furely it can hardly be that they were scholers together: except they will say that Epaminondas continuing all his life time to profit by the study of wisedome, made Philip desirous to heare him sometime, and to follow him also. And it may be well inough also that he had learned of Epaminondas to be so quicke and sudden of execution in the wars, as he was: which was but one of the least parts of Epaminondas vertues. But as for his continencie, iustice, magnanimity, and elemency, which were the parts that intruth made him great: Philip, neither by nature, nor by education, nor by study, ever attained vnto it: for all this, he wanted not great gifts of body and mind, as shall appeare in the discourse of his life: and as Theophrastus testifieth, he was greater then any other of the kings of MACE-DON, not only in prosperity of fortune, but also in wisedome, bounty, and moderation of man-Acts. So it came to paffe that Alexander, notwithftanding the accord Pelopidas had made, was traiteroufly killed by Ptolomy furnamed Alorites, who vfurped the kingdome, and was flainehim: selse by Perdiccas: who after he had bene ouercome in a great battell by the SLAVONS, in the which he was flaine: Philip which was the last of the three brethre, stealing away from the place where he was in hostage, fled into MACEDON, and came to succeed in the kingdome, the which he found in great trouble. For there were flaine at the last battell about four thousand MACE. DONIANS, and those that escaped were so beaten and astonied with blowes, that they thought of nothing leffe then to take armes against the SLAVONS. On the other side the HVNGARIANS made inrodes into Macedon, and the SLAVONs mustered agains to return thither. There was one Paufanias also that aspired to the kingdome, by the support of the king of THRACIA. And the Athenians also, they would establish one called Argans, and to this end sent a great fleete by sea, and three thousand footmen well armed by land, led by Mantias. Philip taking heart to him in these rude beginnings, began to embolden the MACEDONIANS by wile perswasions; he reestablished military discipline, furnished his souldiers very well, making them armethem felues, and gaue order they should be continually trained and exercised. It was he that amongst other things deuised how to close his footmen, and that framed the square battell, which cuer fince was called the Macedonian Phalange. He was very gracious in his words, and by his promises and gifts he wan the hearts and good will of his subjects.

Now finding himselfestrong, although he was yet but young of yeares, he resolued to make head against all his enemies, yet not by open force, but where there was need: being alwaies of this mind, to buy time and men as much as he could possible. So perceiving that the ATHENI-ANS did their vitermost indevor to win the city of Amphipolis againe, & that by this meanes they fought to bring the kingdome of MACRDON into the hands of Argaus: he made them leaue it, and thrust out their garrisons. As for the Pannonians (others reade P.E. NIANS) OF HV NOARIANS, having fent ambaffadors to them, he corrupted some with money. and wan others by faire promifes: infomuch that they were all contented to liue in peace with him. And by the same meanes he brake the hope of Pausanias, having by presents gained the king of THRACIA that aided him. And for the regard of Mantias captaine of the ATHENIANS. he marched with his army vnto the city of Methona: but he remained there, and fent Argam with the fouldiers strangers whom they had brought with them, vnto the city of ÆGES. Argaus approching neare the towne with his troupe, lent to feele the inhabitants, if they would receiue him, and be the first that should be cause of his entrie into the possession of the kingdome of Macedon. But perceiuing they cared not for him, he returned againe. Philip that followed him hard at his heeles gaughim battell, killed the most part of his men, and drauethe rest vnto a little mountaine, where he besieged them so straightly, that they were forced to deliver him all the banished men of Machdon amongst them: whereupon he let them goe their lives and goods faued. This first victory of Philip put the MACEDONIANS againe in heart, and made them bold to enterprise any thing afterwards. Hereupon he made peace with the ATHENIANS, and understanding that the king of Hungarie was dead, he entred into their country with a maine army, ouercame them in battell, and made them subject vnto him. Of all his enemies there were left none but the SLAVONIANS, whom he went to affaile with ten thoufand footmen, and fixe hundred horse. But fince they could not agree together, Bardyllis their king trusting in the victories he had gotten before time of the MACEDONIANS, and in the valiantnesse of his SLAVONS, he came into the field and presented battell. The which having bene fought a long time, Philip behaued himselfe so valiantly with his men of armes the Maca-DONIANS, that he ouerthrew the SLAVONS, leauing feuen thousand of them dead on the ground and the restescaped by flying away. Shortly after they were agreed together, and restored to Philip all the places they held pertaining vnto Macedon. Now the Amphipoli-TANS had of long time borne Philip cuill will, and whilest he was occupied in other places, they did him many iniuries: wherefore he determined to make a sharpe war vpon them. He hauing befieged them with a puissant army, and having brought his engines of war hard to their wals, he beat them with such furie, that he made a sufficient breach, and entred the towne by force: out of the which he draue those afterwards that were his enemies, and very courteously vsed and intreated the rest. This towne being seated in a very commodious place, vpon the frontiers of THRACIA, and of the countries neare adioyning thereto, stood him afterwards in great stead for the furtherance and increase of his greatnesse. For by meanes of that he presently had the city of PYDNE, and made league with the OLYNTHIANS, of great power at that time: by reason whereof he and the ATHENIANS enuying one the other, they both practised to winne them. But Philip having wonne Potibea, draue out the garrifon of the Athenians, and vied them very honeftly: for he fent them home to their houses, their lines and goods saued, not be- The policie cause he loued the people of ATHENS, but for that he feared the power of their city. After he of Think had taken in the city of Py DNE, he gaue it to the OLYNTHIANS, with altheterritory belonging vnto it. Then he returned to CRENIDES, the which he having augmented with a great number of inhabitants, he changed the first name of it, and called it by his own name, PHILIPPI. Within that territory he had mynes of gold, the which he opened and digged fo diligently, that he drew out yearely new made, about the fumme of fix hundred thousand crownes. By this means in ashort time hee gathered together a great treasure, and dayly the kingdome of MACEDON grew great, because it had one of the chiefest finewes and props of war. So he coyned a number of peeces of gold called Philippus, where with he waged a great number of men, and bribed many private GR BEKS: who afterwards fold him for ready mony the townes of their country. as we shall see hereafter. In all this businesse, Alexander the tyrant of PHERES in THESSALY, having bene slaine by his wife Thebe, and by her brethren called Lycophron, and Tisiphonus, at the first they were honoured as menthat had deliuered their countrey of a cruell tyranny: but very shortly after, these two men changing their mindes, by money wanne the souldiers whom Alexander kept for the guard of his person, & put themselues in his place whom they had killed. putting many citizens to death that withflood their enterprise; and having gathered together a great number of fouldiers, they made themfelues Lords of Pheres. The Allevades, men of authority, and greatly followed in the countrey for the ancient nobility of their house, would haue opposed themselues against this new tyranny. But finding themselues to be too weak, they made meanes to Philip: who entring into THESSALY with his army ouercame the two tyrants. and fetting the townes at liberty which these tyrants held in subjection, he shewed great loue and fauour to the Thessalians. By which occasion, in all his conquests he obtained afterwards. he found the THE SSALIANS alwaies ready to do him feruice, and to aide him in all his affaires, and not himselfe alone, but also his sonne Alexander. But the greatnesse of Philip grieued his greatnesse neighbours, infomuch as the kings of THRACIA, HVNGARIA, and SLAVONIA, not being ftrong "muied at. enough of themselues, they to yned forces together to make warre vpon him, and to be reuenged. Whilest they were preparing to joyne their forces, Philip went before, and compelled them to do what he would.

after the battell of MANTINEA, the holy war began amongst the GREEKES, which continued bolywar. ten yeares space; and this was the occasion. The THEBANS not being contented with the victory they obtained at the battell of Levetres, framed a complaint against the Laced MONIANS in the affembly of the Estates of GREECE which they call the Councell of the Amphietyons: and followed the matter so hard, that the LACED EMONIANS were condemned in a great summe ofmony because they had in time of peace surprised the castle of CADMEA. The PHOCIANS alfo, they having plowed vp a great deale of a certaine land facred to the gods, called the land of CIRRHE, were condemned by the Amphietrons in a great fumme of money; and because they would not pay it, the Councell pronounced, without longer delay and refufall, all their townes and lands to be confiscated to the gods, and that all other which were condemned (of which number were the LACED EMONIANS) should be compelled to pay their fines, and if they refufed, they should be taken for excommunicate, and the other GREEK'S should make warre with them as against accursed and execrable men. Philomelus, a man of great authority among the PHOCIAN'S, did fo much, that he perfeaded them not to pay it, but contrariwife to defend their country with armes, and to win \mathbf{D}_{ELPHE} s. Whereunto they giving their confents he gathered together a great army, and in despight of all hindrances made himselfe master of Delement significant alunder with sheares the decrees made by the Amphityons engrauen vpon marble pillars; posses. icd all the gold and filuer that was in the Temple; and afterwards rendred a reason of his fact, & bare the ATHENIANS, and partly for the hatred he had to Philip the people of ATHENS fenting habitants thither to keepe and defend the towns. Philip perceiving that those of Methone len out their towne to all them that would make war against him, went & laid siege before it. They that were befieged, did valiantly defend it for a time; but in the end finding themselves too weak to make refistance, they yeelded upon condition, that the inhabitants should go out every man with one only gowne. As soone as ever Philip had the towne in his hands, he razed it even to the ground, and gaue the country alabout vnto the Macedonians. At this fiege he was wounded with an arrow, that put out one of his eyes. Afterwards he led his army also at y instance of the THESSALIANS, into the country against Lycophron, that began again to tyrannize those of PHE. RES: who having demanded aid of the PHOCIANS, they fent thither Phayllus with 7000 fighting men, whom Philip ouercame, and draue them out of THESSALY. Then Onomarchus that fucces. ded Philomelus in the charge of generall, hoping to have won THESSALY, made great speed this ther with al his army vnder colour to bring aid vnto Lycophron. Philip went against him with the THESSALIANS, but because Onomarchus had the greater number of men, he ouerthrew him, and killed many of the Macedonians, infomuch that Philip himselfe was in great danger. For his menalfo were fo afraid, that they would have for faken him, and he had much trouble to keepe them together; and in the end was constrained to retire home into his kingdome. Onomarchus departing from thence, entred into the country of Bo BOTIA, ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battel, & took the city of Coronea. But Philip returned immediatly with a great force into THES. SALY to drine out Lycophron: who having called in the PHOCIANS, Onomarchus returned thither, followed with 20 thousand footmen, and fine hundred horse. Hereupon Philip perswaded the commons of THESSALY, that they must all together undertake this war. And he could so well folicite them, that he affembled in one camp twenty thousand footme, & three thousand horse, Then was there fought a most cruell battell, whereof the victory fell to Philip, through the vali. antnesse of his THESSALIAN men of armes. For Onemarchus and his men, they fled on foote towards the sea, where was by chance Chares the ATHENIAN captaine failing all alongst the coast with certaine gallies. There was great flaughter of $PHOCIANS there, followed by the victors. Others to flie with more speed, threw downe their armes, and leapt into the sea, by swimming to get to the gallies of the ATHENIANS. There were flaine in battell and flight as wel of natural Phocians, as of strangers that came for pay, aboue six thousand me, & there were taken prisoners to the number of three thousand: Onomarchus that was one of them, was hanged, and all the other drowned as facriledgers, by the commandement of Philip: vnto whom Lycophron yeelded the towne of Pheres, & fo retired out of Thessaly, which by this meanes was fet at liberty.

As for Philip, he marched with his army towards the way of THERMOPYLES, to make war with y Phocians, within Phocide it selfcibut the Athenians stopped his passage. Wherfore he was constrained to returne back into MACEDON, where he staid not long at rest, but determined to bring the towns of CHALCIDE in subjection to him. So he took by affault a fort called Gyre, the which he razed. But this was fuch a terror to the other small towns, that they put themselues under his obedience. Passing from thence into THESSALY, he draue away Pytholaus that had made himselfe master of PHERES. And intending to bring the towns of HELLESPONT vnder his subjection, he tooke in without paine or danger (rather by treason) the rownes of Mi-CYEERNE, & of TORONE. Afterwards he went with a great army against the city of OLYNTHE, the greatest & of most power that was in that marches; where first he ouercame y Olynthians in two great fights, so that he made them leave the field, & shut them in within their own town, vnto the which he gaue many affaults, and loft a great number of his menthere. But having with great sums of mony corrupted Euthicrates & Lasthenes gouernors of the towne, at the length he had it by treason: and having sacked it, he sold the towns-men for slaves by the drum. The taking of this towne, brought him a great quantity of filuer to help to defray the charges of his war, & did also make the other towns afraid, which had taken armes to resist him. Now after he had bestowed many rich presents vpon his Captaines and souldiers that had done him good service in this war, he gaue also all about great sums of mony to the heads of the townes, and found merchants also among them that sold him their owne country and fellow citizens: insomuch that he himselfe confessed he had enlarged his kingdome more through gold and silver, then hedid by force of armes: according to an answer that was made him, when he began first to put himfelfe forward: for being desirous to know how he should carie himselfe, the oracle answered:

With filuer speares begin and end thy warre,

So shalt thou topsie turny turne all things what ere they are. Now the ATHENIAN'S being icalous of his greatnesse, did euer helpe them whom he would stille dehurt, and fent Ambassadors to all the cities, to perswade them to maintaine and preserve their thoriests. liberty, and to put their townes-men to death whom they found willing to betray the Common-wealth: promifing them to ayde them all, and declared themselves open enemies vnto Philip. Hee that fet them most against him, was Demosthenes, the most eloquent man of all The force of GRECE at that time, and that did more trouble and hurt Philip with the blowes of his tongue, and his continual motions, then all the Captaines of GREECE did him besides. All this notwithflanding, with all the diligence and labour ATHEN'S could vie, they could neuer bridle the wicked disposition of some private persons, but they still sought to sell their countrey: for he that bought, fowed filuer without any spare, and there were a great number of traitors at that time through all GREECE. And touching this purpose, they say, that he being desirous to win avery strong hold, he sent some men before to view it: who returning, reported that it was vnpossible almost to approach it, and did by description set it downe in all points impregnable. Then he asked the if the place were so hard to come to, that a poore Asseladen with gold could not come neare it: for hee had oftentimes with filter very eafily wonne that, which otherwife was not to be had by force of armes. And this was the cause that he practifed to have traitors in enery towne by gifts and penfions, calling them that received him, his hoftes and friends. corrupting mens manners besides by vnworthy and dishonest meanes. As after that hee had wonne OLYNTHE, he made sumptuous and magnificent facrifices to his gods, to thanke them for the victory they had given him: and so having set downe a day of triumph for tilting and tourneying, and common sports, thither repaired a great number of strangers that came to see the feast. So keeping open Court, he inuited many of these strangers to come to his sumptuous feasts he made, and in them he shewed all the familiarity and courtesie that might be to entertaine them. For he dranke to fome, and then gaue them the cups wherein he dranke to them: to others he gaue great presents, and vnto al generally he gaue good words and large promises; infomuch that many fought how to obtaine his love and favour. So it is reported, that one day atabanquet he espied Satyrus, an excellent Comedian and player, that he was very fad: and that heasked him why he did not craue fomething of him, that he might shew his liberality vnto him. Satyrus answered him againe, that he would be glad to obtaine a suite at his hands, but he durst not aske it him, being afraid he should be denied. Philip liked his answer well, and bad him aske boldly. Then he told him, that a friend of his had two daughters among others prisoners, both of them mariageable, and befought him that hee would bestow them vpon him; not for any other pleasure or profit he should have of them, but because he would marrie them both at his owne charge, before they should be forced to their dishonour. Philip thanked him for his honest petition, and presently caused these two maides to be deliuered vnto him. Thus he be-meanes to deliuertownes and countries into his hands. But now to return again to that we had begun to speake of the holy war. The Phocians that had three very strong holds in Boeotia, to wit, Orchomene, Coronee, & Corsies, did ordinarily from thence make incursions into the countrey of the Boeotians, with great number of fouldiers strangers whom they kept in pay, and did burne & lay wast all the territory thereabouts, and euer had the vpper hand in all their inrodes and skirmishes they had with the countrymen. Vpon this occasion the Borotians being weake of men, and wanting money, fent in the end to demaund aid of Philip: who was not a little glad to fee them brought fo low, for he defired their pride might he pulled downe, which had lift them vp to high fince the battel of Levetre es. So he sent them a good number of souldiers, not for any desire he had to aide them, but to make them thinke that he made great account of the Temple of DELPHES, which Hyporifice. the PHOCIAN'S had spoyled. After diversexploits of warre, the one side and the other seeing themselues wearie and bare, the Bobotians prayed Philip to come and ayde them: which he granted them: and taking a supply of Thessalians with him, he came to Lockide with a goodarmy, and put himselse in order to end this warre at one battell. of the Phocians, finding himselfe not frong enough to fight with him fent vnto him to treate of peaces fo he was suffered to go safely with his men whither he would. Whereupon under the affurance of this peace, he retired with eight thousand men into Peloponnesvs. The Phoch-ANS then left without all hope, yeelded themselves to Philips discretion. Thus having ended this holy war without froke firicken, beyond all mens opinion, he called a Councell of the Boso-TIANS and THESSALIANS in the which it was determined that there should be an assembly of Parliament of the Amphietyons, vnto whom they would wholy referre themselues for deciding of this matter. Whereupon the Commissioners for the Parliament of the Amphieryons were all fembled, and there among other acts it was ordained, that from thenceforth it should be lawfull for Philip and all of his race to fit in this Councell of the Amphietyons, and that they should have the two voices which the Phocians (by him lately conquered) had before. Also, that he & his thenceforth should have the government and superintendancie of the sports PYTHIANS, with the Bogotians and Thessalians: because the Corinthians had bene partakers with the facriledge of the Phocians. The rest of their decrees concerned those of Phocians at the safety of the temple of Delphes, and the vnion of the Greekes. Philip having broken vp the armo. ries of the Phocians and of the strangers that had fought in their pay, he defaced their townes, and made them fell their horses. After he had received of the Amphicityons the greatest honour and thankes they could deuife, he returned into his realing of MACEDON, having won him the name of a deuout and valiant Prince, and layed the foundation of the greatnesse, vnto the which his sonne Alexander came afterwards. For he singularly defired to be chosen Captaine generall of all GREBCE, with full power and authority to make war with the king of PERSIA. as he did. Furthermore, the hereditary quarrels he had against the SLAVON'S, being as irreconciliable, he entred with his army into SLAVONIA, where having spoyled a great part of that country, and taken many townes, he returned backe into Mac E D on laden with booty. After that he went into THESSALY, and draue out the tyrants there, which held the townes in subjection. By this meanes he wannethe hearts of the THESSALIANS, whom indeed he had great care to vie well hoping that if the THESSALIANS remained his faithfull friends, he should cassly gaine the other GREEK'S to defire his friendship. & so it hapned for the people neighbours to Thes-SALY, did prefently enter into league with him. Soone after that, he led his army into Thracia to represse Cersobleptes, who troubled all the townes of Hellespont next adiopning to his realme. When he had beaten the THRACIAN'S in divers encounters, he compelled the vanquifled to pay yearely vnto the Macedonians the tenth part of their revenues; and forrifying a few good townes in the best parts of their countrey, he bridled the boldnesse of these barbarous people: whereupon the townes within those marches being deliuered from warres, they very willingly entred into league and alliance with Philip. Thus waxing greater every day then other, he held his army before the city of Perinth, be. cause that stood against him, and tooke part with the ATHENIANS. So he layd siege vnto it, and brought his engines of battery before it, among the which there were rams of 80. foot long, and built vp towers of wood higher then the highest towers of stone that were within the towne: vpon the top whereof he maruelloufly annoyed the befreged; and battering the wals with these rammes, he made them fall downe in divers places. The Perinthians on the other fide very luftily defended them felues, and reared vp other walles within, in place of them that were fallen downe. He plyed them continually with wonderfull affaults, the affailants and affailed shewing all their possible force and endeuour. Now Philip had great Crosse-bowes and other engines of all forts to kill farre off, great arrowes long and sharpeat the end, which did wound those that came to the cranewes of the walles; and those that were besieged, lost many of their men cuery day. But at the length they were supplied with armes and men, whom the BYZANTINES fent vnto them: whereupon equalling their enemics, they beganne to be couragious againe, and resolutely offered themselues vnto any danger for defence of their countrey. For all this, the battery begundiscontinued not, and Philip deuiding his men into divers troupes, gave them many affaults, continued by turnes one in the necke of another night and day. Which hee might cafily do, confidering he had thirty thousand fighting men in his campe, with an inestimable number of missile weapons, with engines to bestow great shot a farre off, and of all sorts of engines to beate downe townes, with the which he wonderfully plagued and hurt the befieged. Neuerthelesse the siege drew on inlength, and many of the townes-men died, besides those that were hurt and wounded: and because that victuals also waxed scantamones them: fothat they hourely looked for no other thing, but to take PERINTH. But it fell out cleane contrary: for the fame of Philips greatnesse being blowne abroad throughout all As 14, the king of Perinth Parsia being affraid of such a power, writ vnto his Lieutenants vpon the sea coasts, that the Persan they should aide the Perinthians all they could possible. Thereupon his Sattapes having confulted of this matter together, fent vnto the befieged agreat supply of men of warr, store of gold and filuer, plenty of corne, of armes, and of all other necessarie prouisions for the warres. The BYZANTINES on the other fide fent them the best experienced Captaines and fouldiers they had. By this meanes the two forces of the befiegers and the befieged being equal I ofnew againe, the warre began to be hotter then before. For Philip beating at the walles without cease with his rammes, made very great breaches, and with his engines to shoote farre off, kept them that none durst stay at the cranewes of the walles: and at one instant made his men to give an affault at the breaches of the walles throwne downe, and caused others to scale the walles that were yet standing whole, and so fighting with their swords, many were slaine in the place, and others fore wounded, both valiantly fighting for the reward of honour and victory. The MACEDONIANS hoped to have the facke of a rich and wealthy city, and more then that, to have goodly presents of the King. They that were besieged on the other side, setting before them all the calamities and miferies of the taking of a citie, did luftily endure any paines and danger to preuent fo great a mischiefe. Besides that, the situation of the towne was a great helpe vnto them, not onely to hope well, but also that in the end they should be masters. For the towne of Perinth flood all vponthe fea fide, vpon a hauen of halfe an Iland that flood of a great height, and this hauen was about halfe a quarter of a league long. The houses there were very narrow and high, and because they stood high vpon the hanging of the coast all the towne being underneath it on the ground, they were built much higher then those that stood beneath: foto fee them aboue, they shewed like y degrees of scates in a Theater. And although that they without did still beate downe some part of the wall: that vantaged them nothing for all that. For those within did nothing else but mure vp the entrance into the streetes which were narrow. and they alwaies defended themselues, making rampiers before the low houses, as if they had bene the best wals in the world.

So Philip having gotten the outward walles of the towne, with all the troubles and dangers Philip bepossible: he found other walles ready built stronger then the other, as if they had bene done Byzantines ofpurpose: besides that the BYZANTINE'S did alwaies furnish them with any thing they wanted, Philip confidering this, devided his army into two, and left the halfe of them to continue the them of Pesiege, under the charge of the best captaines he had:and taking with him the other halfe, he went to befrege Byzanc E it felfe, & gaue it a most braue affault: whereat y Byzantines were amazed, because their souldiers, their armes, and all other necessary prouisions for war were in the city of Perinth But the Athenians fent them immediatly an army by sea to aide them as alforthose did of Chio, of Rhodes, and our of other places. Chares went thither, sent by the ATHENIANS, buthe did nothing of worth, nor worthy of the fleet he brought thither; because he was suspected of his friends, and despised of his enemies. So that they sent Phocion thither. Phocion a who before that time had fought brauely with Philip in the Ile of Evbora, (which he thought to have won by means of traitors) had overcome the Macedonians in battel, & had done many other notable exploits. Howbeit after his departure Philip being the stronger, departing from thence came to befrege PBRINTH, and after that BYZANCE, into the which Physion entred with his troupes: who did so valiantly in all fights and affaults, that Philip (who before that time was thought fo terrible in armes that none could refift him, neither durft any man present himselfe in battel against him) rose from the besieging of PERINTH, and retired from BYZANCE and our Philip raise of HELLESPONT, and did nothing, but lost much of his reputation. For, besides the menthat were killed at these two sieges, he lost some of his ships, and many strong holds, out of the some and which his countries. which his garrifons were throwne, and his friends forraged by the Athenians. This was loft. the cause why hee offered articles of peace, fearing the forces of the ATHBNIANS, desirous to forward his affaires fome other way, or rather to meddle no more with them. Phocion counfelled the ATHENIAN'S to hearken vnto it, and to accept the conditions vnto the which Philip submitted himself. But the Counsellers (especially Demosthenes) that bare the sway at that time, moued the ATHENIANS to a new league, the which Demostheres prepared against Philip: who

The Greeks refuse the peace offe-red by Phibethinking himselfe, determined to employ all his meanes to subdue the cities all at once, to the end that he might afterwards passe further. So he leavied an army with great speed, and having ouercome certaine troupes of the townes in league together neare vnto AMPHISE, he marched into the country of ELATIA, and afterwards wan PHOCIDE; and being lift vp with such profperous beginnings, he refolued to go to ATHENS. Whereof the ATHENIANS having intelligence, they were straight in armes enery where, the people being so amazed, that none durstbe fo bold as to speake, and they knew not what to do. They rejected the wise counsell of Photion. of which Demosthenes was the cause. Wherefore to repaire his fault, he stepped out and counfelled the ATHENIANS to feeke the friendship of the THEBANS. So thereupon they fent himto put it in practife, and happily he obtained it, notwithstanding all Philips oppositions to the contrary:who being altonied more then before with these crosses which the eloquence of one man did against him he sent agains to offer the GREBKBS peace. But they kept themselves close, and made strange of it, expecting the euent of all this great tempest : not being disposed at that time to hearken to pacification. But as if the time of their bondage had bene at the gate; they refused all conditions, yea contemned the very oracles of DELPHES, and Demosthenes had it often in his mouth, that the Prophetessedid Philippizate, to wit favoured Philips affaires. These oracles threatned both the one and the other, and especially the GREEKE's. Now Philip, though he faw he was deceived of the friendship of the Bo E OT I ANS, yet he resolved to fight with theone and the other. Therefore keeping his campe certaine daies, looking for the forces of his friends that were not yet come vnto him: he entred into Bo Bo TIA, with thirty thousand footmen, and about two thousand horse. So both campes being ready to give charge vpon each other, they both had like courage and resolution to do well. But as touching the number of men, and skilfulnesse of Captaines, Philip did passe them farre: for having done in many places so many wor. thie exploits of armes, he was become very expert in military discipline. To the contrary, on the ATHBNIANS side, their best captaines, as Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timotheus, were dead. Phocionalfo, he neuer thought well of this warre; and the factious, they had hindered the best they could that he should have no charge. Then was there but Chares and Lysceles, that were too weake to take such a great charge vpon them, & were much inferiour to many of the Captaines Philip had then with him.

Philip oner throweth the Atheni

The day being broken, and both armies fet in battell the one against the other in the plaine of CHERONEA: Philip placed his fonne Alexander, comming but newly out of his infancie, in one of the points of his army, attended vpon by the best Captaines he had: and he placed himselfe in the other point, with the valiantest men in his army, gining order and direction in all things according to time and place. The ATHENIANS, having taken one of the points of their battell, left the other vnto the Borotians. So the fight began very sharply, and many were slaine on both fides, and it could not be difcerned yet whether fide had best occasion to hope of victory: untill that Alexander at the length, defirous to make his father see some proofe of his valour, and many other valiant men seeing the courage of this young Prince, following him, they with him brake into the battell of the enemies, and there was a maruellous cruell flaughter. Philip on his fide also giving charge vpon the greatest presse and multitude of his enemies, not enduring that any should take the honour from him, no not his owne some: set vponthem so fiercely that withstood him, that he put them out of order, and made them flie for life. There died in this battellaboue athousand Athenians, and there were taken prisoners to the numberoftwothousand. And of the Borotians in like manner there were many killed in the field, and a great number taken. After this battell, Philip caused a token of triumph to be set vp, and suffered the enemies to take away the bodies of their dead, and to burie them. Hee made sumptuous sacrifices vnto his gods, to give them thankes for his victory: and honoured them that had done good service in this battell, every one according to his degree and defert. Howbeit he committed certaine infolencies: for after he had drunke wel with his friends, he went to the place where the dead bodies lay, and there he fell a finging in mockerie, the beginning of the decree which Demosthenes had propounded, whose counsell they following, the ATHENIANS concluded to warre against him, lifting vp his voice, and keeping measure with his foote: Demosthenes, the sonne of Demosthenes Pæanian set out this. But afterwards when he beganne a little to come to himselse againe out of his drunkennesse, and that he had thought a little of the danger he had bene in: then his haire began to stand vpright on his head, when he entred into the confideration of the force and vehemencie of fuch an Orator, that had brought him in a peece of a day, to put his whole effate and his life to the hazard of a battell. And when the ATHENIAN'S fent vnto him to treate of peace, he presently set his countenance, rubbed his eye-browes, and laying afide all madnetse and wantonnesse, made them a very fober and aduised answer. Others say, that he dranke too much at the feast of his sacrifice, and that after supper he danced and made a mummerie with his minions; passed by the prisoners, and gaue them sharpe taunts in mockerie, touching the misfortune of their ouerthrow: and that Dimades then being one of the number, was fo bold franckly to fpeake a word Demades tohim, which was of such efficacie, as it made him refraine from his insolencie. O King, sayd he,it being now thy fortune to play Agamemnons part, thou art not ashamed to shew the deedes the quicke, of Thersites. Philip finding himselfe touched to the quicke with this word so well fer, he prefently changed hisapparell and countenance, cast downe to the ground his garland of flowers estimation he wore on his head, caused all the other fignes of mockerie which were carried after him to be with him. broken, and from thenceforth began greatly to esteeme of Demades, and would have him about him. Demades, being passing eloquent aboue others of his time, did so well entertaine Philip, that he caused him to deliuer all the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, without paying of any ransome. And further yet, humbling the conquerours fiercenesse, he made peace with the ATHENIANS, but put agarrifon within THERES, and moreour granted peace vnto the BOEOTIANS.

But that which principally brought him to incline vnto it, was the defire he had to be chosen The canse Captaine-generallof Greece. And to this end he caused them to give out abroad, that hee would vindertake to make warre for the Greekes against the Persians, and to be reuenged of them for the outrages and facriledges which they had committed against the Temples with the of the gods in GREECE; and fought to gaine the good will and friendship of all the GREEKES, by all kinde of courtefies he could possibly deuise or thinke of, as well openly as secretly. So hemade a motiue, that he defired to speake with the townes openly, and to communicate fomethings vnto them, which concerned the good of all their common-wealth in generall. And for this purpose there was appointed a generall assembly of the States in GREECE in the city of Corinth, in the which he propounded this, to vndertake the warre against the Persians: and putting them in great hope of happie fuccesse, he perswaded the commissioners of cuery towne, which were present in this assembly of counsel, boldly to conclude this enterprise. He folicited his matter in fuch fort, that the GREEKES with generall confent chose him their Captaine-general with fourraigne authority. Then he began to make great preparation for this general of war, and having made a description and sesse of all the contributions, as also the number of men Greece. of warre which energy city should furnish for this enterprise: he returned into MACEDON, and fent from thence two of his chiefe Captaines before into As IA, Attalus and Parmenio with a part of his army, commanding them to deliuer the GREEKES cities of ASIA out of bondage. But his death brake the voyage, so that they went not very farre. Now hitherto have we seene Philips naturall disposition in the middest of his deeds, and what is commendable and reprochfull info great a Prince. But before we go further in the rest of his life, it may peraduenture not be much impertinent to infert in this place some of his sentences and memorable actions, whereby he may be the better discerned, to compare him afterwards with the others. For mens words and fashions among it their familiars, be the very liuely tables of the affections and passions of the foule: it being vnpoffible for any man-alwaies to counterfet fo, but that they may oftentimes fee his heart at his tongues end.

So then, newes being brought him in one felfe day of three great prosperities: The first, impresperithat he had wonne the prize at the courses of coaches with foure horse in the folemnity of the Olympiangames: The fecond, that his Lieutenant Parmenio had ouercome the DARDANIANS aduerfits. in battell: The third, that his wife Olympiade had brought him a goodly sonne: he lifted up his hands to heauen, and faid: O fortune, I befeech thee fend me in exchange of this, some reasonable aduerfity, against such and so great happinesse. Lasthenes an OLYNTHIAN, that for a Phillips greatsumme of mony had sold him the towne of OLYNTH, complained to him one day that Barpesen. some of his minions called him traytor. He answered him againe, that the MACEDONIANS were rude plaine men, that called all things by their name. He seemed to repute the ATHENI-Ans happie men, for that they found yearely ten Captaines in their towne to be chosen: and that he to the contrary in many yeares could find but one, and that was Parmenie. After he had ouercome the GREEKES, many aduised him to put good and great garrisons in the townes, that they might with more fafety be kept vnder. But he answered them: I had rather be called a long time courteous, then a short time Lord. And when his familiars gaue him counsell to banisha malicious person, that did nothing but speake euill: he answered them he would not, fearing lest he should every where else speake evill of him. There was an ACHAIAN called Arcadion. that made profession to speake cuill of him every where, and warned every man to flie so farre from Philip, as none could tell there what man he was. Arcadion being by chance met in MACE. DON, the courtiers would have had Philip to have punished him, and not to let him escape our of his hands. Philip to the contrarie spake him faire, and sent him presents to his lodging, Shortly after, he commanded they should make enquirie what talke Arcadion had of him a mong the GREEKES. Euery man brought him word, that he did wonderfully commend and praise him wheresoeuer he came. Then faid Philip vnto them: I am a better physition for enill freech then you are. Another time in the affembly of the Olympian games, as the GREEKES fpake euill of him, his friends faid. That fuch ill speakers would be seuerely punished to speake fo much evill of him that had done them so much good. Nay, but what would they do then. answered he, if we did hurt them? Smicythus did often accuse Nicanor Vnto him, telling him that he did nothing else but speake euill of Philip: so that his best familiars thought it good he should be fent for, and be punished according to his deferts. Yea but (replied he) Nicanor is one of the honestest men of Mace Don: were it not better therefore to enquire whether the fault bein vs, or not: And forthwith having made diligent fearch whence this discontentment of Dilla. Philiprelie nor came, he found that he was a man oppressed with extreme pouerty, and that no man would releeue him in his necessity: whereupon he sent him immediatly a good present. Afterwards Smicythus brought word, that Nicanor enery where spake great praises of Philip. See then, faid he, how it depende th ypon our felues to be well fpoken of. He was wont alfoto fay, that he was much beholding vnto the counsellors of Athens, for that they speaking euill of him. were cause to make him an honest man of word and deed: For, said he, I do dayly enforcemy felfe both in my deeds and words to make them lyers. He fent home (as hath bene spoken before) all the ATHENIANS prisoners at the battel of CHERON EA, without paying any ransome. and yet moreouer they asked for their beds, their apparell, and al their baggage, and complained of the MACEDONIANS, because they did not deliuer it vnto them: When Philip heard of this. he fell a laughing, and faid vnto them that were necre about him; How fay you, do not you think these ATHENIANS, suppose they were our come by vs at the play at bones. He said also that they which gaue him counfell to deale sharply with the ATHENIANS, were men of anill iudgement, to counsell a Prince that did and suffered all things for glory, to destroy the Theater ofglory, which was the city of ATHENS, by reason of learning. There was a great number of prisoners taken at a battell, and he was present to see them sold by the drumme, fitting in his chaire, his gowne being turned up a litle higher then was decent. Then there was one of the prifoners that was a felling, that cryed out aloud vnto him: I befeech thee, ô King, to pardon me that I be not fold, for I am thy friend from father to the sonne. Philip asked him, how and from whence this friendship should come betweenevs: I will tell thee in thy earc, answered the prifoner. Philip commanded they should bring him to him. Then the prisoner coming neare to him, told him softly: O king, letthy gowne fall downe before a litle, for as thou fittest, thou shewest that that is vnfitto bescene. Then spake Philip aloud to his men, Deliuer him, andlet him goe: for he is indeed one of my friends and wel-willers, but I had forgotten it. Such was his behauiour to his enemies, and those that spake euill of him.

Let vs now speake somewhat of his instice, and of divers other affections worthy to be noted in him: the which do appeare something in his words, and by the effects that followed. And they doe shew more and more, that this Prince had learned very much with Epaminondas, but aboue all, to be nobly minded, patient, and defirous of honour without shame: qualities that had bene much more excellent in him, if he had not made fuch merchandize with wicked men as he did, that fold their country: be fides that they faw in him an ardent ambition, as also in that he coueted to be Captaine generall of all the GREEKES, and the triumphs preceding his death, and all his life do shew. And to this purpose he counselled his some Alexander to speake graciously vnto the Macedonians, to winne their good wils, whilest he had leisure now to be courteous vnto them, another reigning in the kingdome: as if he would have faid, that when he came to be King, he should carie the gravity of a master and of a Lord, and that he should do inflice. It gave him counfell alfo to lecke to get the love of those that bare credit and au- Philip githority in good townes, as well of the wicked as of the good, that he might afterwards vie good comthe good, and abuse the enill. But now to returne to his instice againe: Being a Judge betweene two bad men, hee ordained that the one should flie out of MACEDON, and the other should runne after him. It is reported of him, that hee had gotten together a number of the wickedest and most disorderedst men that were in his time, whom he lodged all together in atowne which hee had caused to be built, and called it PONEROPOLIS, the towne of Thetowne knaues. Hee had on a time bestowed the office of a Indge vpon one recommended vnto him by Antipater: but vnderstanding afterwards that he vied to paint his haires and beard, hee tooke it from him, saying, that he that ysed deccipt in his haire, would hardly deale truly in a 200d cause. Machetas pleaded a cause on a time before him whilest he slept, so that not conceiuing nor understanding well the matter, hee wrongfully condemned him. Whereupon Machetas beganto crie out, that he did appeale. Philip being angred at that word, asked him presently, vnto whom he did appeale from him : Before thy felfe, ô King, answered he, when thou are awake, and wilt give good care to conceive of my fact. These words touched Philip to the quicke, whereupon he rose vp on his feete, and calling himselfe better to minde, knew that he had wronged Machetas in his fentence, and yet neuertheleffe he would not renoke his judgement: howbeit he himfelfe with his owne money difcharged the matter, wheremonthe fuite was brought before him. Harpalus had a kinfinan and a friend of his called Crates, attainted and conuicted of great crimes: hee befought Philip, that paying the fine, fentence hould not be pronounced against this Crates, that hee might avoide the shame and disgrace. But Philip answeredhim againe, It is better he should beare his owne blame and discredit, then Amemora-Ifor him. A fouldier of his, a valiant man of his hands, having by falle report obtained of him Marifirats, thegift and forfeiture of the goods of a Macedonian: it fortuned that the Macedonian ill willing to put vp fuch an outrage, bewrayed vato Philip the vnthankfulnesse of the souldier whose life he had faued. Philip was so offended with the villanie of this souldier, that after he had renoked his gift, he made him quaile in fuch fort, that his wickednesse was knowne of enericone, and the Macebonian restored againe to all his goods. A poore old woman being in fuite of law, befought him to give judgement, and pressed him continually : but he excused himselfe, and told her, he was not at leisure to heare it. The old woman cryed out aloud: The bold Leave then to be King. He being aftonicd and lively pricked with this word, did heare her, woman to and all others in order. As for his friends, Philo a gentleman of THEBES had done him many Philop. pleasures at the time when he remained in hostage in the city of THEBES: for he was lodged in his house, and after that he would never receive any gifts or presents of him. Whereupon Philipsaid vnto him: Take not from me the title and honour of inuincible, being ouercome by thee of courtefie and liberality. Word being brought him of the death of Hipparchus, borne in the Ile of Ev BOEA, he was very forie; and as one that stood by, told him he was ripe and ready to die for age: Yea, said he againe, for himselfe, but not for me, to whom he is dead too soone: for he is dead before he received any recompence of me, worthy the friendship he bare me. As touching houshold matters, he fell out on a time with his wife olympias, and his fonne Alexander: in which time of his anger, Demaratus a Gentleman of Corinth went to vifit him. Philip then asked him, how, and after what manner the GREEKES lived one with another. Truly, answered Demaratus, thou carest much for the peace and vnion of He that the GREEKES, fince the persons that touch thee so nearely, and those whom thou oughtest cannot or to make much account of, are so separated from thee. This word made him consider so well owne famiof it, that afterwards he appealed his anger: the cause thereof is shewed in the beginning 11, milit of Alexanders life; and fo reconciled himselfe vnto them. Being told him that his some singdome, Alexander misliked it, and complained that he begot bastards of other women: he told him, Since thou feeft now that thou shalt have many competitors with thee for the kingdome after my death, endeuour thy selfe to be an honest man, that thou mayest come to the crowne not fo much through me, being mine heire, as through thy felfe, for that thou art worthy. He perswaded him much, diligently to studie Philosophie vnder Aristotle, to the end, faid he, thou do not many things that I have done, whereof now I hartily repent me. Being on a time fallen backward, lying all alongst the place where they exercise wrestling; and wallowing vp and downe, as if he had seene the figure and print of his body in the dust: O Heronles, said he, how little quantitie of ground will ferue vs by nature, and yet we couet to inhabite all the world. He would on a time lodge his campe in a faire ground; but being told that there was no forrage for the beafts, he was constrained to dislodge from thence, saying: What is our life, since we must take care enen to place Asses: There was an host of his, that on a time bad him to supper with him. So, as he was going, he met diuers by the way, whom he caried thither with him. Whereupon perceiuing his hoft was much troubled, because he had not meate enough to feede fo many mouthes: Philip feeing it fent fecretly to tell every one in their eares whom he brought with him, that they should keepe a place in their stomacke for the tart. The other beleeuing that he spake in carnest, did forbeare to cate, whereby there was meate enough for them all. That which is already faid, is fufficient to make vs know the naturall disposition of this great Prince: whoseend we are now about to describe vnto you. He vndertaking to passe into As 1 A, to make war with the PERSIANS, in the state of Captaine-generall of the GREEKES: being defirous his voyage should be fauoured of the gods, he asked of the prophetesse of Delphes, whether he should ouercome the king of Persias She answered him:

The one is crowned when his end is neare at hand, To offer him in facrifice, a man doth ready stand.

This oracle being doubtfull and obscure, Philip tooke it for his advantage; as if Apollo had told him, that the king of Persia should be flaine by him, as an oblation of facrifice. But cleane co. trary, the oracle threatned him with death in a day of a folemne feast: and that he should be slaine as a bull, whom they crowne with garlands and hats of flowers, when they go about to facrifice him. Notwithstanding supposing that the gods did fauour his enterprise, he was very pleafant, perswading himselfe that Asia should shortly be tributarie to Macedon. So he prepared fumptuous and magnificent facrifices in honour of the gods, and made preparation for themariage of his daughter Cleopatra. Now he being desirous to draw to this feast as many GREEKES as he could possible, to that end made proclamation every where, that there should be games of prize for learning and musicke, and sent to summon all his hosts and friends, in what part of GREECE focuer they were, to come to this mariage: and commanded the Lords of his Court that they should do the like for their part. For he defired to shew the GREEKs al signes of friedship, and to make them the best cheare that could be possible, in recompence of the honourthey had done him, to chuse him their Captaine-general. There was a wonderfull affembly of people from all parts at this feast; and the mariage was folemnized betwixt Alexander king of Epinvs and Cleopatra, and the games alfoat ÆGES a city of MACEDON. Where not only Philips private friends, and the most notable men of the GREEKS but also the principall & chiefest townes of GREECE(& among others ATHENS) gaue him prefents of many rich crownes of gold. The decree of the people presenting a crowne of gold, & openly proclaimed by a herald; the effect of it was: that if it hapned any man having conspired or attempted ought against the person of King Philip, should flie to Athens in hope of priviledgethere, that he should be delivered into the hands of the king. In the middest of this great feast at the mariage, there was an excellent player of tragedies, called Neoptolemus, that rehearfed verses touching the enterprise of Philip: and as if he had meantro haue reproued the pride of the King of Persia, he lively touched that of his master Philip; and before he was ware, foretold his death in couert termes, and which might be applied (as also Philip did, blinded and astonied with his prosperity) vnto the estate, and vnto the king of Persia. Among other verses the beginning of it was very neare to this effect:

Abone the skies extell thy pride, Surmount all haughtineffe that is Within this earthly vale fo wide: Promise thy selfe aworldly bliffe, And prosperous life for ener fure, Yet canst thou now no longer dure. For some already have begun Thyruine, which thou canft not foun: And death neare to that breast of thine, Shall shortly breake off thy designe.

The day after this royall mariage, the games began to be played, and the people ranne from all parts to the Theater to fee them, even vntill it was dark night. And in the morning at the breake of day there was a procession, in the which (among many other sumptuous and magnificent showes) they carried the images of twelue principall gods of GREECE, wonderfull cunningly wrought with great art; and then after them was borne the image of Philis for the thirteenth, as ifhe would have placed himselfe in ranke with his gods. When the Theater was full set with people, Philip himselfe came in the end, apparelled all in white, having commanded all his guard with the to follow him a farre off: defirous to shew the GREEKES, that because of the great confidence 3ods. he had of their faithfull friendship, he thought he needed no guard for his body. But at that time he was put to death after a strange fort: and that we may know by what occasion, we wiltake the matter further off.

There was in his Court a Macedonian gentleman, called Paulanias, borne in the coun- The occasion trey of Or E stripe, one of the gentlemen pensioners of Philips guard, that sometime was belomed for his beautic. He perceiving that the King lound another whose name was as himselfer. ned for his beautie. He perceiuing that the King loued another, whose name was as himselfe. Paulanias: began to gall him with injurious words, calling him Androgyne (as much to fay, as womanish man) and reprodued him that he abandoned his body to any that would. This second Paulanias very impatiently bare these words in his heart, yet made no reply to them, but onely imparted vnto his friend called Attalus what he meant to do; and within few daies after lost his life after a notable manner. Philip fought a battell with the SLAVONS, in the which this young man behaued himselfe very valiantly, right before the person of Philip, and received vpon his body all the blowes they strake at him, so that he died in the field. This va- The second liantnesse of his being blowne abroade through the army, Attalus that then was in great fauour with the King, intreated the first Paufanias to come and suppe with him, and having made him drunk, he left his body to all the horse-keepers and mule-letters to be carnally abused. His drunkennesse hauing left him, he was so grieued at his heart for the outrage Attalus had done him, that hee went and complained to the King him felfe. Philip was maruelloufly offended withall, because of the villanie that was offered him. But because of the loue he bare to At- Private retalus, and also for that he stood in need of his service, and for that he was vnkle to Cleopatra, special the last and well beloued wife of Philip, and appointed his Lieutenant for the warre of Asia, inflice, inflice. hemade as though he knew it not. But to appeale Paufanias, he gaue him great presents, and placed him amongst the number of them of the guard about his person. Pausanias having made his complaint to Olympias, vnto Alexander, and to some other, had fundry answers, but no iuflice at that time. Wherfore keeping this despite in his heart, hee resolued not onely to be reuenged of him which had done him this injurie, but also of Philip that would do him no iu. flice. But to further him in this diuellish purpose, amongst others a Rhetoritian called Hermoagainst trates did set him on, whom Pausanias frequented to learne of him. Discoursing one day toPhilip. gether, he asked him how a man might in a short time make himselfe famous, to be spoken of of enery body? Hermocrates answered, in killing one that had done many great things: for, faid he, it is of necessity, that remembring his facts, the name of him that killed him must also becomprised. Pausanias applying that to the purpose of his anger, having no patience to prolong time, his heart being fo full of choler and griefe, determined with himfelfe to execute his enterprise the same day the playes should be: the which he did, as followeth. Heclayed horses ready at the gate of the Theater, and went about it, having a fword vnder his gowne, after the fashion of the GAVLEs as they weare it. When the time was come that Philip would himselfe go to the Theater, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen that attended upon him, went into the Theater before him, who had commanded all the Gentlemen of his guard to come a good way behindhim. Then Paulanias seeing Philip going all alone, ranne to him, and gauchim such a Philip trasblow with his fword ouerthwart his flankes, that he ranne him through and through, so that he fell downe starke dead. The blow being given, hee ranne away straight vnto his horse, and Paulanies. some of the guard ranne to Philip, others swiftly followed the murtherer, among which was Leonidas, Perdiccas, and Attalus. Howbeit Paufanias that had gotten the start before, had easily mounted on horsebacke before the others could have come neare him to overtake him, had it not bene that in the way as he fled, he flumbled at the roote of a vine, which ouerthrew him. Then Perdiceas and the rest lighted on him as he rose, and thrusting at him, killed him in the Pansania place. Behold how Philip that was the greatest King in his time of Evrope, and for the great-nesse of his power, placed himselfe among the gods: was brought low, even to ranke with the weakest of the world, and died being but sixe and forty yeares old, having reigned 24. yeares. That therfore whereof hegloried most, was in his skill of wars, and in the actions which he managed brauely, preferring that farreaboue all exploits of war. For (faid he) in victory all that fight in the battell haue their part; but in those things that I haue atchieued vnto, hauing wisely directed them, none is partaker of the honour but my felfe only. He had fine wines, the first was Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus king of the Molossians, of the line of Aacus, of whom were borne Alexander firnamed the Great, and Cleopatra. Alexander succeeded his father; and for Cleopatra, she was maried to her vnkle Alexander king of Epirvs, and brother of Olympias. The second wife of Philip was Audate, a Lady of SLAVONIA, of whom he had a daughter called Cyne, maried vnto Amyntas his cofin germaine: who being flaine, she was betrothed vnto Lagarus king of the Agrianians, who died before consummation of mariage. After the death of Alex. ander the Great, she being of a manly courage, and opposing her selfe against those that would depriue the children of Alexander of the crowne of Macedon, was flaine by Perdiccas com. mandement. The third was Phila: and the fourth was called Mede, the daughter of the king of THRACIA. These two had neither of them any children. And lastly being too old to marrie. he maried Cleopatra, the daughter of Hippostratus, and Attalus neece: at the mariage of whom he would have killed his sonne Alexander, for throwing a cup at Attalus head: after the which followed great trouble and foule stirre betwixt Philip, Olympias and Alexander: but Demaratus the Corinthian falued allthat againe. Of this last wife, he first had a daughter called Europe. and then a fonne called Caranus, whom Olympias put to a cruell death. For his concubines, the one called Arsinone, being gotten with child by Philip, she fell into Lagus hands, vnto whom she gaue Ptolomie afterwardsking of ÆGYPT. The second was a girle of LARISSENE, called Phi. linna. of whom he begat Aridaus: who first of all was poysoned, and in the end cruelly murthered by Olympias: being the last King of the race of Temenides in MACHDON. For the issue of Alexander, they were rejected by Caffander. The third was Nicafipolis, a woman of THESSALY. and Iafons fifter, tyrantof PHERES: of whom he had a daughter called The falonica, whom Caf-Sander maried, and was afterwards flaine by Antipater. The end of Alexander, of his mother, and of his children and fucceffors, was lamentable in divers forts. And thus we fee in Philip and in his race, how many waies the high Iudge of the world hath in his power and hand to ouerthrow the greatest, when they are drunke with their prosperity. The end of Philip of Macedons life.

Base Tyranny is wrongs unhappy mother, Witnesse this wretch, in shew both grave and wise. Tet he himselfe beguiling, and each other, Shew'd that his heart was fierce and full of vice.

Nthe second year's of the second Olympiad, Archias a Corinthian, Archiasthe not daring to return again into his city for a foule fact committed founder of by him in the person of an honest youth called Action: he tooke the sea thecity syand failed into Sicilia with certain Corinthians & Dorians, and there built the city of Syracvsa, the which by processe of time became fo great, that it had within it as it were foure townes, of the which the one was called the Ile, the second Acradine, the third Tyche, and the last Neapolis: the one neare vnto the other, with a fort called Hexapyle, which commanded all the other, and it was in the top of a high place which they called Epipoles, as much to fay, as ouer all the other townes. It was gomerned at the first, by the command and power of Archies onely: but he being killed by Telephus, whom he had abused in his infancie, the Syracvsans gathered together of diverse parts, brought their estate to Aristocratia, which slourished for a time. But being come to passe that Tyndaris one of the Lords of the towne caried himselfe after such a manner, that he made many icalous that his drift and policy was to make him felfe chiefe Lord: the other Lords made a law called Petalisme, to meete with this practise: howbeit it was that that increased his enterprife. The effect of this law was, that the name of him that aspired to make himselse absolute for five Lord of the city, should be written in an olive leafe, the which being put into the hand of this yeares. Lord, without further ceremony it was to tell him that he was banished the city for flue yeares, much after the fashion that is reported of the Ostracisme of the Athenians. By meanes of this Petalisme, the Lords banished one another, so that in the end, the people became Lord. arifornite Buthereupon a dangerous sedition happening amongst them, Gelo, Lord of the city of GELE, brought to democracie, did so wisely look into the troubles of the Syrac vsan sthat they chose him king in the second and that to yeare of the threefcore and twelfth Olympiade. After him fucceeded Hieron, who at the begin. monarchie ning caried himselfe very cuill: but afterwards falling into acquaintance with the Poets Simonides, Pindarus and Bacchylides, which taught him many good things, he reigned very prudently, So, he having reigned about twelve yeares, left his brother Thrasybulus his successor: who for his cruelties and infolencies was driven out of Syracvs a by force, and went to Lock Es, and there ended the rest of his dayes. Then the Syracysan's established the gouernment of Lords, which continued fixty yeares: in which time they make warre with the AGRIGENTINES, and compelled them to fue for peace: they destroy the TRINACRIANS & their town: they set vpon the LEONTINES, which are aided by the ATHENIANS under the conduct of Laches and Carces. das, who behaued themselues so cuill, that at their returne home they were banished. Shortly after the new troubles betwirt y Syracvsans & the Leontines, the Athenians fent Phase into Sigilia to kindle the firea litle, and to mutine the one against the other. How beit it had no good fuccesse, but rather raised a cruell warre betwixt the Syracvsans and Athentans, in the which at the last Nicias and Demosthenes were overcome by sea and land both, and after. wards put to death, & the fouldiers of ATHENS that were prisoners most cruelly vsed. The Sr. RACVSANS lift vp with this victory, did put downe their Lordly gouernment, and brought itto a popular state againe. Then thinking to be reuenged of the CARTHAGINIANS that were cometo the aide of the Segestans against the Selinontines, which were their friends: they fent Diocles with fourethousand good men against Hannibal the sonne of Gisco, who lay in campe at that time before HIMERA, the which he wan after he had ouercome Diacles, and flaine the most part of his troupes. The Syracvsans casting their anger for this losse vpon Hermocrates one of their chiefe citizens, they banished him with the Petalisme, and drauchim out of the towne. He helping himselfe with the meanes he had in his hand, made vp and armed fine gallies, and afterwards with certaine banished men of HIMERA, attempted to put in againe into Syracvsa. But seeing he could not prevaile, he landed and possessed the ruined towneof SELINONTE, he repaired it, called home againe althe inhabitants dispersed through Sigilla, fortified himselfe there, and in few daies got together a troupe of fix thousand men. With these forces he set vponthem of PALERME, and MOTYE, in league with the CARTHAGINIANS, ouercame them in a pitched field, maintained his friends, and followed his victory. The Syra-CVSANS hearing good report of Hermocrates valour, bega to repent them that they had fo diffionourably vsed him. He on the other side being advertised by his friends of the good affection of the citizens vnto him: to win their good fauour ag sene, he was very carefull to gather together the bones of those that were killed by HIMERA VINCler the leading of Diocles, and sent themto Syracvsa, in carts very richly fet out. For all this they fent not for him home, the Syracvsans being affraid of him, for that he was a man of such courage and wisedome, lest he should make himfelfe Lord of the towne. He feeing himfelf thus refused, went backe to Selinonte, and shortly after being solicited by his friends, he found meanes by night to come into Syra-CVSA, and possessed the Acradine. The SYRACVSANS tooke armes immediatly, fought with Hermocrates, killed him in the great market place with part of his traine, and banished those that fauoured him. His friends faued some of them from the violence of the citizens, and amongst others Dionysius the sonne of Hermocrates, a plaine citizen of Syracusa, whose life we presently write of.

Now it is reported, that his mother being with child of him, dreamed that she was brought to bed of a Satyre, and that the Soothfayers being asked their opinion, answered, she should haue a fonne that should be famous about all the GREBKES. Furthermore, a yong gentlewoman of Syracvs a called Himera, some time before Dionysius made himself Lord of y city, dreamed that she was taken up to heauen, by a guide that having caried her too & fro, in the end brought herbefore Iupiter, at whose feet she saw a yong man with a yelow haire, bound with iron chains: and asking her guide what he was: It is, faid the other, the cruell scourge of Sicilia & Italy, the which shall spoile a great country, assoone as his bolts be off his feet. Within few yeares aster, Dionysius having already seized vpon the estate, as he came to make his entrie into Syracvsa, and that the citizens went out to meet him to do him honor: Himera being there by chance, knew him, and straight cried out: This was the yong man that she saw in heaven. This being reported to Dionysius, he caused them to kill the yong damosell. Another time his horse falling in the mire that he could not get out, Diony fins left him fast there: but the poore beast with strugling got himselfe out, and ranne after his master: bringing in his maine a swarme of bees. This did hearten him, especially through the counsell of his Soothsayers, to follow his purposetosubthe his country: the which he obtained by this meanes. The CARTHAGINIAN'S defirous to The occosion make themselves great in Sicilia, fent thither their Captaine Himileo with a great army: of Diony Gas against whom the Syracysans made head, wan a battell, and killed fixe thousand of his men. Notwithstanding this, he went and besieged AGRIGENTE, and having upon surprise overthrownethe army of the Syracusans by sea, he enforced them that were besieged to saue themselues as they could, entred into this great rich city abandoned, and tooke the spoile of it. The Agrigentines that escaped gaue yallarine, through al Sicilia, & retiring the school to Syrac vs a their friend town, began in full affembly of the city to accuse the Captaines of Sy-RACVEA, faying, that by their treason the country was fold vnto their enemies. Dionysius, the fon of Hermorates, a yong man of a front hart, and that did embrace great matters in his mind, being in this affembly, tooke hold of the occasion offered; and seeing the people out of countenance. hestepped forth, charged the Captains very much, and gaue counsell that they should do instice: whereupon the magiftrates did fet a fine on their heads. And having found Philifus inclined that way, and gotten money of him (who was very rich) to pay this fine, with promife to furnish others if they were condemned the followed his purpose in other assemblies, having speech at will, & a comely maner with al, so that almost for litle or nothing, he wanthe harts of the peoble, who moued by his oration, did caffeere the old Captaines, and chosenew, & among others Dinysius, who was a good fouldier, & had made proofe of his valiantnesse in divers encounters against the Carthaginians. But after they had chosen him captaine, he neuer came to coun-fell with his other companions, nor would not be acquainted with them: but vnder hand, made afoule report run abroad that they practifed with the enemies. This made men of good indgement to prefume that he himselfe went about to make some alteration; and they could not for. Generalizate beare to blame him for it. Neuertheleffe the people not looking fo inwardly into it, they effecmedhim very much. Hereupon many affemblies were made to think of their affaires in wars, in one of the which Dionylius perceiving the Syracus and aftenied, gave addice that they should call home their banished men, saying; that it was a great mockery to run into GRECE & ITALY for aid fince they had heard at their doores fuch as had bene citizens, who had rather dielike vagabonds, then scruethe enemy. And that the fauour they should shew them, would spurre them forward to do their country good feruice. The wifest men durst not gainfay this aduice, perceiuing that the people did incline vnto it: that if they hindred that, it was to get as many entmies as there were banished: and that they being called home, should thanke none but Dionysius, at whose commandement they would ever be afterwards. No man speaking a word the decree ofrepeale was authorized by the people, and the banished men returned to Syracvan. In the middeft of all this bufineffe, letters were brought from Gala, which demanded aide. Dionyfius offered himselfe firaight, & was sent thither with 2000. footmen, & 400, horse. Being arrived at by practifes Geles, & finding the city in trouble, he tooke the peoples part, accused the principals, made the to apprete be put to death, & their goods for feited. With which for feiture he payed the ordinary garrison greatness. of GELE, & promised double pay to them that followed him from Syrac vsa: vnto the which hereturned immediatly, having the favour of his fouldiers. So all the people ran about him in multitudes, asking him where the enemics were, and what they did? You do not confider, faid he, that your enemies indeed are in your towne. They that governe in your estate are more to be feared, then the Carthaginians: for whilest you are busic about your playes and feasts, they deuide the common treasure among themselves, and pay not the souldiers. In the meane space Himileo prepareth himfelf to come & befiege you, whereof your gouernors make no reckning. neither do they give any order for it. I knew this well enough before, but now I am most affured of it: for Himileo fent a trumpet vnto me, vnder colour of certaine prifoners, and fecretly bad him tell me, that he wold give me more the any other of my companions, fo that I would not fearch him too narrowly:& if fobethat I would not helpe him, at the least yet that I would not hinder him. And therforethinke with your felues to find another captaine in my place: for it is no reafon whilest others sell the town to the enemies, that I should go hazard my selfe with my fellow citizens, & in danger in the end that they should thinke of me I should be partaker with the wicked practifes of others. Those that heard what he spake, being maruellously offeded, caried these words immediatly all about the towne. But for the present time enery one went home to their house, sad, and troubled in their minds. The morrow after, as those that should speake before the People did draw by lot of letters, that they might know in order how they should speake, and that the letter F. came to his lot: some stander by told him, this F. signifieth * Foole, Die nyfin, because thou wilt tell vs great follies. No, replied he quickly: that I shall be a Monarke. Presently the people being assembled, and his turne being come to speake, he accused his other companions with great vehemency, was heard very attentiuely, and with great praise of all the people, whom the day before he had angred very much: fo that in the end there was some of the affembly cryed out, that necessity required that Dionysius should be chosen alone Captainegene. rall, with all authority & fourraigne power, and that it was no tarying till the enemies be vnder our wals, and that he was a fit man to take care of this businesse: and as for the traytors, that they should thinke of them at better leifure. Hereupon the people chose Dionysius their Captainege. nerall, gining him full authority, and power of the affaires of the common-wealth, and praying him to confider of all that should be expedient to resist the enemies.

Hee feeing his enterprife fo well grounded, propoundeth a decree to the people, that the fouldiers pay should be doubled over that it was before: for that would make them more couragious and willing to do good feruice. And as for money, that the Syracus ans should take no thought for that, for he knew away how to come by it well enough. This fo fuddenadnancement, and his bold promifes iouned with the disposition of this yong man, mademany fuspect him that had any understanding and judgement: insomuch that some began to goe and come to houses to conferre together to find meanes betimes to withstand the tyranny, which had now (as they fay) put the irons in the fire. But Dionyfius having an eye abroad, and a num. ber of spies that slily fell into companies, being afraid they would do him some hurt, determined to prouide for it by a farre fetch to fight, but very fit to ferue his turne: which was, to ob. tain licence to chuse a guard for his person, vnto y which he came, as followeth. He proclaimed in the towne that those that were able to be are arms should follow him, and to make their rende-vous with their armes at a day fet down at the towne of the Leontines, and bring victuals with them for one moneth. There was then in that towns a garrilon of the Syrac vsans: the banished, and all forts of men withdrew themselves, whom Dionysius hoped would have taken his part, for that they were men which defired nothing more then change and alteration, and perfivaded himfelfe that few of the Syracvsans would follow him. Hereupon he went himselse into the field, and being encamped nere the towne, one caused his friends to give the alarme, and to cry helpe, as if the enemies had enuironed him to kill him in his tent: and making as though he had bene maruelloufly afraid, he fled, and faued himfelfe by fwiftnesse within the castell of the towne, where he passed all the rest of the night, made fires all abour, and fent for his fouldiers in whom he put most trust, as a man that is afraid, seeing his enemies lie in waite for him. The next morning some of the people of Syracusa being gathered together in the towne of the LEONTINES, in open affembly he made a long discourse of that that had passed, to make them beleeve that his cuill willers would have surprised him, and could speake so well, that the people appointed him fixe hundred souldiers to guard his person, such as he himselfe would chuse out. Immediatly he chose young men to the number of a thousand, which had nothing to lose, hardy and desperate to put any thing in execution that they were commanded. These he furnished with all things necessarie, and made them great promises: fo that he wan their hearts, and got vnto him the souldiers strangers that were in the Syracysans pay. Howbeit he changed the Captaines from their companies, and put in their places some other made to his hand. And afterwards he sent Dexipus a wise and valiant Captaine Laced Emonian, backe againe into his country, of whom he stood in seare, and perceived he would be a barre in his way to hinder that he went about. Ouer and aboue that he fent for the fouldiers of the garrifon of Gelegand gathered together all them that were banished, all theeues and rogues that would come and serue him, judging them to be firmen to serue the turne he purposed. When he had gotten a great troupe of such rakehels, he straight for a Tyrat. returned to Syracvsa, and lodged his forces in the Arfenall, and then shewed himselfe openly Lord, and tyrant, without any longer diffimulation. This amazed and grieued the Syracysans most extreamely: neuerthelesse they were enforced to bearethis yoake which they could not helpe, because the towne was full of souldiers strangers, and for that also they were afraid of the Carthaginians that were neare vnto them with a mighty armie. All this happened, Dionysius being but fine and twenty yeares old, in the third yeare of the ninetic three Olympiade, and in the three hundreth seuen and fortieth veare of the foundation of Rome. Thus you fee how this yong man, of a base condition, meanely borne, made himfelfe Lord of one of the greatest common-wealths in the world at that time. and continued this vour pation all the daics of his life, which was the space of 38, years.

This being done, he made them all rich and wealthy that aided him in this enterprife, draue outall those he could find that withstood these his attempts, put to death before all the people Daphneus and Demarchus, two of the chiefest men, and of greatest power that were at that time and Dein Syracvsa, and that had most crossed him of all others in the device of his purpose. After-marchy ward, because he would yet strengthen himselfethe better, he maried Hermocrates daughter, a put to death Syracvs an Captaine, that ouercame Nicins and the ATHENIANS, and maried his fifter vnto Polyxenus, brother in law vnto Hermocrates. Whileft things passed thus, the CARTHAGINIANS, being masters of Agrigente, after they had spoiled, burnt and razedit, they marched away with their Generall Himileo, and went and befieged the city of GELE, friend to the Syracy-SANS, in maner of a like distance from Syracysa and Agrigente, very farre in land, where the other two wereports of the fea. The befieged did wonderfull valiantly defend themselves. their Towne being weake and kept by the citizens onely, accompanied with their wives and children that would not for fake them. Diony fins hearing of their necessity, brought a strong aide unto them of thirty thousand footmen, and a thousand horse, besides agreat number of gallies, that lay off and on vpon the Ile, to cut off victuals from Himileo, and to land also. But when they came to joyne, Dionysius having divided his bands into three troupes to trouble his enemy the more, he could not do so well but the CARTHAGINIANS had the better, and slue many of his men. He very hardly escaping with his troupe entred into the towne, and there called his friends together to counsell what they were best to do. They seeing the place dangerous, and ofgreat difaduantage to hazard battell in, gaue him counfell to retire againe. He fent a Trumpet ouer night to Himileo, to pray him to furcease armes till the morning, that he might gather the dead bodies together to bury them. In the meane space, in the first watch of the night, he flight so made all the people come out of the towne, and dislodged himselfe about midnight, leaving wardly out theretwo thousand men lightly armed, commanding them to make great fires and noise, that of Gale. the enemies might thinke that he and his men were still in the towns; and that they at the breake of day should come to their troupes. Dionysius having escaped thus, came vnto CAMARINE. atowne halfe-way betwixt Geleand Syracvsa, and commanded all the inhabitants to diflodgeand come to Syracvsa, that they might avoide the crueltics of the Carthaginians who facked Geles. So, all the inhabitants of these two townes compelled to leave their houses and country, all the fields and high-waies were full of women, children, and of poore people ofthe country. This moved the fouldiers against Dionysius, who accused him that he had done The fouldithis of purpose, that he might more easily scise vpon the other cities of Sicilia, which should ere incensed bedeftroyed by the barbarous CARTHAGINIANS; and thus they complained one to another of Dionylus. the litle aide he had given to the town efmen of GELE: how the fouldiers of his gard had dealt cowardly in their feruice, and ran away without the losse of a man of theirs, and no body purfued after them. Vpon this discontentment, the ITALIAN souldiers that came out of ITALIE. tooke their journey to return home. And the men of armes of Sicilia at the first began to lye in waiteto kill Dionysius on the way: but seeing that the souldiers of his gard were never from him, nor he from them, they departed all together, and went with speed towards Syr'a. evsa, and found them that were left there in garrifon, lodged in the place of the Arfenall, who knew nothing what had happened before GELE. By this meanes being entred without refistance, they sacked the pallace of Dionysius, where they met with great riches, and did so villanously abuse his wife, that for griefe she killed her selfe. But about the time that they departed Diomsius from the campe, Diony fins imagining by the way what would follow after this, chose out cer- pullate late taine footmen and horsemen which he thought he might best trust about his person, and went wife raniwith all speed possible with them to Syracvsa, supposing he should not our come these social men of armes, vnleffe he did as they. And even as he thought fo it came to paffe: for they perfwading themsclues that Dionysus could not well tell what course to take, whether to follow them, or to keepe with his army: thought they had won all, and walked vp and downe the towne telling stories of the cowardlinesse of Dionysius: who having marched well neare ninetcene leagues at one iourney, came about midnight to the gates of ACRADINE, with about an hundred horse and six hundred footmen; and finding it shut, caused store of sagots, reeds, and sedge of the fennes to be laid against the gate, wherewith the SYRACVSANS vse to burne their lime which they found there ready at hand. Whilest this gate was burning, his men that could not follow him fo fast, arrived one after another. And so the gate being burnt he entred, & found in the market place some of thesemen of armes, who in hast had set themselves in order of battell.

but on the fudden they were engaged, and killed with pikes & darts. Diony fine on the other fide. he ran through the towne, putting them all to the fword he met here and there in the freets, that were running to aide their men. And not flaying fo, he entred into their houses whom he knew to be his enemies, killed some of them, and draue others out of the City. The rest of the men of armes fled fome here, fome there, and the next morning all his forces arrived at Syra cysa, But they of Gele & of Camarine being angry with him, went into the city of the LEONTINES. In the midft of all these stirs and doings, the plague being hot in the campe of the CARTHA-GINIANS, enforced Himilto to fend an herald vnto Syracys a to demand peace. Dionyfus ac. cepted it very willingly. So peace was cocluded, that the CARTHAGINIAN's should have the SI. CANIANS, befides al the towns which they had before the war in their power: That they of SE. LINONTE, Of AGRIGENTE, Of HIMERE, Of GELE, & Of CAMARINE, might returne hometo their houses, dwell in their country, and in their townes without wals, paying a certaine yearely tribute vnto the Carthaginians: That the Leontines, those of Messina and all other the SICILIAN'S should be tree. & enjoy their liberties & priviledges: That the SYRACYSAN'S should remaine under the government of Dionysius: That the prisoners and gallies taken in this warre should be restored againe on either side. By meanes of this peace Dionysius got the CARTHAGI. NIAN 2 Out of Sicilia, established his principality furer then euer, & maried againe two other wives together: the one a stranger of the city of Lockes, called Doruthe other of Syracysa called Aristomache, the daughter of Hippariness the chiefe man of all the citizens. He had askeda wife of them of RHEGE, but they refused him, & scotned his tyranny: of whom he was cruelly reuenged, as we will tell you hereafter. It is reported that he maried them both in one day, &it was neuer knowne which of them he knew first; for the rest, that eyer afterwards he shewedthe both a like fauour. They did ordinarily eate together with him, and both of them by turneslay with him. They of Syracvs a were defirous that his wife of Syracvs a should be preferred before the stranger. But Doru had this good hap, to bring forth Dionysfus eldest sonne: whichser. ued his turne well to defend himselfe, that she was a forreiner. Aristomache to the contrary was maried along time to Dionysius & had no children, though he was very defirous to have one by her. Infomuch that he put Dors mother to death, charging her that she had by charmes and forceries kept back Arifomache from conceiving. But afterwards she had children to wit two sons. Nifaus, and Hipparinus: and two daughters, Arete, and Sophrofyne. Dionyfius the yonger, maried his fifter Sophrofine; and Arete was maried vnto Thearides, brother to Dionysius the elder and her fecond husband was Dion, the brother of Ariftomache. Furthermore, confidering that the Syna-CV SANS being delivered from the war of the CARTHAGINIANS, should have leifure to thinke to recover their liberty againe; and perceiving that the quarter they called the Ile was stronger of situation, & easier to keepe then any other of the three the enclosed it in with a strong wall fro the rest, and built there many great and high towers, pallaces to keepe his Courts, hals for his Counfell and publike assemblies, goodly galleries, and spacious gatehouses to containe a great number of people. And to retire himfelfe vnto vpon any fudden emotion of the comon people, he built a maruellous (trong Castle, within the compasse wherof he enclosed the Assenal, where might lie in docke threefcore gallies : and there was a gate alfo to fhut too, into the which could enter but one galley at a time. Then chufing out the goodlieft and best place of all the territory of Syracysa, he deuided it among his friends, and gaue it vnto them that had charge of men of war under him. That which remained he diffributed by equal portions unto other inhabitants of the towne, as well naturall borne citizens, as strangers, come from other parts to dwell at Syracy sa, concluding under the name of citizens the bondmen enfranchifed, whom he called the new burgesses and distributed to the people also the houses of Syracys a those reserved of the quarter of the Ile, which be gaue vnto his friends and fouldiers. So, having as he thought well affured his estate, he began to make war ypon the free Cities of

Sicilia, vider colour that they had fauoured the Carthaginians. Herbesse, a City in firme land neare vnto the mountaines, in the hart of the country, was the first he attempted, and went and befreged it. But the Syracvsans that were a great number in this army, and well appointed, pointed, began to have fecret meetings, and to blame themselves, for that they joyned not with the men of armes to drive out this tyrant. He whom Dionview had given them for their Captaine called Doricus, was aware of their conferences, and threat ned one that spake louder then the others: who replied fo fiercely againe, that the Captaine came to him in choler to firike him:but his companions took the quarrell, and did fo contest against him, that they killed the captaine in the place. Then stirring up their fellow citizens to recouer their liberty, they sent Dionifical for the men of armes of the Syracv sans, who were retired into the fort of ATNE. Dionyfices a- familiers mazed with this change, presently raised his siege, and with all expedition tooke his way towards Syna cv sa, that he might be there first. After he was gone, those that had mutined chose him. them for their leaders that had killed Captaine Doricus, went and encamped themselves with the men of armes before Syracysa, in a place called Epipoles to make warre with the tyrant, hauing stopped all the passages that he could not come out into the field. And forthwith they sent to them of RHEGE and MESSINA, to pray them to fend them aide: which they obtained, to wit. ninety gallies well appointed. Furthermore, they promifed by open proclamation, a great fum ofmoney to him that would kill the tyrant: and to the strangers that were in pay to make them Burgesses as themselves, if they would take their part against him. They provided engines of battery to beate downe the walles of the Isle, and enery day gaue new affaults vnto them, and made very much of all the fouldiers strangers that tooke their part. Whereupon Dionysius seeing himselfe shut out of the field, and that his men forsooke him euery houre, affembled his friends to confult with them what was to be done. Some counselled him to tarie, alledging that tyrannie and absolute power vsurped by him, was a faire tombe. Polyxemus his brother was of the mind, that he should saue himself on the swiftest horse he had in his stable, in the lands which the CARTHAGINIANS held in Sicilia. But Philiftee, who afterwards wrote the storie of his gelts, said then, that Dionysius should neither flie away, nor yeeld vp his tyrannie, the which he hould never forgo but by force, and his feet forward. Diony fins tooke hold of this opinion, and resolued with himselfe to abide al extremity rather then to yeeld vp his place. Being in this case abide all he fortuned to come to see a butcher slaughter an oxe, and having observed that at one strong rather then he fell downe starke dead: Alas, said he, were it not great shame that for searce of death which la strong the first then file. steth so litle while, and is so soone gone, I should leave so goodly and great a Seigniorie? But knowing what people he had to deale withall, he fent ambaffadors vino them that kept him in foffraightly, to beleech them to permithin with fafety to come out of the towne with his followers. Euen at that instant he fent men to the fouldiers CAMPANIANS, to promise them al that The double they wold have, so they would come and besiege Syracvsa. The townssmen having suffer they would have so they would come and besiege Syracvsa. The townssmen having suffer they would be they would bea red him to go his way with fine ships, slept quietly in hope that he would be gone: and caffiered apart of their fouldiers, supposing they should need no longer to besiege it. So that their soldiers dispersed themselues here and there in the fields, cuen as if the tyrannie had bene put downe. But the CAMPANIANS allured by Dionysius promises, came into the field, and being come to A-GYRIDE, they left their cariage, to be so much the sooner before SYRACVEA. They were twelve hundred horsemen, and made such speed, that they surprised the Syracysans, and in despite of them rode through the towne vnto the castle of Dionylius, in whose aide also at the very same time there arrived by feasthree hundred other foldiers: To that now he became more couragious then euer he was. The Syracvsans on the other fide began to disarme themselves, some being of one minde forme of another: which Dionyfius vnderstanding, he made a fallic out vpon them that kept the quarter called NEAPOLIS, or new towne, and put them all to flight: howbeit many were not killed: for Diony stus riding every where about, willed his men to kill none that fled. Thus were the Syracy san's driven and dispersed in the field, where there gathered about the horsem eaboue seven thousand. Now for Dionysius, he having caused them to be buried that were flaine in this conflict, he fent ambaffadours vnto ÆTNE to them that were retired thither, Dionyflus to intreate them to be at peace, and to returne home to their houses, promising them by oath, craueth that he would neuer be reuenged for any thing they had practifed or done against him. Those them of that had wines and children at Syracvsa, were compelled to trust to his words and promises. Aline. But when the ambaffadours alledged to the others, the humanity of their mafter inburying the dead: they answered, that the tyrant deserved to have as much done to him, and that they prayed y gods they might quickly requite him. For althis they would not flirre out of ATNE, expecting oportunitie to fet vpon their enemy: who being escaped from so great a danger, he

well payed the CAMPANIANS, he put them out of the city, suspecting their inconstancie and treason. They departing from Syracvsa, went unto the city of ATELLE, where they preuai. led fo much, that they were received into the towne to dwell there. But their wickednesse burg out into fuch extremitie, that one night they fet you the naturall inhabitants, killed every man that was able to beare armes, and afterwards by force thrust out their wives; and by this meanes made themselues masters of the towne, and of all the territorie thereabout. At the same time Ariflus, one of the chiefest men of LACED AMON was sent unto Syracusa, vpon a rumourgi. uen out amongst the people, that it was to drive out the tyrant : but the effect shewed that it was butto negotiate with him, and to bind him vnto them, to ferue their turnes in their affaires. Arie flus then immediatly after his arrivall having had fecret conference with Dionyflus, he began to mutine the Syracvsans, promifing them althe aide he could, for the recourie of their liber. tie. But afterwards he himfelfe killed Nicoteles the Corinthian, who had promifed the Syra ever an e to be the head of this enterprise and accusing them that gaue credit to his words he made the tyrant more bold and stronger then ever. So did he also begin to shew himselse more then before: for he found the meanes to fend the Syracvsans into the fields to get in their corne and haruest, and in the meane space whilest they were out of the City, he went into the houses himselfe, and fetched out all their armes that had any. Then he entironed his Castle round about with another second wall, built diverse ships, and assembled a great number of souldiers strangers, whom he afterwards entertained. Now he thinking himselfe too little a Lord. vndcrtooke to conquer some frontier townes neare vnto the territory of the Syrac vsans, and before he would affaile them, he brought his army before ÆTNE, which he wan prefently. From thence he came to befrege the city of the LEONTINES, the which having refifted him. after he had foraged and preyed the countrey about, he turned vnto the townes of the naturall SICILIANS, making as though he meant to fet upon them, to the end that those of CATANE, and of NAXE, feeing the warre in another place, should care the lesse for themselves. So being neare vnto the towne of Enne, he put into Limnestus head, a citizen of the same, that he should take vpon him to make him felfe Lord of the towne, promifing him to helpe him in it: which the other executed. Howbeit he kept the towne for himselfe, and shut the gates against Diong. fus: who being angry with this repulse, counselled the Ennians to drive out this new tyrant, The people being fee on by him, ran one day in armes into the market place, and cried, Liberty. Dionyfus understanding that followed with some of his faithfull friends, tooke hold of Limneflus, and deliucted him to the Ennians, and went out of the town again immediatly, to make others to truff him, From thence he went vnto CATANE, and wanthe towne through the treafon of Acefilaus Captaine of the fame: tooke all the armes from the inhabitants, and left a good garrifon there. Procles Captaine of MAXE shortly after, played even the like part that Arcelilans had done, and was well recompensed for it: and all his kinfmen and friends were given him: but the other inhabitants were fold by the drum, their Towne destroyed, and their lands given vnto the Sicilians, neighbours to Syracvsa. For those of Carane, they were also sold to them that would give most within Syracvsa, and their towne given to the souldiers CAMPANIANS. This made the LEONTINES hold up their hands, leaue the towne, and go dwell at Syracvsa. Now Dionyfius fortified Syracvsa anew, and having determined to close in the quarter called Epipoles with wals, he affembled threescore thousand labourers diftributed by troupes, and ferning skilfull mafters, accompanied with Masons that had their dayworke. These men encouraged by his presence, by his promises and gifts, finished the wall in three weekes of a reasonable height and thicknesse, being little lesse then two leagues about. The banished men of Syracvs a being fled to RHEGE, did what they could possible to mouethe > inhabitants to make war against Diony sus. They laboured it so well, that in the end the RH BGI-

ANS Went into the field, and induced the Governours of Massina to keepe them company.

But a Messenian called Leomedon, having discouraged the troupes, every one went home againe, and did nothing : and as for Dionysius, he looked no further into them, but the RHEGIANS and MESSENIANS having fent vnto him to treate of peace, he judging that the friendship of

untouched, vinto the which they caried their goods: he thought that fo long as he was at peace with them, diners of his subjects would be willing to do the like. How beit that in making warre with them, those whom the Carthaginians should ouercome by armes, would some to his fide. Furthermore, word was brought him that CARTHAGE was wonderfully afflicted with the plague, which did the more strengthen him in his resolution. But knowing that he had to Dionysius deale with mighty enemies of all the people of EVROPE, & that this war would not fo foone be preparation ended: he gathered together into Syracvsa out of all the coasts of ITALY; of GREECE, and of Carlbagini-Sicilia, the best workmen and artificers, vnto whom he gaue great wages, and great gifts vnto those that were most skilfull and diligent. Who labouring in enuie the one of the other, they built vp in a short time two hundred gallies, repaired an hundred and ten that had served a long times forged an hundred and forty thousand bucklers or targets, so many swords and daggers, asmany helmets and fallets: fourteene thousand corcelets, curates, and brigandines of all forts: engines of battery of all fashions, and of darts, an incredible and vnestimable number. Touching the galleyes, to arme them with pilots, mariners, and galley flaues, the city of Syras evsa furnished for the one halfe : and Dionysius for the other halfe payed the souldiers strangers. The furniture of these shippes, armes, and harnesse being readie, he began to gather his army together, and would not for fauing of charges put himselfe in readinesse before. He gathered together within Syracusa all those that were able to beare armes: he drew out of the townes fubicet vnto him, all that were meet for war:he leavied men out of LACONIA with confent of the Lords of Sparta, and got a great number out of all parts because he payed well, and gaue them very gracious entertainment that came to serue him. But aboue all the rest he shewed himself a maruellous friend to the Rhegians, and Messenians, that had a reasonable strong army in readines to be employed; being afraid that so soone as they should see the CARTHAGI-Exians passed into Sicilia, they would joyne with them: for to which side socuer these two chies would incline, they would helpe to make a great weight in the ballance, and to bring the victory to fall on their fide. It was at that time that he gave a great country of extent vnto the Messenians, and prayed the Rhegians to give him a wife of their towne. But they would not heare of that in any wife. Wherupon he went to y Locatans, who gave him her of whom we have spoken before: & for many daies together did nothing else but make banquets & feasts, aswell to his soldiers, as vnto the more part of the citizens of Syracvs a. For he had now changed his first sourenesse and cruelty of atyrant into gentlenes: he did vse his subjects in a more ciuill fort, put no more of them to death, nor banished any mo of them, as he did at the first beginning. Shortly after this mariage was past, he assembled the people of Syracysa, & did perswade them to make war with the CARTHAGINIANS, telling them that they were enemies of all the vniuerfall GREEKs, and of those especially that dwelt in SICILIA, whom they practised by all meanes they could to make subject vnto them. And that albeit they did not now make any alteration, it was because of the plague that tormented them much ; but so soone as they were free from that, they should see the effects of their malice against althe inhabitants of Sicilia, which they cast long before in their minds. And that it were better for him, since it must needs be, soon or late, to begin to make war vpon them they being now weake, then to tarrie till they were reconcred againe; and that it was a great shame to them to suffer the towns of GRECE so neare vnto them, to be made subject to barbarous people: that being desirous to recouer their liberty, so much more willing they would be to yeeldthemselves vnto the Syracvs ans, so soone as they should see that it were open war. These and other reasons were received and allowed by the Sy- Dionysius RACVSANS, who were no leffe defirous then himselfe to make war with them. For they hated his persuathe CARTHAGINIANS, because that for feare of them they were constrained to put themselues saile to vnderthe yoke. And next, for that they hoped Dionysius would vse them more gently, so long as make war on the one fide he should be afraid of the force of the enemies, and on the other, of the rebellion with the of those whom by force he kept vnder. And especially about the rest, for that they hoped being armed, if occasion were offred, they might one day stand for the recouery of their libertie.

Warre being concluded upon in this affembly, Dionysius suffered the Syracusans to spoile the PHENICIANS that trafficked in their hauen which they executed out of hand. The other Si-CILIANS did afmuch: fothat the CARTHAGINIANS were driven to run away, & those that they could catch were cruelly handled in enery place, for the hatred they bare them, because of the proud parts they committed in the wars past. Dionysius having all his army in readinesse, sent a

Herald vnto CARTHAGE with letters, containing that the SYRACVSAN'S haddecreed in their Councell to make warre vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, vnleffe they departed from the towns of GRECE which they held in Sicilia, and did leave them at liberty. The Senate and people of CARTHAGE amazed at it, knew that they had to fight with Dionyfus, neuertheleffe they refol ued to take armes, and fent to leavie men out of all parts. Diony fus on the other fide, he tooke the field with an army of fourescore thousand fighting men of foote, and three thousand horse and had at the sea nere two hundred gallies and ships of ower, accompanied with five hundred great flips of burden, full of all forts of engines of batterie, and of necessarie municions for fuch an army. All the rownes almost of Sicilia yeelded themselues vnto him, sauing Motte, An CYRE, SOLES, EGESTE, PALERME, and ENTELLE. Leptines his brother and Admirall, lay be. fore Mory E, and befreged it and himfelf ipoiled all the country of the Solentines, Paler. MITANS, and ANCIREIANS: and befreged Egeste, and Entelle, and gaue them diversaf. faults. Newes being brought vnto him that Himileo was at hand, he went and encamped before MOTYE, a towne firuated within a litle Isle of Sicilia, halfe a league from firme land, stately built, and very rich at that time. The which he affaulted by sea and by land, draue Himileo and his forces back, and wan the towne by affault but they fold their lives and towne very deare, hauing killed a great number of the enemies before they were forced. The Sicilian's yet angry in their harts for the mischiefes they had endured through the insolencie of the CARTHAGINI-ANS in the former wars: were fo brued in bloud, that al those of Motys were put to the sword, They that faued themselues in the temples, had their lines granted them: but Dionysius made them albe fold by the drum. Whilest he was occupied there, the Egestans made a sallievpon the campe which he had left beforethe towne, and fet it on fire, which burnt the most part of his foldiers, and the reft wel warmed, faued them felues as they could. But Dionyfius not much regarding this loffe, fet vpon all the townes of the Carthaginians with his army. They for # their part, gaue all the authority and power to Himileo, to prepare for this warre of Sicilia. He made an army of three hundred thousand footmen and of a great number of horsemen, and gaue the rende-vous to the shippes of burthen at PALERME: where he arrived with his fleetof gallics that followed him. The Admirall Leptines having descried his comming, set forward with his ships, and fought with them in the maine sea: he killed five thousand of his men, sinke fiftie flips, and two hundred carts of war; and the rest of them saued themselves by slying. But Himileo having landed his armie, went and affailed Morre, and wanne it againe of the Syrk-

At that time Dionysius was before EGESTE, where word being brought him of the arrivall of the Carthaginians, and of the taking againe of Motye, he began to be affraid, and to take aduice to returne to Syracysa: he commanded the Sicilians to retire, and made their lands waft to difaduantage their enemies by so much the more. This sudden change of Dionyfine, was cause that many of his friends tooke part with Himileo, who seeing his affaires prosper To well, made his armie march to MESSINE : tooke in (passing by) the Ile and towne of LYPA-RE: and then befreged the MESSINEANS foftraightly, that in the end he wan the towne by affault. And there having refreshed his troupes, he razed the towne to the very ground, the which did so much amaze the Sicilians, that all, except the Assarins, turned vinto the Cartha-GINIANS. Dionyfins being at his wits end for fo many loffes, did fortifie the strong holds that were in the territoric of the LEONTINES, fentthe CAMPANIANS to ÆTNE, that dweltin the towne of CATANE: and taking order for his affaires the best he could possible, he went into the field with foure and thirty thousand footmen, and a thousand horse, and lodged under the mount Taur, where the banished men of Syra cysa, were placed, fauoured by the Carthagi-NIANS, and had fortified it, and made it in forme of a towne: whilft he made his abode there, newes came vnto him that the army of the Carthaginians was deuided into two, and that the one part of them went by land to CATANE with Himileo: and the other came towards him by sea, led by Mago. He hoping to make this fleet as nothing, commanded his brother Leptines to make out with his shipping against Mago. But Leptines was put to flight, with the losse of twenty thousand men, and well neare an hundred of his ships. This losse draue Dionysus into fuch a feare, doubting befides lest Mago following his victory should draw towards Sy-RACVSA, which was easie to be wonne having no garrison in it: he retired into his city, and from thence fent men into ITALY and into GRECE, to pray aidagainft the CARTHAGINIANS.

Himilto knowing his retraite, brought all his forces immediatly vnto Syracvsa, befieged it by Himilto beland and by sea, wan the suburbes of Acradine, and set up his paulion in the temple of Inpiter Olympian, all the other temples of the suburbes having bene rifled by the souldiers. In the meane time Polyxemus brought to the aide of the towne, thirty ships of their friends under the conduct of Pharacidas, a Captaine of the LACED EMONIANS. With this aide, and all the ships of burthen, Dionysius putto the seato go get victuals. But now whilst he was at the sea in his voyage, the Syracvsans being carefull to looke to their citie, and spying out all occasions to mischiefe the besiegers: they described a boatethat brought corne to the campe of Himileo. Whereupon on the sodaine they armed all their galleys, and fought so valiantly with the Car-THAGINIANS, that they tooke their Admirall with twenty others, and sunke foure of them, and followed the rest that sled, vnto the very place where their ships lay at anker within the great hauen, prouoking the to battel. But y CARTHAGINIAN saftonicd with this overthrow, stirred not.

Then the Syracusans fastened the galleys prisoners unto the poopes of theirs, and The Syrabrought them into the city. Whereupon they being couragious againe for this little aduantage coloris they had of their enemies: they began to talk camong themselves, how the tyranthad bene many times ouercome, and that they to the contrary without him had ouercome the CARTHAGI-NIANS. And thereupon gathering together by troupes, they went speaking one to another, that they were weary with feruing a tyrant, and now specially having meanes to put him downe for euer for before they were difarmed, but now by reason of the wars they had their armes in their hands. Notwithstanding they daily held this talke, Dienysius made the people to assemble, and praised them highly for the good service they had done perswading them furthermore to be of good courage, for within few daies he would make an end of this war. But as the affembly of the people was ready to go their way, Theodorus a Syracvsan, judged to be one of the best men of armes within the towne, stepped vp, & made a long oration, in the which after he had by peecemeale laid open all the tyrannies, cowardlinesse, and wicked deeds of Dionysius, whom he called grammarian, clerke, a careleffe man, ignorant of the affaires of war, oppreffor of al Sicilia, & fauorer of all theenes and ill men of the world: he perswaded them by diners reasons to indepor themselves to recover their liberty. And since that their allies of ITALY & GRECE were within thecity, that they should bring backe againe the power and authority to create such captaines as they should thinke good, into the hands of the citizens, according to the tenure of their ancient lawes, or else into the hands of their ancestors & first founders, which were the Corinthians oratthe least into the LACEDÆMONIAN's hands, who had then y seigniority of al GRECE. The Stracy san's being maruelloufly moved with fuch afpeech, beheld the countenance of their confederates affiftants in this affembly: vntill fuch time as Pharacidas being gotten vp into the pulpit for orations, made every man hearken, supposing it should be he that should begin first to a Spatian flir vp and encourage others to the recovery of their liberty. But to the contrary, he being particularly friend to Dionyfius, began to tell them, that his Lords had fent him to aide the Syracusans & Dionyfins against the CARTHAGINIANS, not to destroy them, nor to abolish his estate, fans. This speech being cleane contrary to that the common people expected, the souldiers strangers ran ftraight about him. Wherupon the Synacusan's ftirred not, fauing that to themselnes they curfed the LACED EMONIANS, because that hertofore they had fent them Aristus, who pretending he came to aide them for to recouer their liberty, was a traitor and fold them; and now that this Pharacidas had broken the harts of their courages, being well disposed to root out this tyranie. For Dionyfie, he spake smoothly for the time, being throughly asraid they would have set ypon him, and fo dismissed the assembly, ysing the most gracious words ynto them he could posfibly. To others he gaue presents, he sent for others to come & eate with him at his table. In the meane time the plague strangely possess the campe of the Carthaginians, and in a short The Caribatime killed wel neare 150000 of them: whereupon the most part of them were for saken aliue & giniant plants dead, the contagion was so horrible. Some imputed it partly to the discommoditie of the place, and excessive number of men living as it were on heapes together: partly vnto the vengeance of God punishing their pride, the insolencies, cruelties, and sacriledges of the CARTHAGINI-

ANS. Dianylius vinderstanding of this miserie, would not vainely let slippe such a fit occasion,

vpon the litle barks, & to shut them within the city. To be short, he brought them to such extremity, that they fent fecretly vnto him to pray him to fuffer that which was faued from the ouerthrow the day before to passe the sea, and to retire home to Africk with safetic: promising to make him a prefent of an hundred and fourescore thousand crownes. His answer was that if was not possible al should be faucd, yet he was contented the natural CARTHAGINIAN'S should paffe. For he doubted much that the Syracysans and their friends would never fuffer him to respite those other, if they once understood it. But he did it of purpose, being vnwilling that the army of CARTHAGE flould be veterly destroyed, for feare that when the Syracvans should feethemselues free from this feare, they would remember the Oration of Theodorus, and put too all their force to recouer their liberty againe. The mony promifed him being deliuered, Himileo imbarked by night all the naturall CARTHAGINTAN'S that were left into forty gallies, and made faile immediatly towards A FR t C K E . Howbeit he was feant out of the hauen, but certaine CORINTHIAN'S perceived his stealing away, and suddenly came to tell it to Diony sim, who feeming to be very greatly busied, commanded to found the alarme, and that the Captaines should prepare themselves to follow him. The Corinthians seeing he went but faintly to worke, would tarie no longer, but cuen at the present houre imbarked themselues, drew vother ankers, and rowed hard after their enemies: fothat in a short space they ouertooke the rereof their veffells, and for udely hurt them, that they funke fome of them. Immediatly after, Dionifius drew his army into the field : but the SICILIANS, friends vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, had gotten the flart before croffing the country, infomuch that the more part of them got hometo their houses. For this cause Dinny size having left a guard to keepe the passages by the high waies, he brought his army backe against to the enemics campe. The barbarous people seeing themfelues betrayed by the Generall, for faken of the naturall CARTHAGINIANS and SICILIANS, their hearts were killed, and began to flie, stealing away, some this way, some that way: but all of them in manner fell into the hands of the fouldiers that guarded the high wayes. Those that were left came before Dionylius, and casting downe their armes, befought him to take pittle of them, and to faue their lives: the Spaniards onely excepted, who gathered themselves toge. ther with their armes, and fent vnto him to offer their feruice, if it would pleafe him to accept them: the which he did, and received them into pay among the fouldiers strangers. For therest, he tooke the other prisoners, and gaue their baggage in prey to his souldiers. For Himilto, after he had lived ignominiously and poorely at CARTHAGE, hee died distract of his wits. Some hold opinion that immediatly after he was arrived, not able to endure the shame he got in this war, he killed himfelfe.

Dionyfius having driven the CARTHAGINIANS OUT OF SICILIA, he built vp MESSINA again which they had ruined. Then he went to befiege TAVROMENION, fortified by the SICILIANS who luftily gaue him the repulse, and made a fally upon him, & killed the most part of his men, having much ado to escape himself. On the other side, Mago chiefe of the African's in Sici-LIA, did courteoufly intreate his allies, and received into his protection all those whom Dionyfius oppressed. By which occasion having wonthe hearts of the most part of them, he became so firong in a short time, that he got a great army againe on foot, marched with the to MESSINA, and oueranne all the plaine country; where having gotten a great booty, he tooke vpon him to befiege the Abacenians confederates of Dionyfius: who being bound to aide them, he went against the CARTHAGINIAN's, beate Mago in a conflict, and killed eight hundred of his men. So having brought his troupes to Syracvsa and refreshed them, he armed a fleet of an hundred veffels, to go and make war with those of RHEGE, and comming to their hauen by night, at that instant time he did fiercely assaile them, set fire on their gates, and set vp scaling ladders in dinerse parts: neverthelesse the RHEGIANS defended themselves so couragiously, that he was forced to retire. And therupon receiving certain intelligence what great preparations they made at CARTHAGE to begin the warre againe: he left RHEGE, and returned againe to SYRACVSA. So the Carthaginians had gotten together againe fourescore thousand men, whom they fent into Cicilia vnder the conduct of Mago. But before they came to ioyne with the enemies, they concluded peace with these conditions, that every one should enjoy that they had gotten: That one of them should not quarrell with the other for any thing: That Dionysius might without breach of peace make war with the TAVROMENITANS. These being thus agreed vpon betweene them, Dionysius went and besieged TAVROMENION the second time, and did more furioufly furiously affault it then before: so that in the end, after long resistance of them that were besieged, he wanne the towne, draue out the Sicilians that dwelt there, and did replenish it with ftrangers whom he kept in pay. Afterwards because his army should not be idle and mutinous, hee chose twenty thouland footmen, and three thousand horse, and went into ITALIE with them, next adioyning vnto Sicilia, to subdue those Greeks which had dwelt there of long time. Newes being brought vnto them of Diony fius intention, they affembled al the effates of the country of Croins, where they al refolued to joyne together to repulse this common enemy; and making all the forces they could, establishing Elorica banished man of Syracus A their Chiefraine, they made their army march against Dionysius, who camped before the citie of CAVLONE. Hevaderstanding of their comming, raised his siege suddenly to go and meette with them : and the next morning after his departure, by breake of the day, he gaue charge vp- Dionifus on the GREBKES with his troupe well appointed, who marching diforderly, he killed their she Greekes Chiefraine, and the valiantest men of their army; and afterwards besieged the others that had that dwelf faued them felves in a rowne, and compelled them to yeeld for that they had no water. Yet con- in Italy. trary to all mens expectation, he yied them very courteoufly, and fent them home fafe without ransome. After he had won this goodly victory, he led his army into the territorie of the RHE- The Rheeide or an s, whom he hated to the death. They having no friends, and too weake of themselves to confrained relist such a mighty enemy, were constrained to make peace with him with very hard conditions. For he made them give him threescore gallies, an hundred and fourescore thousand bardondicrowness, and for hostage and observation of other articles, an hundred of the chiefest of the towne. From thence he returned to be fiege CAVLONE, and held them fo straight, that he wan it by affault, deftroyed it, and gaue the lands vnto them of Lock Es.

But for as much as he could not forget the vnreconciliable hatred he bare vnto the Ruegi-ANS, he having demanded on a time one of their daughters in mariage, they report, that the answer they made in an open affembly of the towne vnto his Ambassadors, was that they wold giue him none of them, vnleffe he would marrie the hangmans daughter of the towne: this made him refolue that he would fee the end of it. And where before he had made peace with them, it was not for any good wil he bare them, nor that he defired their friendship, but because he would take their gallies from them, hoping that after he had left them bare at the sea, he pissured a should come closer to them, and have them at his discretion. Therefore whilest he was in ITA- in bird 23-LIE, he fought nothing elfe but to take an occasion to make warre with them, fothat he might rane. not be charged, that contrary to his faith he had broken the edict of pacification. Hauing therefore led his army vnto the ftraite, making as though he would paffe into Sterlin, he fent vnto the RHEGIANS to demand victuals for his army promifing to fend them so much againe vpon his returne to Syracysa. Which he did, to the end that if they refused, he might excuse himself Dionysius well if he did fervoonthem: and if they did give him any, it should then turne to the hurt of the towne, which if it came to be befieged, should be constrained for famine to hold up their hands breaketh to him. The RHBGIANS that least doubted his malice, furnished him with victuals for certaine dayes: but perceiving he taried there too long, now counterfeiting he was ficke, then that he vsed other delayes to prolong time, they began to see his fetches, and refused to victuall him any more. Thereupon he faining to be much offended, fent them home their hoftages, and came to befrege the towne: and coming hard to their wals, made daily & continuall affaults, beating upon the wals with great engines which he had made expresly of an incredible greatnesse. They having chosen a valiant man for their Captaine, called Phyton, and furnished all those that were able to beare armes in the towne, they defended themselves couragioufly, and did many waies hurt their enemies: and specially in a fally they made Dionysius was fore hurt with a launce in the flancke, that he was like to haue died; but being recourred and well againe, he purfued his purpose more obstinately then euer: whereby he tooke all hope of aide from them, and having continued siege there eleven moneths all together, in the end the RHEGIANS found themselves in great want of victuals of all forts: for a bushell of wheate was at fiftie crownes. After that all kind of corne failed them, first they did eate up their horses, and all kind of beafts of burthen. Then when they had no more to eate, they did feeth all their hides and leather they could finde within the towne, and fo lined awhile. And last of all, comming out of the towne, they did eate and deuoure vp fuch hearbes and rootes as they could finde by their walles, euen as wild beafts. Dienysiue perceiuing it, in stead of pitying of them (nay rather defiring they should eate one another of them) he caused the grasse to be cut downe, and put his beaftes in the campe into it, to feede of all that was along the towne walles and ditches, to the end they should have nothing more to eate. So that in the end the poore RHE-A GIAN'S ouercome by necessity, were constrained to yeeld themselves and their towne to the difcretion of the tyrant. Who being entred into the towne, found heapes of bodies dead of that plague of famine; and fuch as were yet aliue, seemed rather ghosts then liuing persons. So he gathered together about fix thousand prisoners, whom he sent alto Syracvs a suffering not withstanding all that could ransome themselves, (paying a talent) to be redeemed: and the rest to be fold by the drumme to him that would give most. Amongst the prisoners there was Phyton and his fonne. Diony fines made his fon to be drowned first and the next morning after, he made the father to be tied to the highest engine of battery he had, and sent to tell him news of the death of his fon. He was happier by a day then his father, faid Phyton: who was drawne all the towne ouer, and whipped most shamefully: having a fergeant at his back that cried out aloud, that Diony, fim made him be whipped thus, because he had made the RHBGIANS take armes against him. But Phyton that had shewed himselfe like a valiant captaine and worthy man in this siege, and had lived honorably all his life time, did patiently endure the paine which the tyrant made him fine. fer. For he remained constant, speaking out aloud that every body heard him: That he was pur to death, because he would not betray his country, and deliver it into the tyrants hands; howbeit that within few daies the gods would be reuenged of him for this outrage. His constancie was such, that it moved Dionysius souldiers to compassion: who began already to murmureagainst him. Wherfore fearing lest they shold be so bold to take him out of the tormentors hands. he made them leave whipping of him, and commanded that they should drowne him in these with all his kinred, which was done: for the rest, the city of RHEGE was razed to the ground.

Thus have we made a large discourse of the practises and wars of Dionysius, Now let vs speake The private fomthing of his private government. He had wit enough, but troubled with many vices: &the more he grew in yeers, the more it was corrupted. The flatterers made an end of his destruction for they called his cruelty, the hate of wicked men, & good inflice; & made him beleeve that he was a most worthy man in all things: insomuch that he thought himselfe the onely man of the world, and would be so reputed. Being thus caried, and seeing himself at good ley sure, he entred into a course which he had somwhat discotinued during the wars, & wher with he was strangely taken: which was, to write verses, & to make tragedies. He fell to this study again with more diligence then before, & fent for Poets out of all parts, whom he honored, & gaue prefents vnto, because they should correct his works of Poetry. They seeking to gratifie him for their profit, said nothing but that which they thought should be most pleasing vnto him: so that being pust vp with their flatteries, he gloried more in his verses, then he did in his warres. Now amongst other Poets that followed him, there was one they called Philoxenus, a learned man, and excellent to write hymnes in praise of the gods. Diony sius one day gaue him a tragedy of his to peruse & correct; he croffed it all ouer from one end to the other; and one night being asked what he thought of certaine poefies which the tyrant made, he spake openly, that they were worth nothing. He answered so plainly, that Dionysius angrily said, it was of enuy that he censured his works so, and fent him forthwith to dig in the quarry pit. The next morning his friends intreated Dionysius to pardon him, which he did: would have him againe to supper with many others of his fort. In the midst of this feast, Dionysius that defired nothing more then to have his verses heard, rehearfed some of them, and of those especially which he thought best done. Then turning himselse The conflat to Philoxenus, he asked his opinion. But he answered him neuera word, but looking about him, called one of Dionysius guard, and faid vnto him: Cary meagaine to the quarry pit. Dionysius smiling at it, bare this nip well: and soone after taking Philoxenus apart, perswaded him not to be so sharpe. His friends also told him that he might easily forbeare to speake so freely to no purpose. Then Philoxenus made him an answer all new, saying, that from thenceforth he would keep such a weight on his words, that he would speake the truth, and keepe himself in Dionysius fauor, as he did. For Dionysius having rehearsed certaine verses sul of great lamentations, to moue the hearts of the hearers to pity, he prayed Philoxenus to fay his mind of the who answered him, that those verseshad filled him ful of pity. It was a sharpe gird of mockery which Dionysius perceiued not, no more then that which Melanthius spake of a tragedy after the like fort, that he could not see it, it was fo darke of speech. And so was Plato not much better vsed then Philosenus. Dion his disciple and brother in law of Dionysius, had spoken so much good to this tyrant, that being at leviure he was contented to fee Plate, and to heare him. So they being together, their talke agenerally was all of vertue: but chiefly they disputed, what was true force and prowesse: Where Plate proued vnto him, that tyrants were nothing leffe then valiant men. Out of that, turning his talke to speake of Instice: he shewed him that the life of the just was very happy: and that to the contrary, the life of vniust men was most wicked. Insomuch that the tyrant seeing himselfe Dionysius convinced, could no longer endure talke with him: and was forie to fee those that were prefent fo much to effectine of him, and to take fuch fingular pleafure to heare him speake. So at the pake truth laft his choler being up, he asked him, what businesse had brought him into Sicilia. To seeke canfeth him an honest man, said Plato. And how: (replyed Dionysius) by the gods (to heare thee speake) it seemeth thou hast yet found none. Dion thought his choler should go no further, and so sent Plato away in a gallie, whom Polis captaine of LACEDEMON brought backe againe into GRECE. But Dionylius prayed this captain fecretly, that whatfoever he did he should kill Plaso by the way or at least wife fell him; adding to this least withall. He shall be neuer a whit the worse for that; for ifhe be a just man, he shall be as happy being a seruant as otherwise. And so Plate was fold in the Ile of ÆGINE for the price of 200 crownes, and afterwards bought againe by Annicerius a Philosopher, and sent to ATHENS.

Dionylius gaue him felfe to al Poësie, & sent for the best singers he could recouer in the games

Olympials, to rehearle and fing his verses before the people. The singers at the beginning were heard with admiration of enery body, for the goodnesse and finenesse of their voices; but when they came to examine their fongs, they were despised, mocked, & whistled at, which angred him extreamely when he heard of it. So this passioned desire did so much increase in his head continually, that he became almost as a man beside himselfe: and said that his faithfull friends did enuie him, and began to be at defiance with them, as if they had bene traitors vnto him. To conclude, this fury of his did fo possesse him, that he did put many to death vpon false occasions, and banished others, as Philistus, and Leptines his brother, both of them valiant men, and that had done him great fernice in his wars. Howbeit afterwards he fent for them againe, and they were his friends as before. But fince we are now to talke of his cruelties, let vs fay fomthing as we paffe have come to him at night, but that he had it feiled in his mind to commit fuch an act in the day.

Leptines being defirous one day to describe Sigilia in his presence, tooke a halbard from one of the fouldiers of his guard, & with the but end of it drew on the ground that which he would:

wherewith Dionysus was so angry, that he bitterly tooke vp Leptines, and put the souldier to death that had given him his halbard. Diony lies one day being difposed to disport himselfe some way, gaue his Bardaffe his fword and his cloke to keepe: which one of his familiars perceiuing, faid. And what, do you trust this yong boy with your life ? The youth began to smile at it: but

Dionyfius made him be killed, because by smiling he seemed to allow of this word: and he also dispatched the other because he had shewed him the mean to kill him. He was determined to have put his brother in law Polyxemus to death: but he having an inkling of it, fled out of Sicilia.

Dionysius sent to Tescha his sister, and child with her, because she had kept his slying away close thing before he was gone, for it had bene more honorable for me to haue bene called the wife of Polyxemus banished, then fister to thee a tyrant. Dionysius was blank at this speech, & the Syra-evsans wondered at the vertue of this woman: infomuch that after the tyranny was destroyed.

they did not leaue to do her all the honor that they could have done to a Queene: and when she

own mother, but caused her to be strangled, though she was very old. And as for his brother Le- Hespared ptines, he fuffered him to be killed by his enemies, albeit he might eafily haue faued & deliuered not his own him at that time. Some talked of his yrannie in a barbers shop, and said it was well established, brother.

and also evill to be destroyed, as the Diamond to be broken. I maruell said the Barbar, smiling, how you say that of him, vpon whose throat I passe my razour so often? These words being brought to Dionylius, he hanged the Barber. He had put to death at divers times ten thousand of his citizens, and though he had written in one of his tragedies, that tyrannie was the mother of iniuftice: notwithstanding he had oftentimes this word in his mouth. That children must be decciued with plaies, & men with faire promifes. And he faid that the greatest pleasure, and cotents ment he found in all his government, was, that what he wold have done, was fodainly executed.

One day he would have had money of the Syracvsans: they complained and lamented, befeeching him to hold them excused, telling him they had no money. He to the contrarie, made them to be asked by others: which he did twife or thrife one after another. And as he continued ftill vrging of them yet further: it was told him they did nothing but laugh, as they walked in the market place. Then he commanded his receivers to preffe them no more; for it is a figne. faid he, that they have no more, fince they make no account of vs. His mother being pastage to marie, would needs marie a yong man. He answered her, that indeed it was in his power to break the lawes of Syracvsa, but of nature, not. He fenerely punishing all other malefactors, pardo. ned theeues that tooke away mens gownes and clokes whom they met by night in the firectes: to the end that for this cause the Syracusans should leave to make feasts and assemblies. wherein they could not keepe themselves from speaking and completting against him. On a time a stranger promised him aloud to teach him secretly, how he should know those that did practife any thing against him. Dionylius prayed him very earnestly. So the other going to him. Giueme fuid he, fixe hundred crownes, that the Syraevsans may thinke thou half learned of methe fignes to discover the conspirators. He gave them him, and fained that he had learned these meanes of him; greatly commending the subtill fashion to get money which this man had inuented. Hauing heard one day a man that played vpon the citherne paffing well, he openly promifed him the fum of fixe hundred crownes. The next morning he came to demand this Jum: Dionyflus told him:thou gauest me great pleasure yesterday to heare thee play : and so did I thee in making thee this promise; and so thou wert paid in the field for the pleasure thou gauest me, by that that thou received ft. One asked him on a time, If he were not idle. God forbid, faid he, that that should ever happen to me. He being enformed that two young men of the citie drinking together, had spoken many euill words of him and his tyranny at the table: senttoinuite them both to supper with him and seeing that the one after he had drunke a little, saidand did many foolish things: and that the other to the contrarie was very sober: and dranke but feldome: he pardoned the one, as being a drunkard and infolent of nature, and that through drunkennesse had spoken euill of him : but he pur the other to death, as one that bare him euill will in his heart, and being enemy vnto him of let purpose. Some of his familiars reproued him, because he had honoured and aduanced a wicked man, and euill beloued of the Syracysans. And he answered them, I will that there shall be one in Syracvs a, that shall yet be more hated then my selse. Once he fent presents vnto certaine ambassadors of Corint H, which came vnto him. They refused them, because they had a statute in their commonwealth, that did forbid ambassadors to take or receive any gifts of presents of Lord or Prince what soever. He was discontented withall, and told them that they did cuill to take away that onely good which is in tyrannies, that is, to have power to give: but they taught men also, that to receive any good of tyrants, is a thing one flould feare and fhun. Being enformed that a townefman of Syracvsa had hidden a treasure in the ground in his house, he commanded him to bring it him: the which he did, but not all for all that, for he referred a part with the which he went and dwelt in another towne, and bought fome land there: which when he vnderstood, he fent for him to come to him, and restored him all his gold and filuer: Since thou knowest now, said he, how to vse riches, and not to make that unprofitable which is made for the vie of man.

Now his crueltics and tyrannous behauiour made him maruellous odious to the world, by reason whereof he entred into such a mistrust of every body, that he made a trench be diggedabout his lodging where he lay, and because he would lye safely, he drew up a draw bridge, and shut himselfe in with great feare, having a great guard without round about him. His wines durst not come into his chamber before they had put off their gowns, he was so afraid lest they should bring a dagger under their gownes. Yea his brother and his owne fon were faine to put off their clothes, and the guard of his chaber should come naked what source he was that put his footinto

it: then there was another garment cast upon him. He was afraid of his owne son as much as of any other, doubting that when he felt his owne courage, and frequented men of vinderstanding. he would make fome complot against him, and in the end thrust him out of his seate and signiorie. He locked him vp in a chamber, and would fuffer no man to come and speake with him: where for lacke of other occupations, this yong man occupied himselfe to make little coaches or charrets, candleftickes, faddles, ftooles, and tables of wood. Neuertheleffe, after he had some more libertie, and that his father beganne to let him come abroad; he straight grew to be proud and diffolute as might be. And they fay, that when he had rauished a town fimans wife by force, his father being angrie with him, asked him: Whether euer he had feene him do any fuch thing or not? the fon answered him: No more had you a father that was a tyrant. But Dionysius Diony sius replyed vpon him againe: So shalt thou neuer haue a son at all, if thou leauest not to play mippingly these wicked parts. Another time going to see his son in his lodging, and seeing there great store by his son. of veffels of gold and filuer, he told him: there is nothing in thee of a Lord or Prince, fince I have given thee such a deale of gold and filuer plate, and yet thou knowest not how to get a friend. It was an ordinary thing with Dionyfius to tell wonders, & do litle, being so exceeding timorous. But specially after the execution of his Barber, & that his daughters were now waxen great, he would not abide that any should clip his haire with fizers: but he made an image-maker of ima- Dionystus ges of earth to come to him, who with a burning coale burnt his glib round about his head. Now he made himselfe to be knowne by a memorable fact he did: which was this. A certaine flatte- zers, singuit rer called Damocles, praifing the maiestic and riches of Dyonisius, & the magnificence of his pallace, maintained that the Sun neuer faw a more happie man. Diony fins to make him partaker of this felicitie, made him fit downe upon a litle bed very fumptuous, and inriched with wonderfall precious things. Then he caused them to set up tables laden with vessels of gold and filuer. and couered with wonderfull daintie meates, a number of fine Pages attending on his feruice, perfumes passing rare and most excellent sweet for the chamber, and daintie musicke both with voice and instruments. To be short, all the pleasures and pastimes possible to be thought of, did compasse this minion of court round about. But in the midst of all his magnificent furniture Dicompatie this minion or count round about. Dutilitie them of a longitus caused a naked word, glistering, and sharpe pointed, to be fastened to a small haire of a longitus caused a naked word, glistering, and sharpe pointed, to be fastened to a small haire of a longitus caused had so much horse, and to be hanged right ouer Damoeles head; who forgetting this felicitic he had so much a flatterer well served. commended, beforght Dionysius it might quickly be taken away. And like as he was cruell vnto men fo did he shew himselfe a despiser of his proper gods, wherof we will alleage some examples. Having facked the temple of Proferpine in the citie of Lockes, he tookethe fea, and ha- Dionysius uing a gale of wind at pleafure. You fee, faid he how the immortall gods do fauour facriledges. He tooke off a cloke of fine gold from Inpiter Olympian, in the towne of Syracvsa, which cloke weighed fourefcore and five talents, which are more woorth then fifty thousand crownes, and gaue him another of woollen, faying: that the cloke of gold was too cold for winter, and too heavie for fommer: and that the woollen cloke would be more convenient in both seasons. He rounded also the statue of Apollo, which had a glibbe of gold. And finding that money went low with him, by reason of his great expences in the wars he had against the CARTHAGI-NIAN s, he tookethe fea with a fleete of threescore gallies, with pretence to set vpon pirates, but indeed it was to spoile a temple of great fame, full of goodly and rich iewels that had bene offered vpthere, the which was feated vpon the edge of the quarter of a citie of TvscAN called A-GYLLE. Being arrived there in the night, and having landed his men: in the morning by breake of day he fudainly and without any danger executed his enterprife. For the place being guarded with some few men, he easily forced it, & afterward at his leysure sacked the temple, where he got to the fumme of 600000 crownes. Which the townesmen vnderstanding, came out vp6 him straight to see if they could defend the temple: but he ouercame them in battel, and having taken a great number of prifoners, he spoiled all their country, and then returned to Syra cysa, where he fold his prisoners and his booty, for the which he had also 30000 crownes more. So being now well stored againe, he began to set up an army and because he saw the townes Dionysias fibiect vnto the CARTHAGINIAN's willing to revolt, he did intice them, & vfed the very gracioufly that came & took his part. The CARTHAGINIAN'S hearing that, fent vnto him to demand the carries their townes, otherwise they proclaimed warre against him. So on both sides they came into the ginians. field. For the CARTHAGINIANS, they dispatched Mago into Sicilia with a great armie. Dio. visitus being afraid of nothing, marched before with histroupes, and being camped neare to a place called CARALEs:both the armies fiercely gaue charge vpo each other, & after a long fight Mago was flaine in the place with 10000. of his men, and 5000. taken prisoners. The CARTHA-GINIANS were not discouraged for all this, but chose the againe the son of Mago for their chiefe Captaine, a yong Gentleman, wife, couragious, and valiant. So after they had stayed Dionylius by a truce for a certaine time, the terme being expired, they presented him a battell, and fought it out fo resolutely, that after they had slaine his brother Leptines (whom he for sook at his need) and fourteene thousand of his men, with much ado he saued himselfe. But the conquerers being neuer a whit prouder of fuch a victory, they fent Ambassadors vnto him that concluded a peace for their aduantage. For beside the towns that remained vnto the, Dionysius paid them 600000 crowns to defray their charges in the wars. Also he kept not this peace long, but brake it shortly after for understanding that the plague was hot amongst the CARTHAGINIANS, and that they were fallen our amongst themselves: he tooke occasion of this advantage, and to give colour to his pretence, gaue it out, that the foldiers Africans had foraged the lands of his friends, wher. upon he leauied anarmy of 30000. footmen, and 3000, horse: with this army he began to make war againe, and in the first employment of his forces he wan Selinonte & Entelie and after that he marched to Lilybe e to besiege it: but seeing it well guarded, he returned backe againe. Hereupon newes was brought him, that fire had taken some of the arsenals of the CAR-THAGINIAN s:wherfore supposing all their ships of war had bene burnt, he began to scoffe at al their forces. But they having armed vpon a fodaine a fleet of 200. gallies, affailed vnlooked for 130.0f Dionyfus gallies, which wintered in the hauen of Er 1x, some of them he funk, & brought away the others. After this loffe Dionyfius retired into Syracvs a, and fell very fick. The which Dion perceiving entred into talke of his children, and of his fifter Aristomache. But the Physitians to curry fauor with yong Diony fins, hindered him that he could have no fit time to fay any thing to him. Or as Timaus writeth, they gaue him drinke (as he had commanded them) to make him fleepe, and by this meanes tooke from him his fenfes, joyning death with fleepe. Some others fay, that he was killed by his guard: others, that he was poisoned. But Diodorns y Sicilian fetteth downethe cause after another sort: which is this. He caused, said he, a little before, a tragedy of his intituled, The LENEIANS, to be plaid at ATHENS: & having gotten the victory, one of the musitians brought him word of it by sea: which did so please him, that after he had richly rewarded the messenger, he made a great sacrifice to the gods to give the thanks for this prosperity, & fumptuous feafts, vnto the which he inuited al his friends, and dranke fo largely, that he fell into a great ficknesse wherof he died. Now he had in times past an oracle, that had foretold he should dye then, when he had ouercome those that should be worthier then himselfe. He applyed this oracle to the Carthaginians, supposing it was meant by them, because they were stronger then he. This was the cause that oftentimes in the battels he had wonne against them, he being victor, fled, or willingly fuffered himselse to be ouercome because of this prediction. Howbeit he could not shun his destinie: for being an ill Poet, he was judged by the sentence of corrupt iudges, to haue excelled all the other Poets better then euer he was: and then came he to end his daies, as the oracle had foretold him. Now though he had reigned the space of 38. yeers full out, and had boafted many times that he would leave his fonne a Principality chained with strong chains of a diamond: this yong Dionysius ruled no long time, but being shortly after driven out of Syra cysa by the inhabitants themselves, secondly by Dion, and at the last by Timoleon, who ouerthrew him altogether he was sent to Corinth, where he ended the rest of his daies in mifery. Afterwards the Syracysans, maintaining their liberty for the space of 20. yeers: they fell into Agathocles hands, who also committed terrible cruclties. After his death, they being full of civill diffention, demanded aide of Pirrhus king of Epirvs against the CARTHAGINIANS. He having made a journy into Sicilia, was constrained to leave it, and had great war with the Ro-MAINS. By reason wherof the Syracvsans willingly yeelded themselves vnto Hieron y second of that name, vnder whom (a great friend of the Romaines) they prospered the space of fifty yeares. But after his death, his litle fon Hieronymus, a yong Lord and vnruly, took part with the CARTHAGINIAN s: and having reigned only fifteene moneths, he was killed by his guard. Now for that his death brought on great confusions and that the Syracysans enclined to the Car-THAGINIANS partithe Confull Marcellus went to befiege Syracus a, and tooke it in the fecond yearc of the 142. Olympiade. So that afterwards it was gouerned by Prætors, and according to the ROMAINE law, even to the declination of their Empire.

Ccia, the daughter of Accius Balbus and of Iulia the fifter of Iulius Ca- The descent far, was maried vnto the father of this man, whose life we write of faugustus now, and who was descended of the ancient race of the Octavians, iffued out of the country of the Volses, and knowne at Rome from the time of Tarquinius, and of Servius Tullus. Their sonne Ottavius was borne in the yeare of the Consulship of Cicero and of Caius Antonius, at that time when as the conspiracie of Catiline was discouered, and suppressed. He was called Thurinus: but afterwards, according to the tenor of his vnkles testament, who made him his heire, he was called Caius Iulius Cafar, and lastly Augustus, by the advice of Munatius Plancus, and by the decree of the Senate. He was but foure yeares old when his father died, and at twelue yeares he made the funerall oration for his grandmother Iulia: foure yeares after that, he became a gownman, though he were but yong: yet his viikle gaue him a present at his returne out of Africk E. fuch as the fouldiers are accustomed to have of their Captaines. Shortly after he followed his vakle into Spaine, whither he was gone against the children of Pompey, and passed through many great dangers to ouertake him. This warre being ended, because Casarvndertooke other Augustu longer iournys, Octavius was fent into the city of Appolonia: and there plied his booke very fludied at diligently. And it chanced him, without having any minde to it, that being gone to see Theogenes a learned Astronomer, he cast his nativitie, and suddenly he leapt being amazed, and honoured him. The which made Octanius conceine great hope of himselfe, and in memory of this good hap, he caused certaine peeces of money to be coined, and he himselfetold Augustina the opinion of Theogenes. Being returned from Appolonia to Rome, after his vnkle was declared flaine by Cassius, Brutus, and their allies, he declared himselfe to be his heire, though his mother himselfe and Marcus Philippus were of another mind. And having put himselfe forward, he governed line cafar.

the commonwealth of Rome, first with Antonius and Lepidus: afterwards with Antonius the space of twelve yeares: and lastly himselfe alone, the space of four and forty yeares. But before we speake of his government of common affaires in time of peace and warre, letys fav fornewhat (after Swetonius) of his family and his maners. He married being yet very yong the daughter of Publius Servilius Isauricus: but having made peace with Antonius after the Warre of Myting, and at the request of their armies, who were defirous to see them friends, he married with Clodia, the daughter of Publius Clodius and of Fuluia then wife of Intonius. Burbefore he knew her, he fent her to her mother, with whom he was somewhat discontented, and because of the warre of Perovse. Immediatly he married Scribonea, and kept not her long, because she was too troublesome: yet he had a daughter by her called Inlia. But forfaking her, he tooke another which he loued vnto the end: and that was Liuia Drufilla the wife of Tiberius Nero, whom he caried with him great with child as she was, and had no more children by her but one, and yet she went not out her time, and it had no life. His daughter Iulia was married vnto Marcellus, the sonne of his sister Octavia: and after his death vnto Marcus Agrippa, by whom she had three sonnes, Caius, Lucius, and Agrippa: and two daughters. Iulia, and Agrippine. After the death of Marcus Agrippa, he chose for his sonne in law Tiberius the fonne of Tiberius Nero, and Linia Drufilla, at that time a knight of Rome, and compelled him to for fake his wife Vipfamia, of whom he had a fon called Drufus. But as he was fortunate in managing the affaires of the common-wealth, fo was he vnfortunate in his race: for his daughter and his neece Iulia committed so foule faults in Rome, that he was constrained to banish them. Agrippine was married vnto Germanicus, the sonne of his sisters daughter. Caint and Lucius died in lessethen a yeare and a halfe one after another: whereupon he adopted his nephew Agrippa, and his sonne in law Tiberius. But because Agrippa was of a churlish nature and vnhonest, he diddifinherite him, and confined him to Sverentym. His neece Iulia had a child after she was banished, but he would not know it, nor suffer it should be brought vp. He was very modest and continent in all the parts of his life, saving that he was somewhat given to women and play: for the rest, he liked not great pallaces, but was contented with meane lodgings: and if there were any ornament, it was in porches and parkes. His houshold-stuffeand apparell was nothing sumptuous nor costly. It pleased him well to make feasts; he very carefully made choise of his guests, and oftentimes he sate downe at the table a long time after every body, and would rife before others, which remained after he was vp. In his ordinary diethebanished superfluitie of meates, he delighted to be merrie and pleasant among his friends, orto bring in pleasant players of comedies to passe the time away. And he did not tie himselfe to any certaine howres to eate his meate, but when his stomacke served him he tooke something. So that fomtimes he supped not at al, and then when every man was gone, he made them bring him meate, neither dainty nor delicate. Also he drunke very litle wine, he slept in the day, and by times in the night, talking with some, or reading: so that oftentimes he slept not till the breake of day, and for that he tooke no rest in the night, he might chance to sleepe in his litter as they caried him in the streetes in the day time vp and downe Rome. He was a goodly Prince, and that kept himselse in good state from the beginning of his life to the latter end: nor curious to fet himselfe out, as litle caring to be shauen, as to weare long haire: and instead of a lookingglaffe, reading in his booke, or writing, euen whilest the Barber was trimming of him. Whether he spake or held his peace, he had so comely a face, that many of his enemies bent to do him hurt, their hearts would not serue them so soone as euer they looked on him. He had very cleare and lively eyes, but with time he was subject to many diseases and infirmities, the which he remedied with great care. As for his exercises, he left armes and horses immediatly after the ciuill warres: for he was neuer any great fouldier. He would play at tennis, at the ballone, he would go abroad in his coach to walke and stirre himselfe. Sometimes he would go a fishing, or play at the bones, or at nuts with yong children of the Moore's & Syrian's that had some prety maner and behauiour with them, and alwaies spake words to moue laughter. He was learned in the liberall sciences, very eloquent, and desirous to learne: insomuch that during the warre of Mytine, in the middest of all his infinite affaires, he did reade, he wrote, and made orations amongst his familiars. He neuerspake vnto the Senate nor people, nor to his fouldiers, but he had first written and premeditated that he would say vnto them, although he had speech at commandement, to propound or answer to any thing in the field. And because he would not deceive his memory, or lofe time in superfluous speech: he determined ever to write all that he would fay: and he was the first inventer of it. If he had to conferre with any man, or with his wife in any matters of importance: he would put that downe in his writing tables, because he would speake neither more nor lesse. And he tooke pleasure to pronounce his words with a fweete voice and good grace, having continually about him for this purpose a fine man to frame his voice. But one day having a paine in his mouth, he made his oration to the people by an Herauld. He made many bookes and verses of diverse forts; but all is dead with the time. His speech was as the rest of his life, eloquent, well couched together, and sententious. He delighted to reade good authors, but he gathered nothing other then the fentencesteaching good maners: and having written them out word by word, he gaue out a copie of them to his familiars: and fent them about to the gouernours of provinces, and to the magistrates of Rome and of other cities. He was formewhat, and too much given to divinations; he was maruelloufly afraid of thunder and lightning: he had a great confidence in dreames, and in fuch like vanities. But peraduenture we are too curious fearching out his private life: yet that may fometime difcouer great personages more then their publicke actions, in the which they are more carefull to frame their countenances, and do counterfeit most.

Now, as we have lightly runne over his private life before spoken of: so shall the memora. ble deedes done by his authority be briefly represented: being vnpossible to comprehend in a memorate distance. few lines so many notable things, vnlesse a man would make a great booke of them. This is to be white he noted in him, that fo young a man having fo small beginnings, coming out of a meane house in reigned. comparison of others, hath excelled all other young and old men in wisedome and greatnesse of courage: should rife fo high, that before he had bene Prator the Senate gaue him the name of Ingustus, created him mafter of the horie, when as yet he neuer had charge of a company ofmen at armes:proclaimed him Emperour and Soueraigne captaine, afore he had bene placed many publicke office by authority of the Senate. Furthermore, for the first time he was chofen Confull when he was but twenty yeares old: and he was thirteene times Confull, and twenty times called Sourraigne captaine. Afterwards, when he was not yet four and thirty yeares old, the Senate and people of Rome gaue him this goodly name of father of his country, because he had maintained and preserved the commonwealth. It is a wonderfull thing that he could wind himselfe out of somany great affaires and warres, that he could within source and twenty yeares of age, reftore againe into fo good effate the common wealth of Rome, turmoikd and troubled with fo many profcriptions and civill warres as it was. And that afterwards fo long as he commanded alone, he did so firmely establish this Monarchie, that not with standing the infinite troubles received vnder other Emperours, yet it flood vpright and in fo great prosperitic for fo many hundred yeares. After the death of Iulius Cafar, this man being but bare eighteene yeers old came to Rom Bawhere he was welcomed, and immediatly did contest with Antonius, hated of Cicero and of many others: from whence the advancement of this yong Cafar came, and the declaration of the war against Antonius, judged an enemy of the commonwealth, and ouercome by the Confuls Hirtus and Panfa. Cefar who was their affociate, was called Soueraigne captaine, though he had not yet fought: both the Confuls being dead of their hurts. But the Senate after this ouerthrow, beginning to change their mind, he perceiuing that they were flow to grant him the Confulfhip, resolved to possesse it by force of armes, and began to acquaint himselfe with Antonius and Lepidus which were joyned together the made that the souldiers promifed by oath the one to the other, that they would fight against none of Casars troupes, & fent 400. men to Rome to aske for him, in the name of althe army, the office of Conful. They having delivered their charge vnto the Senate, Cornelius the Centiner chiefe of this legation or ambaffade, perceiuing they would give him no present answer, casting vp his cassock & shewing the Senate the pommell of his sword, said vnto them: This shall do it, if you will not do it. So they being returned without obtaining their demand, Cafar made Antonius & Lepidus come into ITALY, and he for his part having passed the river of Rubicon, marched with 8. legions right to Rome. This put all Rome in such a feare, as they sent to present him the Consulship: Augustust and twife fo much ingift, as they had promifed the legions. Now whileft the Ambaffadors were the confuton their way, the Senators beginning again to take hart to them, encouraged by the arrivall of fire by the legions of Africk, they determined to try al meanes before they wold betray the liberty arms. of their country, being minded to call backe that which they had fent to Cafar, and so disposed before, to affure the people that he would make no tumult at all: he drew his legions neare, and made himselse Lord of Rome without one stroke striken: and contrariwise, the people and Senate received him with shew of greatioy. Then, in the assembly of all the people he was chosen Consull, iust at the full accomplishment of twenty yeares of his age. So he demanded in the field that they should proceed criminally against those that had killed his father Casar. 2. Pedius his fellow Confull published the decree. So were Brutus and Cassius, and all their friends condemned, with interdiction of water and fire. But for as much as Jugustus had too small meanes to set Vpon Brutus and Cassius, he reconciled Antonius and Lepidus with the Senate, and made alliance with them, followed with great armies. They ioyned, and were in confultation of their affaires the space of three daies together, neare vnto Bolonia, or vnto Mytine; and as if the Romaine Empire had bene their owne inheritance, they deuided it betweenethem three. So that Cafar had the high and base Lybia, with Sicilia, and SARDINIA. SPAINE and GAVLE NARBONENSE fell vnto Lepidus: and the rest of GAVLE was for Antonius. They did Augustus, decree also that they should be called Trium-viri, appointed for the reestablishment of the com. and Antomon-wealth, with foueraigne authority for fine yeares, to dispose and give the estates and offices to whom they thought good, without asking aduice of the Senate or people. So they established Lepidus Consull for the yeare following in the place of Decimus Brutus that was killed; and they gaue him the guard of Rome and ITALY, follong as they two that remained made their preparations to go against Brutus and Cassius. Besides the presents they should make vnto the fouldiers after the victory, they promifed to give them leave to ease themselves, & eighteene rich townes in ITALY for them to dwell in. Then they began to fet vp arolle of all the citizens of Rome appointed by them to be flainc. And they decreed to every free manthat should bring the Trium-vivi a head of the proferipes, the sum of two thousand fine hundred crownes, and halfe so much vnto the slaues with enfranchisement and the like summe also to who soeuer could discouer any manthat had hidden or fauoured the proscripts. Antonius and Lepidus were thought to be the chiefe authors of this horrible tragedy: and Cafar feemed willing to authors of a none but to the murtherers of his father, and did a long time oppose himselfe against the other two:but at the length he gaue ouer, and they made wonderfull changes, abandoning their owne parents and friends the oneto the other, to be reuenged of their enemies. But when the sword was once drawne, he was no lesse cruell then the other two. Cicero was not forgotten, as we may see in his life; and it would be very hard to describe the wickednesse of that time, the which like a furious streame caried away so many citizens of Rome. In whose history doe appeare most rare examples of all forts of vices and vertues in all maner of persons: of whom we will make mention, after those that have written more at large: as amongst others, Appianus Alexandrinus: which will serue to shew, how much a man is a furious beast, being lift vp in authority

So they did set vp the names of the proscripts fastned in divers places of Rome, to the number of an hundred & thirty Senators for the first time, a hundred & fifty at the second time, and two thousand Knights. Then was the gate open to all villanies and cruelties, fought withall by patience and fidelity: but the examples will shew that better then all the discourse a man can make. Saluius Otho, Tribune of the people, was one of the first: who having inuited his friends to his last supper, a Centener came in, and in the presence of all his guests, halfe dead for seare, strake offhis head. Minutius the Prætor was also killed, fitting in his seate of judgement. L. Villins Annalis, a man that had bene Consull, being escaped out of the hands of the murtherers, saued himselse in the suburbes in a little house of one of his clients: but his owne some having in the common-wealth, and given to revenge. That there is nothing certaine nor fure in mans prosperity, which bringeth much enuieto his servants: as to the contrary, adversity maketh the afflicted contemptible, and every body ashamed of them. But they are wise men, that in such tragicall accidents do carrie an inuincible heart, refolutely obeying necessity, and a more high prouidence then that of man. We must not call that intollerable which may happen to great or meane men for all humane accidents are vnder the feete of Vertue. It chanceth often that force and wifedome do defend a man, as alwaies thefe two vertues do preferue his honour. He is well aduised that can finely pacific and divert the fury of an enemy : as to the contrary, shame and despaire do gripe cowards, flothfull, and fearefull. But in fine, necessity presset on the one side, no patience to stay for the inheritance of his father, bewrayed him vnto the fouldiers, who went to kill him there. Shortly after, this parricide being drunke had a quarrell with the selfe same eides infly fouldiers, who stabbed him in with their daggers. C. Toranius was betrayed in like manner by his punished. owne fonne, who having confumed in a few dayes the fuccession which he had so execrably purfued, and being condemned for theft, was banished into a place where he died for want and pouertie. Now against these wicked, let vs set some vertuous children. Q. Cicero was hid by forme. his sonne, whom they could neuer make confesse (though he was tormented) where his father was: who, not able any longer to endure they should affile fo vertuous a sonne with so many euils for his fake, came and presented himselfe to the murtherers. The sonne began to inmeate them to kill him before his father: but they were both killed at one time. The Egnaces, father and fonne, one embracing the other, were both runne through and flaine at one blow. C. Holidius Geta was buried for dead by his sonne: who saued him, Justained and kept him till it was peace. Arruntius, after he had comforted and strengthened his sonne, put himselfe to the swords of the murtherers. The sonne died immediatly after for griefe, and famine. Some other hildren carefully faued and kept their fathers, and hid them. Certaine women also shewed themselves maruellous faithfull and louing to their husbands: and so were there to the convary, fome vnfaithfull, that discouered their wonderfull wickednesse. Tanusa made such ear- full to their neft fuire, that she obtained grace of Cafar for T. Iunius her husband, who was hidden by Philotumen his bondman enfranchised: whom Cafar knighted for his fidelity to his master. 2. Liga. faithfull: him having bene kept by his wife, was discourred by a slave, and killed: wherefore his wife kilkdherselfe with famine. Lucretius Vespillo, having erred and runne in great danger here and here, not knowing whither to flie, came fecretly to his wife Thuria, and was hidden and kept dose betwirt the feeling and the top of the house, vntill she had obtained his grace of the Trim viri. Apulcius was faued by his wife, who fled with him. The wife of Antius wrapped vp herhusband in couerlets, and made him becaried to the sea as a packet of stuffe, where he imbarked, and failed into Sicilia. Coponius was faued by his wife, who put her honour afide in refice of her husbandslife: for she lent her body one night vnto Antonius to preserue him (which hedid by that meanes,) whom she loued better then her selfe. Now to the contrary, some women vn faithfull to their husbands, deliuered them into the hands of the murtherers, because beymight marrie againe. Amongst other, the wife of Septimius having shamefully given herbody vnto one of Antonius familiars, she caused her husband to be put in the number of the Proferipts, that the might more easily continue her adulterie: and so was Septimius put to death. Q. Vettius Salassus, was hidden in a sure privie place, wherewith he acquainted his wife; but the straight reuealed him to the murtherers. The which he perceiving from a high place where he was, cast himselfe downe headlong, chusing rather to die so, then to make his cruell wife pastime. Fuluius was discoucred by a slaue of his, and his concubine, icalous because he had mried a wife, and had left her; although not with standing he had made her free, and had given hergoods to live withall. Now let vs presently speake of the faithfulnesse and vnfaithfulnesse Enfranchs. offlaues enfranchifed. P. Naso was betrayed by his flaue freed, with whom he had bene too fa- fedflaues miliar. But he fold his death, for he killed the traitor with his owne hands, and afterwards held cherous, outhis neck to the hangman. L. Lucceius had put into the hands of two of his flaues manumiffed foretrue. smuch as was necessary to have relieved him in his banishment: but they ranne away with all, and he came and put himselfe to the slaughter. Haterius, that was in a secret place, was sold and discouered by a slaue of his. Cassius Varus being bewrayed by a freemanthat was his slaue. escaped neuerthelesse, and hid himselse among reedes: where being found by those of Min-IVENES, they tooke him for a theefe, and would have racked him to have bewrayed his companions he discouered himselfe to be a Senator of Rome, but they would not beleeve him, because he was in poore estate. But whilest they were reasoning of the matter, there cometh a centener that strake off his head. C. Plotius was faued by his slaues: but being a man giue to perfume and rubbe himselse with odoriserous ointments, the sent and smell of them discouered him to the souldiers, that went ferriting vp and downe in his house: yet could they not finde him, but truelly tormented his feruants, to make them confesse where he was: which they would never do. But Plotius having compassion of the cuils of his faithfull flaues, came out of the place where he was hidden, and because he would prolong their life, hee shortned his owne, and presented himselfe to the murtherers. Appins Claudius, as he was neare to be had by the backe, changed his tooke off his head, and so he saued his masters head. Another slaue of Menenius did the like. for he went into his mafters litter, and offered his necke to the fword of the murtherers; who dispatched him whilest his master got to the port of the sea, from whence he escaped into Si. CILIA. But the flaue of Vibinus Panopio is worthy of memory enery where: for he hearing the murtherers came to facke his mafter, tooke his mafters gowne from him and his ring, gaue him his owne, and put him out at the backe gate. Then he goeth vp into his mafters chamber, and lay downeypon his bed, where he boldly attended them that killed him for Panopio. Another shewed himselfe no lesse faithfull in the behalfe of Antius Restio: for although his master had throughly thwacked him for his knauish trickes played a few dayes before, and that then it see meth he had oportunity to be reuenged: he to the contrary employed himselfe after a maruel. lous fashion to faue his master: for he meeting with an old man in his journey strake off his head, and shewing that with his whippings together to the murtherers, he made them easily beleque that he had bene well reuenged of his mafter, with whom immediatly after he faued himfelfe in Sicilia. The flaues of Martins Cenforinus kept him along time, and so well, that he had leifure to go to Sextus Pompeius. Q.Oppius an honorable old man, and being almostathe pits brinke, like to be killed, was refcued by his fonne, who having finely gotten him out of ROME, tooke him upon his shoulders, and afterwards led him into Sicilia, whereall the poore diffressed Romaines were gently received: for Pompeius had sent certaine ships to keepe vpon the coast of ITALY, and pinaces every where, to the end to receive all them that sed on that fide: giuing them double recompence that faued a Proscript, and honourable offices to men that had bene Confuls and escaped, comforting and entertaining the others with a most fingular courtefie. Many went into MACE DON to Brutus and Cassius: others into Africke to Cornificius. Some having escaped the tempest that was in the time of sylla, were even glutted with this cruelty: as amongst others, M. Fidustius, and Lucius Philuscius. T. Labienus was one of the number of the murtherers in the profeription of Sylla. Afterwards he did nothing else but go vp and downe with a soule possessed with furies: so that being weary of his life at this time, he went and fate in a chaire at his gate, quietly attending that they should put him in the number of them that should be killed. Statius Samnes, an honourable Senator, being fourefcore yeares old, because theeues should have no part of his goods, he left them in prey to whofocuer would take them: and afterwards fet his house on fire, and burnt himselfe within it. App. nins being kept a good while by his flaues, was fo weary to be shut vp in a troublesome place,& where he lived very poorely, that he came out to the market place, and held out his throat to the murtherers. cestius being possessed with the like griefe, caused his slaues to make a great fire,& then cast himselfe in it. Sulpitius Rufus, a man that had bene Consul, died because of an Ileoshis the which he would not fell vnto Fuluia: as also Ampius Balbus; for that he refused to give this woman a pleafant place of his. Balbus was betrayed by a fernant of his, that shortly after was hanged vpon a gibbet by sentence of the people: and so had his reward for his villanous fact. Antonius did put in the number of Proscripts a Senator called Nonius Struma, and onely to get out of his hands an Emerode effeemed at fiftie thousand crownes. But Monius found the means to escape with his Emerode, to the great despite of him that greedily desired this prey. Some valiantly defended themselves, as Atteins Capito, that killed many souldiers running rudely vpon him, thinking he would have suffered himselfe to be killed as others were. Howbeit after he had fold his flesh deare, he was ouercome by multitude of affailants. Vetulinus aided with his fonne, having many times valiantly repulfed the murtherers, he would have faued himfelfein Sicilia: but in the straight he met with such a number of enemies, that there he was killed. Sicilius Coranas a Senator, was put in the number of Proferipes, and because he would not with others condemne Brutus and Cassius, deuising how to escape, he put himselfe in ranke among those that caried a dead corps to buriall: but he was discoursed and put to death. The Triumviri appointed such men as they liked of to take charge of them that had bene killed. They sold the goods of the Proscripts by the drumme, at such a price as the souldiers would: and yet the most part of them were spoiled and giuen away. They promised the widowes their ioynter, she widowes and to the sonnes the tenth part of the patrimony of their fathers, and to the daughters the twentieth part. Howbeit there were few, and in maner none, that had any benefit by that: but nainement to the contrarie, they facked many that demanded fuch rights. On the other fide, they did exact great fummes of money upon the city of Rome, and ouer all Iraly: the owners were Greaterconstrained to give the halfe of their yearely revenue: the tenants to furnish one yeares rent of by the Trithat they held of others: the masters of houses, the halfe of the rent of their houses, according to umniri. the rent they went for. To encourage the fouldiers, the Triumuiri gaue vnmeasurable gifts, granted them daily new pillage: the legions wintered in the richest townes, who were compelled to feede the fouldiers at their own charge. Furthermore, all the rich men were constrained to pay in nature of a tribute at one time, the tenth part of all that they were worth. To be short, so that they could find out new inventions, it was enough to exact mony. For the feare and custome to endure all, had fashioned men to be more slaues, then the murtherers and exactors would haue had them. And to close vp all, the Triumuiri caused mony to be covned, the which on the one fide had the image of Antonius with an inscription in Latine, the effect whereof is this: eM. Antonius Emperor, Augur, Triumuir, for the establishment of the common-wealth. And on the other fide there werethree hands joyned together, with the markes of the Confulfhip, and had these words: Salus generis humani, that is to say: The health of mankind.

Now during the cruclties of this Triumuirate, Brutus and his followers made themselves strong in MACEDON, and did divers exploits of warre: and were afterwards overcome in the fields PHILIPPIANS, as hath bene faid in the life of Brutus, which we need not rehearse againe. the principall being comprehended there. After this victory, Antonius went into the East to dispose of his affaires in As 1A, and to leavie mony there to pay his souldiers, having promised to enery one of them fine hundred crownes. Cafar returned into ITALY to refresh himselfe, to affigne Colonies to his fouldiers, to pacific the troubles Lepidus had procured, and to fet a pike betwixt him and Pompey at a need, if he were neuer fo litle in league with him. Cafar fell grieuoufly ficke at Bryndysiym: but being recourred againe, he entered into Rome, pacified all things, and kept Lepidus in his wonted degree. But when he came to bring his foldiers into Colonies, then the storme began to rife: for the owners cryed out that they were tyrannized, being driven out of their inheritances: the old fouldiers they complained that promise was not kept with them. Fuluia and some others practifed to set them on, to the end to draw a war into ITA-11, and by this meanes to make Antonius come againe, beforted by Cleopatra. These things proceeded so farre that Fuluia tooke armes, for she was then in the campe, her sword by her side, and commanded like a Captaine. Cafar on the other fide being angry, fent her daughter home tes the allies of Fuluia. In the meane space Lucius Antonius departed in the night with speed, & drmy aentred into Rome by treason: vied it as a citie taken in warre, and draue out Lepidus. Cafar left gainst the Suluidienus to befiegethe Sentinates, returned to Rome, and draue out Lucius, followed him Fuluia: and and shortened his iourney as he was going to GAVLE, shut him vp, and besieged him a great after dritime in PEROVSE, and compelled him through famine to yeeld him felfe, and to craue pardon, with L. An. which he granted him. Perovse was burnt by a strange accident: for one of the chiefest of the of Rome. thy having fet his house on fire, after he had wounded himselfe with his dagger, a boisterous wind being risen upon it, so dispersed the flames abroad, that it burnt al the houses besides. Casar to her, unto whom he was betrothed, and led his army against the Nvrsinians and Sentina. Auguste caused some of his Captaines to be killed that were against him. He condemned the NVRSINIans in a great fumme of money, and because they could not pay it, he draue them out of their city and territorie. Afterwards he suppressed some troubles raised in NAPLES by Tiberius Claudius Nero, father of Tiberius Cafar, and fauourer of Fuluia: who feeing her felfe vinder foote, the fled vnto ATHENS. But Cafar to preuent a new conspiracy, sent Lucius Antonius far from Rome, to command the legions that were in Spaine: he gaue him also commissioners to looke into him, and to observe his actions. He finely draue out Lepidus also into Africk with fixe legions. On the other side Faluia being dead, Casar and Antonius agreed being ready to fight: after that Augustus they made peace with Pompey that gouerned Sicilia. Immediatly after that he went into nimagree GAY LE, to appeale some troubles that happened there, and sent Agrippa before, who compelled and after the AQVITANS to submit themselves, and pacified all GAVLE. On the other side Cneus Calvinus makepeace fubdued the Ceretainein for Pompeins lencies, whereupon they fell together by the eares, and the enemies had the better hand, after he had sharpely reproued them, he took the tenth man of the two first bands, and belaboured lubellius with a cudgell. In the mean time Cafar fent attimes troups of men of armes into DALMATIA and ILLYRIA, to the end to breathe them for other wars that were a hatching, as that of Sici-

Augustus *narmed entreth into Lepidus campe, who ken loseth

The tenth legion caffiered for their infoles words,

LIA was the first. For Menas the pirate, Sextus Pompeius Lieutenant, having for despight brought his fleet vnto Cafar, and taken his part, vnto whom also he delinered the Iles of SARDINIA and Corsica, with three legions, Cofar did him great honors, & refused to deliuer him againe vnto Pompey, who asked him of him. Befides that, Pompey complained of Antonius, and pretending to haue iust occasions, he tooke armes againe. Wherfore Casar sent for Antonius and Lepidus out of GRECE and AFRICK to come to aide him. Antonius came to the hauen of BRYNDVSIVM: but vpon the fudde, not knowne wherefore, he tooke fea againe, & returned from whence he came. Lepidus came too late, which made Cafar (feeing all the weight fall on his armes) that he fent his Lieutenants against Pompey: who fought with them by sea & by land, & had the better, and not Cafar to great trouble, who had like to have bin killed by a flave also that wold have reveged the death of his masters father, that was a proscript. After that Antonius being come to TARENTYM with intention to make war against Cafar, Octavia lister of the one and wife of the other agreed them, fo that they did yet prolong with Lepidus their Triumuirate for flue yeares more. Aninnius went against the PARTHIANS, and Cafar prepared to set vpon Pompey againe. Hercupon Menas being angry for that he was not fo well accounted of as he thought he deferued he returned againe to joyne with Pompey with 7. gallies. Cafars fleet having fustained great hurt by tempest, was also beaten by Menas. Lepidus wan LILYBEE, & took certaine neighbour villages, Calar having repaired his ships and army by sea, and made it stronger then before, under the conduct of Agrippa, who failed vnto Lipar B, he gaue battell by fea vnto Pompeys Lieutenants: Butthey being aided by Menas(that was returned the fecond time) hee ouercame and wanthirty shippes. But the other fleet that Gasar himselfe brought, was wholly ouerthrowne by Pompey, neare vnto TAVROMENION, and Cafar brought to that extremity, that he was ready to kill himselfe. But Cornificius ranto the shore, who saued him, and brought him to the campe: from whence he retired further off, and very quickly (but with great danger) vnto MESSALA. After certaine encounters where Pompey euer had the better, infomuch as Lepidus was suspected to leane on that fide, C. efar refolued to commit all to the hazard of a latter battell; and to draw Pompey vnto it, he cut him fo flort of victuals, that he was conftrained to come to blowes, and the fight was very cruell: wherein Agrippa bestirred himselfe so valiantly, that he wan the victory, sunke 28. ships, brake and spoiled the most part of the rest, and tooke two of the chiefest Captaines Pompey had: one of the which called Demochares, killed him selfe with his owne hands. Now for Pompey, who but a litle before had about three hundred and fiftie faile, he fled away with all freed only with seuenteene, and went to MESSINA so discouraged, that leaving all hope and his army he had by land, he went to the Ile of CEPHALONIE, where being somewhat come to himselfe, he determined to repaire to Antoniu, But Tistenus' a Frenchman (his lieutenat of the army by land) led all his troupes vnto Lepidus : fome GREBKE historians report that it was to Cafar. Plemmis nius was within MESSINA with eight legions, and did capitulate with Lepidus to render vothe towne to him. Whereupon Agrippa hapned to come thither; who maintained that they ought to regard C. efar that was abfent then. But that flood him in no flead; for Lepidus entred the town. & gane the spoile of it as well to Plemminius soldiers as to his. Thereupon Casar vndertook athing worthy of memory, which was: that being vnarmed he went into Lepidus camp, and turning by the blows of y darts that were thrown at him by some, which hit his cloke & pierced it he took hold of an enligne of a legion. Then the fouldiers al of then armed followed him, and left Legidus: who shortly after lost empire & army: he that with 20 legions promised himselfe Sierlia & a great deale more, cafar gaue him his life, and the office of four aigne Bishop of Rome, whither he fent him. Some fay he was banished. Vpon these flirs there rose a sedition in Casars camp through the infolencie of the fouldiers, that ran evento his iudgement feat, vfing great menaces. But he wisely appealed all punished the authours of the tumult, and did cassiere all the tenth legion with great shame and ignominie, because the souldiers of the same did ouerbraue him in words. He dispersed and sent some others to their houses, and gaue vnto them that had vsed themselues gently, two thousand Sesterces for enery souldier: which is thought to mount neare to fiftie crownes. He made them to be must red, and found that they were fine and fortie legions, flue and twenty thousand horsemen, and fixe and thirty thousand lightly armed. Afterwards he did great honours vnto his Lieutenant Agrippa for his notable feruice, and commaunded Statilius Taurus togo into Africke to take possession of the Provinces of Lepidus. Whilest Antonius made warre with the Parthans, or rather infortunately they made warre with him to his great confusion: his Lieutenant Titius found the meanes to lay hands ypon Sextus Pompeius that was fled into the Ile of Samos, and then forty yeares old: whom he putto death by Amonius commandement: for which fact he was so hated of the people of Sextum P8. Rome, that though he had given them the pastime of certaine playes at his owne cost and charges, they draue him out of the Theater.

Moreover, Cafar thinking to have failed out of Sicilia into MAVRITANIA, the sea being toning rough, stayed him: which was the cause that he sent his army into ILLYRIA, and set you the IAPVDES, which did him much mischiefe, yet at the last he ouercame them. Then he ranne vnonthe PANNONIANS, and the DALMATIANS, whom he made tributaries; being hurt in his Augustians thighes, in his armes, and in one of his knees, in this warre against the ILLYRIANS. On the o- burinhis ther fide, Messala his Lieutenant fought against the SALASSIANS, dwelling in a valley enuironed arms, and with high mountaines of the Alpes: and after diverse overthrowes, he made them subject to the Empire. And shortly after Cesar was chosen Confull the second time: but he resigned the office the fame day vnto Autronius Patus, being about to make himselfe friends against Antomins: who being flayed about Cleopatra, gaue his wife occasion to returne from ATHENS to ROME. Now after the fire of enmity betwixt these two competitours had bene a hatching a certaine time, it flood either of them both vpon, to feeke all the meanes to ouerthrow his companion. The strange proceedings of Antonius in fauour of Cleopatra hastened the warre, whereupon followed the battell of $\mathbf{A}_{\mathtt{CTIVM}}$, the flying of these wicked louers, & the beginning of the Monarchy of Cafar, confirmed by the conquest of A GYPT, and the tragicall death of Antonius and Cleopatra. The which we touch briefly, the whole being largely fet downe in the life of Anionius. They did great honours vnto Cafar after these exploites. The memory of Antonius was condemned, and his statues maimed and throwne downe to the ground. A little before, M. Lepidus, son of the Trium-vir and of Iunia fifter of Brutus, conspired against Cafar. But after they for conspired haddiscouered it, he was put to death by the wisedome of C. Mecenas a knight, and gouernor of ie. Rome: his wife Servilia killed her selfe, as Portia the wife of Brutus. After the vtter overthrow of Antonius, Cafar tooke order for the affaires of the East parts, he made alliance with Herodes the out. king of IVDEA. He sent the king of the PARTHIANS sonne in hostage to Rome, untill they hould fend all the enfignes and standards they had wonne of Crassus and Antonius. Hegouerned the affaires of Asia, received into league and friendship with him the kings of GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, & PAPHLAGONIA: & he punished some others by fines, that were not his frieds. Hegaue priviledges to the cities of Ephesys, of Nice, Per Game, and Bythinia, to build temples in the honour of Iulius Calar, of Rome, and of himselse. He set the Samians at liberty, and after he had taken order for all the reft he went towards ITALY: where after he was arrived it cannot be expressed with what great ioy he was received of high and low, from BRVNDVSI-VM VNto Rome.
